I never had a real chance. Life never gave me a chance. If only my parents had taught me at an early age, if only they had not, if only the system wasn't so, if only then perhaps, but it's too late now.

That's a heavy sense of self. It's a conceptual identity that is as heavy or heavier than the person who thinks I've made it in the world. Everybody, I'm the great one who has achieved wealth, fame, and so on.

They are both heavy, but I say perhaps the miserable one is even heavier. And of course, I'm giving you these two extremes which do exist in certain people. For many people, there's a movement, they fluctuate between these two of thinking of yourself as, oh, actually not bad, quite good.

I'm actually still better looking than most. Or, if that's your conceptual identity, or I still have more money than most of my friends or neighbors, okay? Or then you shift into, oh, I'm losing.

I'm losing it, I'm losing out. The others are overtaking me. People I was at school with, they're already there, and I'm still here.

Oh, dear. So, again, so here we have, where does your sense of self come from? The conceptual, the concepts in your mind, or does it come not from any kind of thought, but from that which is deeper than thought, the stillness, the depths, the presence that you are?

And that's the liberation. It's when your sense of who you are comes out of the presence of who you are, in essence, which is the consciousness that you are. And then it doesn't, it is secondary.

I sometimes say it is no longer of absolute importance then what your life situation is. Once you know who you are, and you can only know it in this moment, you can't say, okay, now I know it, what's next? No, once you know who you are in this now, the only place where you can know who you are, your life situation is only of relative importance.

It's still relatively important, the way I put it, whether you are poor or wealthy, well, it does make some difference in your life, yes, true. It's of relative importance whether you are healthy or the body is not doing very well, of course, it's relative importance. Whether you have satisfying relationships is important.

Whether you have a nice place to live or an unpleasant place to live, yes, of course, it's important, but it is not of absolute importance anymore. It is of relative, everything in your life situation then is of relative importance because only the one thing, there's only the one thing that matters absolutely, and that is knowing who you are beyond all the forms, knowing yourself as the presence underneath it all. And then you can live with any life situation and be at peace with it and still deal with it and still be active, but to be at peace with whatever the situation is at the moment, you are deeper than that, you are beyond that.

You are the consciousness, you are not ultimately the person who is having a life situation. The person who has a place where he or she lives, which may be good or not so good. The person who has relationships, the person who has money or no money.

Yes, these things matter, but they don't matter absolutely. If they matter absolutely, it means you don't know the absolute. Then they matter absolutely and they have the power to make you miserable, the things of this world.

Even success can make you then miserable as it's often the case. There are as many people made miserable by failure as people made miserable by success. So, who am I?

We had, at some point we talked about that as a meditation. Method, so to speak, the simplest meditation method to ask, who am I? And of course, that is the most vital question.

And none, whatever concepts are rising in your mind about who you are are not who you are. So the wonderful liberation is to go beyond a conceptual sense of self. And this is not only liberating to yourself, so to speak, but you liberate other people from imposing on them also a conceptual sense of self.

This is a dreadful thing to do to other human beings because you no longer recognize the essential aliveness and your essential oneness with that so-called other human being. You no longer recognize that. To you then, the other being, human being, becomes reduced to a concept in your head.

And so you have a set of beliefs about who that other human being is. And why are you doing that to another human being? Because before, you did it to yourself and you continuously do it to yourself.

Then you cannot not do it to another human being, imposing a conceptual identity onto others. And so that's the, an enormous improvement that then happens in relationships when you do not come from a conceptual sense of self and therefore no longer impose a conceptual sense of self on others. A set of judgments, a set of criticisms of who they are.

What's such a normal thing to do? It doesn't mean you can't, you don't see certain behavior patterns in another human being. It may well be that you see that the person who knocks on your door and wants to sell you something, what he's trying to sell you is a fake and he's trying to tell you that it is genuine, so you're not going to say in your mind, okay, I must not believe that he's an honest person.

No, you don't have to believe anything. And here comes something in that there's a knowing for which you don't need concepts. You can know if a person tries to deceive you, you know it without having to call him a thief or a manipulator.

You see it and that's all. You see what behavior pattern governs this person and then you also see there is something deeper than that behavior pattern. You don't react as if that behavior pattern were the ultimate reality of that human being.

And that's a wonderful thing that you can do for another human being is not to act as if the behavior they manifest were their ultimate reality, because it isn't. And sometimes the miracle happens that you can free without consciously doing it, not thinking that I'm going to free you, but by being in that state of consciousness, you can free, sometimes it happens, you can free a person from their limited, unconscious behavior patterns because you are not acknowledging it. You see it, but you don't acknowledge it.

If you acknowledge it, if you impose judgments, you reduce the human being to something that is not, but by doing it to another, you do it to yourself. And this is perhaps why Jesus said, judge not so that you are not judged, because you're really, you're judging always yourself. And so in the Course in Miracles, there's a beautiful line.

That was the first line I ever heard about a Course in Miracles when it came to England in the, in 1980 something. I was, I saw this strange thing. People said, Course in Miracles said, oh no, another weird thing has come from California.

And of course it turned out it wasn't from California. It came from New York, but was actually written at Columbia University. Would you believe that?

And this person, I asked the person, have you ever heard of this weird thing called a Course in Miracles? And the person said, I don't know much about it except one sentence. And that is, what you perceive in another, you strengthen in yourself.

So perceive here means what you focus on in the other. The very, if you focus on the other is dishonest, if the other is unconscious in some behavior in the other, you, what you focus on, you strengthen in yourself. If that becomes your reality, it draws you into the same.

So here, freedom then comes from not imposing conceptual identities on others, which you can only do if you no longer impose or believe in or derive your identity from conceptual sense of self in your own mind. And so you end up, of course, with something that the ego does not particularly like, because the opinions that you have about yourself are becoming quite insubstantial or weak. In other words, you're beginning to have fewer and fewer opinions about who you are.

That's being attuned with the Tao. And so when then people ask you about how do you see yourself, as I have occasionally once or twice have been asked by people who came to interview me, so how do you see yourself?

[Speaker 8] (6:08:04 - 6:08:05)

Well, I don't know.

[Speaker 1] (6:08:05 - 6:14:51)

No. Not in any particular way. I gave very unsatisfying answers to these questions.

I don't know how, I don't see myself. If I saw myself as a great spiritual teacher, that would be the beginning of delusion, because it would be the beginning of identification with a form identity. If I saw myself as a successful author now and derived some satisfaction from it, yes, it's fulfilling to know that many people are being helped, this is wonderful, but I didn't do that as such.

It happened through this form. I would have been very unhappy for many years when my conceptual reality was one of, if I had had one, my mother had it for me, of being unsuccessful in this world, a failure. A person who's made so many mistakes that now it's too late for everything.

So that would have been, for 20 years, I would have lived in that very painful conceptual reality. You have failed. Look at your friends from school.

They've got their big cars now. They've got their careers. What have you got to show for it?

Nothing. If I had had that, it would have been painful, but fortunately, even on the park bench already, there was no conceptual identity and the park bench was a beautiful place. It was fine.

Only others felt sorry for me and that was fine too. I remember my father, a little later, I acquired a bicycle. My father then came for a visit to London where I was living and at that time he was a businessman and he was staying in this hotel on the 10th floor and I visited him in his room and opposite the hotel was a park and there was a railings and I chained my bicycle to the railings and very proudly I said, I was about 30 or 31 then, my father, I said, look down there, there's my bike.

And he got very upset. He said, what, oh poor you, you have to go on a bike in London? That's terrible, what a terrible thing.

I never expected that response. I was, it was a nice new bike. And so deep down he felt, oh, my poor son, he failed, although not never as, never went that far in his belief as my mom did, but fortunately before she passed away, her son became successful.

I'll just read the rest of this chapter, 20. There's a little bit of humor in this chapter. Lao Tse talks about himself, but humorously, it's hidden humor.

Other people are excited as though they were at a parade. I alone don't care. I alone am expressionless, like an infant before it can smile.

Other people have what they need. I alone possess nothing. I alone drift about like someone without a home.

I'm like an idiot. My mind is so empty. Of course, that would be an external viewpoint.

There's always a certain similarity between the master who has gone beyond thinking and the simpleton who has not yet arrived at thinking, the so-called fool. The fool is pre-thought, the master is post-thought, but they can be confused. You can confuse one with the other, which is beautifully expressed in an old film with Peter Sellers called Being There, where being the main character in that film is a very simple person who has never even arrived at ego yet, and yet because of the similarity with that state and the transcendent state, he's mistaken by everybody for the wisest person around, and even in the end of the film, put forward to become president of the United States. I am like an idiot. My mind is so empty.

Other people are bright. I alone am dark. Other people are sharp.

I alone am dull. Other people have a purpose. I alone don't know.

I drift like a wave on the ocean. I blow as aimless as the wind. I'm different from ordinary people.

I drink from the great mother's breasts. In an alternative translation, the last line is, I am nourished by the great mother. I am nourished by the great mother.

He had quite a sense of humor, I would say. There's a lot of humor in here. It's not necessarily immediately visible, but it's there.

We didn't get very much done in the Dao De Jing, but that's fine. Only two little chapters. That doesn't matter because the truth is in every line.

It's like a hologram. Any spiritual teaching, really, it doesn't go, you have to know this first for you to understand that. The truth is everywhere, in every statement, in every sentence, on every page.

[Speaker 2] (6:17:16 - 6:22:37)

I've kind of just answered this question, but it's on love and soulmates. Is there such a thing as a soulmate? And is there something we should try to find?

I have a wonderful husband of many years with grown children, but I feel like there's something missing, and I want to find my true soulmate. Is this just a fantasy? Well, I answered it.

It's that hole in that flute. And yet, sometimes a soulmate can show up that hole in the flute, you can see that reflected in another person. And they see it reflected in you, and somehow we connect together.

That's the connection. I mean, that's my connection with Eckhart. Truly, it's, wow.

It's the one person that I could truly see myself reflected, because we're all reflections. So it's nice. But if I only solely just saw in him, I would become lost in him, right?

I'd become starting to grab on and hold on, thinking like, oh, I could only get it through him, I could only see it through him. I have to see it in myself. We were in Switzerland visiting this church, just doing some sightseeing between talks.

And it was also a Christian church. But they had this old part and then the new part of the church. And here I was, I went to this old part, and they had these beautiful sort of paintings on the wall of the church.

And I stood there, and I could not move. I was suddenly experiencing like no time, where there's past, present, and future was happening all at once, all at the same time. I could see it all.

I could see the past, everything that was going on. And I stood there frozen. I was like, oh my God, this is incredible.

And then I thought, well, okay, maybe I better go, because Eckhart's waiting for me. He kind of knows me by now when I go into something. He just leaves me, which is really nice.

He'll just sit and wait for me, because he knows I sometimes go into these different experiences. So I turned around, so I turned my body around, and I looked out there. And he's the only one out there.

But I looked at the church, and I'm like, oh, I'm not ready. So I turned myself back around, and I'm like, oh, yeah, this is great. The timeless realm, this is wonderful.

And then again, I turn around, because some time passes, and I'm like, no, I'm not ready to go back out there. Then somebody else comes, and they're too frozen. They're just stuck there.

And he mentioned this. He says, you guys were just standing there like looking at the wall. You're like, what were you looking at?

You know? And then, you know, she was standing there a long time, but then she left. So I turned, and I thought, okay, I better get going, because I don't know how long.

It felt like a very long time I was standing there. So I turned around. I took a deep breath, and I walked down the two steps that I had to walk down to the new part of the church.

And I'm like, oh, God, I'm back in this realm. And then I sat down beside Eckhart, and he looked at me, and I looked at him. And I said, oh, my God, no, I'm not.

Ha ha ha ha ha ha ha. All I had to do was look at him, and I'm just in that timeless realm again. And I went, oh, home.

That's home. And it's really nice to be able to find someone to reflect that back. And sometimes we can't find it.

And that's okay, because when we actually find it in ourselves and hold it, meaning maintain it in ourselves, so maintain that sort of, that feeling of, that sense of oneness, that hole in that flute, then we just see it. We look out, and we see it. It's just there.

It doesn't matter about the other person, whether they're in that realm or not. But it is really nice to meet somebody who else is in that realm. So though I consider Eckhart my soulmate, my soulmate is really that hole in the flute.

And he's just a reflection of that.

Thank you. Wonderful. Welcome.

My first time here, up north. And it is perhaps not mere coincidence, but synchronistic that we are coming together here at a time of crisis politically. And it is significant that a group of people are gathering here who are focused on spiritual awakening.

And of course, the inevitable thing that comes with spiritual awakening, that's inner peace. And that's what needed, not only here, but in the rest of the world too. So most of you are here because you're already undergoing what I call the awakening process.

And I'm sure some of you are here who are already awake and just enjoy listening to me. Don't need to be here anymore, but that's fine. And one or two may be here against their free will because your partner or a relative or a good friend told you that you really need to come here.

And it is a sad fact that the people who really need to be here are not going to be here mostly, but that's fine. If awakening eventually will come to the whole of humanity, but right now at this time, a certain segment of humanity is beginning to go through this evolutionary shift, which I sometimes call the awakening of consciousness. And I guess, although I have no plans, particular plans for this evening, but my feeling is that it's going to be about awakening, the awakening of human consciousness.

And not only about the awakening of human consciousness, I have a feeling that this evening is going to be an essential part of the awakening that's happening on the planet here and there. So I'd like this evening to be not only interesting for you on a conceptual level or entertaining, because that wouldn't be quite enough. And you might get bored after half an hour or so, but more importantly, I'd like this evening to be experiential for you.

Something that goes beyond conceptual understanding or taking in new ideas, interesting ideas. And then you can go home afterwards and say, oh, that was interesting, what you talked about. I don't remember everything, but that was an interesting idea.

Maybe there may be one or two interesting ideas, but this is not what this evening is about. It's something deeper, a shift in consciousness. So I'd like you to experience as we spend this evening together, to experience or to deepen, because many of you are already going through this shift.

Then this evening is a deepening for you of this shift in consciousness. And for one or two of you, it may be the first time. And that may be one or two of those of you who didn't really want to come here, but were dragged here by someone else.

And you may get suddenly have your first glimpse of what is meant by awakening. And what in Zen they called Satori. And you suddenly go, oh, now I know what he's talking about.

That's what it is. And then you talk to a friend about it tomorrow and say, well, what is it? And say, well, I can't explain it, but I realized something.

Humanity is going through a very, what has been until now, a very slow evolutionary progression, human consciousness. So slow that you would hardly notice it. Humans are slow learners.

They repeat the same mistake again and again, the same thing that causes them suffering. They do it again and again and again, both personal on this personal level and on a collective level, the same mistakes politicians make and so on. Until a point comes when they can't stand the suffering anymore.

And that's always a good point to reach. And you go, and then suddenly an inner opening happens. Suffering has its purpose.

And many of you would not be here. I would even say most, perhaps even all of you would not be here if you had not had your share of human suffering. So retrospectively, we can be grateful for the suffering that we as individuals have gone through, because it has taken us to this point of the awakening of consciousness.

This also applies to the whole of humanity. Humanity is, you can consider it as an organism that is gradually evolving, the collective consciousness of humanity. Each individual is an expression of the collective consciousness of humanity.

And the collective consciousness of humanity is an expression of the one universal consciousness. The greatest mystery of the universe, and perhaps this is a good starting point for our evening. The greatest mystery of the universe is not out in outer space, the mysteries of the galaxies, the mysteries of the black holes, the billions of galaxies that exist, that it is phenomenal, it's unbelievable.

And the greatest mystery is not on the atomic level, which is also unbelievable, that the world that is there, the atomic and subatomic level that scientists explore, which we only understand a tiny fragment of, just as we only understand the tiniest of fragments of what is out there. So you have the two realms, the two mysteries, the outer space, and then the macrocosm, and you have the microcosm. And people write books, great scientists write books about the mysteries of the universe.

And the amazing thing is, many of these books, very good books, fail to mention one word. They explore the mysteries of the universe, but there's one word, you can have a whole book on the mysteries of the universe, either the macrocosm or the microcosm, or the two together. The one word that's not mentioned is consciousness, which is the foremost fundamental mystery, the fact that the universe is conscious.

That is the most amazing miracle. How do I know that the universe is conscious? Well, I am conscious, you are conscious.

The universe is conscious in us. The universe is experiencing itself for a brief moment, as a human being. It's also experiencing itself for brief moments as a plant or an animal, and that's an amazing thing.

Now, scientists are probably never going to figure out what consciousness is, if it's even possible to figure out what consciousness is, because scientists is concerned with looking out there. You can either look out into outer space, or you look into the most, the innermost of matter. But what scientists don't look at is their own consciousness, which is the universe looking at itself.

So the awakening of human consciousness is, and I'll give you now the answer, in case you have better things to do. So I'll tell you the secret of the universe now. And so if you want to have a pint after this, it's okay.

At least you know the secret of the universe. The realization that there is more to you than meets the eye. The realization that, yes, you are obviously this physical body, this physical form.

That is the first thing that meets the eye when somebody looks at you. And of course, you're also your thoughts and your emotions and feelings. That's another level of who you are.

And that again is a form. The body is a form. And then you have the next level of who you are, which is thoughts and emotions, which is thought forms and emotional forms.

And most people derive their sense of identity, their sense of who they are from the movement of thought in their head. Thought identifies with certain things as you begin to grow up. It identifies with the first possessions that you have, the toys.

It identifies with the name that you are given. That's me. Your parents tell you, that's you.

Then the beginning of identification is the name. That becomes the receptacle for all other identifications, possessions, the toy. And you can see how painful it is once you have identified with something.

When it's taken away from you, this child will scream if a toy is taken away because the identification has already happened with something. And five minutes later, the child might lose interest in the toy completely. But when somebody takes it away, it is extremely painful because already at that stage, the child experiences the beginning of ego identity and how painful it is when the ego identity is injured or something is removed from it.

It hurts on a psychological level as if you had sometimes even more than a physical injury, the pain you would experience with a physical injury. And then comes the child goes up, more and more identifications come. People that you know, your relationships, you identify with your knowledge, you identify with your physical strengths, your ability.

Look what I can do. You can't do that, but I can do that. Look what I know.

I know that, but you don't know that. Let me tell you, this is how it is. Opinions, you accumulate opinions about this and that, and nothing wrong.

Everybody has opinions, but the opinions become part of your sense of self. You identify with these thoughts that constitute those opinions. So the opinions, which are thought forms, are imbued with a sense of self.

There is a self in them, a me. And you can notice that when somebody starts to question your opinion, you get defensive or upset or aggressive or fearful. You might even, well, not you, but a very unconscious person may even become violent, physical aggression.

Why? Because somebody questioned my opinions. There are even the entire religions that would...

And in the past, it's been like that. In the Middle Ages, Christianity was like, they will kill you if you disagree with the conventional beliefs. What, you don't believe what I believe or we believe?

Okay, let's kill you. Ego, egoic identity, whether personal or collective ego. There are the two aspects of ego.

But ego is always identification with something. And identification means it gives you your sense of self. This is why for people, it is so precious and they hang on to it and they defend it with their life.

It's, that's all they know, that's me. And it's totally normal. It's been like that for thousands of years, ego.

In the past, ego, and in certain societies, even nowadays, the predominant ego is the collective still, whereas in Western societies, ego tends to be more individualized. It started, of course, thousands of years ago with tribal egos. You had tribes and you identified with this particular tribe and you were nice to the people in your tribe, but not very nice to the people outside of your tribe because there were less than you.

All these were primitive, rudimentary manifestations of ego. But whatever it is, ego means you have a bundle of thoughts, predominant thoughts, as I said, opinions, likes, dislikes, the story of who I am, what people did to me, what I did, what I've achieved, what I know, what I can do, what I possess. And these are all really thought forms and they give you your sense of self.

It's very normal and you cannot stop a child from developing that kind of identity. It's a normal progression. You can't tell a child, do not, there's no such thing as possession.

Don't identify with that toy, it's not yours. Stop, stop, don't. But one can, as you begin to awaken, you begin to see in yourself that you carry an ego.

You might see, for example, that you become defensive or when somebody disagrees with your opinions. You can even have an ego around the city you live in, the team, sports team that you identify with. These are rudimentary ego forms.

If you have little else, you can, a huge part of their identity can be your football team. And then you, and then the others are your enemies who identify with another football team. And then you fight it out on Sunday afternoons.

So you have different manifestations of ego, but it's ego. It's a sense of self. You can have a spiritual ego.

Some of you might remember that before you went beyond that, you had a spiritual ego and spiritual ego means you have a sense of self that begins to form in your head, a self image of yourself as a more spiritual person than most others. Very subtle ego. You can have an ego of yourself as egoless.

A self image that says, I am one of the most egoless humans on the planet. And it's hidden. It doesn't necessarily explicitly say I am the most egoless person on the planet.

Well, it might do, but usually it's more hidden. It's implied. You look down on others who still have their egos, whereas I'm free of it.

And these are more subtle forms. It's this ego, it's a more subtle form of ego than the person who gets into a fight against the opposing fans of the other football team, soccer team, whatever it is. But it's the same, the same mechanism is behind it.

And ego also, you always recognize it when that it compares itself with others. The moment you meet somebody or even just you see somebody in the street, the ego goes into comparison mode. And usually the result of comparison mode of the ego is it comes to the conclusion that you are either inferior or superior to the other.

Of course, it wants to be superior if it can, but some, it just doesn't work sometimes. So, and the ego tends to select the thing that is most, that is your strong point. That's what then we'll then focus on.

In my case, for example, the ego that, I could not develop an ego around a strong physical physique as a person who is good at sports or whatever. So, because I was a little guy who got bullied at school. So the ego said, what can I do?

What can I identify with? And wasn't particularly good looking. So it couldn't say, but I'm better looking than you.

Okay, that doesn't work either. Eventually it sought refuge in trying to be more knowledgeable and educated than others. So I started reading books and then in discussions, I could suddenly show off my knowledge and show that if you don't know that, let me tell you about that.

Okay, that worked for a while. Physical appearance is a very common thing for comparison. Do I look better than the other woman, man, whatever it is.

And then you look in the mirror and this is greatly enhanced these days by the technology that's available to us through Facebook and selfies. The original, in Greek mythology, the original story that shows the development, the beginning of ego was in the midst of Narcissus, who was a young man. Of course, at that time there were no mirrors, but he happened to look into a pool of water one day, this young man, and he saw that he was so beautiful and he fell in love with himself.

That's where the word narcissism comes from. So he fell in love with himself. There was an image of himself that he saw there.

He fell in love with the image, which to me means he identified with the image. This is a pictorial representation of an inner process. The image formation that gives you your sense of self, which is ego.

So that was the beginning of Narcissus. Now you don't need a pool of water anymore.

You have not only mirrors, more importantly, you have your smartphone and you can go.

And then you send it out into the world. You're not confined anymore to one person looking at you or two people. You send it out into the world and hundreds of people suddenly see you.

And then you're waiting for your egoic feedback, which usually comes in the form of little comments like, cool. Cool. I like it.

And if it's not you, you take a picture of the rest of you in a restaurant and you're eating this lovely meal. I am eating this meal, me. Look how great this meal is that I am eating.

Oh, and of course, many people who look at other people's posts feel diminished a little bit because their life is so interesting. And then what you do, you have to also pretend that your life is interesting and select all those things that make your life look interesting. In other words, and this is especially young people, you begin to, your life merges with a fiction, a fictional image, which is available to the public.

And you don't know it. This is an extension of egoic identity that has become possible through technology. Very seductive, but also extremely limiting.

It always is in a seeking mode because it doesn't feel fulfilled. It doesn't feel I am enough. It doesn't, it feels I'm lacking in something which may be either money or knowledge or looks or relationships, significant relationship, all kinds of things I'm lacking in, not enough.

So it's in seeking mode. But as it's pointed out in this book called The Cause in Miracles, it says the dictum of the ego is seek, but do not find. So it's always seek.

And because it's always seeking, it's always seeking for the next thing, which implies the future is extremely important for the ego. It looks to the next, the next thing. There's a continuous reaching out, an inability to be present here and now.

That's all part of the unconsciousness that I call. Unconsciousness is, in this terminology, complete identification with the mind. And this is where the ego resides.

It resides in your mind. It is a mental formation. It is a kind of fiction that every human being creates for themselves.

And of course you get a lot of feedback. So the particular fiction that you create for yourself depends to a large extent on the culture that you grew up in, the people you grew up with. They will tell you who you are as a child, and then you become conditioned by your surroundings, the surrounding culture, and your family, and so on.

So you are trapped with a mind-made sense of self. And this mind-made sense of self is also much more focused on the negative than the positive. That keeps the ego going.

If the ego can find that it opposes something or someone, it feels strengthened in its opposition. So the ego needs its enemies. It needs to say, no, you are wrong.

It needs to be right. Very strong tendency in the ego. It enhances itself by making others wrong.

It enhances itself by criticizing it, by condemning, by continuously judging, not only other people, but also places, situations you find yourself in. So it dwells much more on the negative than the positive. You may realize in your own life a positive event that happens in your life.

Let's say you see a beautiful sunset, and you go, oh, it's wonderful. And by the way, when you appreciate beauty like that for a moment, the ego is not operating. The ego is out of the way, and there's just, we'll come to that, there's just an aware presence, and you go, ah, ego is gone.

Thought has subsided momentarily, and then ego, there can be no ego without thought. There's just an awareness suddenly, and you look, there's a beautiful flower, the sunset, whatever it may be, and you go, oh, and then you may remember the next day, yes, I saw a beautiful sunset, but the egoic mind, the thinking might come to very much with that, says, yeah, that was a beautiful sunset, and then you tend to forget it. But take another event, somebody is rude to you, say something rude, you can think about that for hours.

You can tell others about it. You can elaborate on that, and you can think about what you're going to say back next time you meet him, you're going to say, oh, what you should have said, why didn't I say that? Then you call your friend, you know what he did?

I should have done that, why couldn't I think of that? Well, you're right, and you can, for hours, it goes on, and this is only a small example of how easy it is to, how a negative thought proliferates much more easily than a positive thought, and the ego loves it. It loves complaining, and there's always somebody who is not right.

When you sometimes listen to people telling others what others did, there's a common denominator in what they're saying that underlies whatever they're saying, that is, I'm always right, and the others are always wrong, and you know what he said then? But then I said to him, of course, you are always right. Amazing, and then the ego misinterprets people and events according to its conditioning.

So if you wanted to figure out all the elements that make up your ego, you would have to undergo several decades of psychoanalysis, so there wouldn't be much of a chance, really, to go beyond it by examining all the aspects of your ego, because it can be quite complex. So this is not what I recommend here, although there's nothing wrong with you. Enjoy psychoanalysis, that's great.

So the ego is associated with a voice in the head that continuously operates in you, and that for most people, that real ego is an intrinsic part of the voice in the head, and for most people, that is who they think they are. They are that entity, and that entity speaks through them. You can see it when you observe people.

There is, they are in the grip of something when they talk. Something is operating through them, and they can't stop it, they just, they talk. Whatever they say may vary a lot.

A person coming from a totally different culture will say totally different things from somebody from this culture, and yet the common thing is it comes out of them, and if they're not speaking out aloud, they are thinking it, and they can't stop thinking. And you can see it when you look at people. There's something going on inside them, and when they look at you, you know that they're commenting continuously on their sense perceptions.

What they say depends on their conditioning, but the fact that they are saying something, that's the common thing. So there's something missing there. It's almost as if this human being had been taken over by something, and in a way, that is the case.

In evolutionary terms, it's been a wonderful thing to have developed the ability to think. That's been an enormous evolutionary step forward. It's an incredible tool, the ability to conceptualize, to think.

But this incredible tool, there's been a huge downside to it, like everything else in this universe. Everything that you receive, every great thing will have some downside. We live in the world of polarities.

You can't have just great, just great. There's always, oh, I didn't know it came with that. So the downside to the ability to think is that over the centuries and millennia, more and more, people began to be trapped in the movement of thought.

And when I say people, what I really mean is consciousness began to be completely trapped in the conceptual image-making mind without knowing it, so that most humans these days, except those who are going through the awakening process, most humans are completely identified with their conditioned mind. And the awakening begins when you, this very simple thing, and I believe most of you know exactly what I'm talking about. The awakening begins when you become aware of your thoughts, especially repetitive thoughts.

And you suddenly say, whoa. You recognize that certain thoughts have been going through your head for the past 10 or 20 years, same kinds of things, comments, interpretations, and not only thoughts, but emotions that accompany those thoughts, because the emotion is, in many cases, a reflection of the thought. So if you worry at night, you feel fearful because the body reacts to the thought that there is something wrong, that you are in danger.

You're not, you're in bed. It's warm and cozy. But your mind is telling you that your life is critical.

It's you're in a critical situation. And if you're not in a critical situation now, you will be very soon. And you're completely identified with that movement of thought.

You are that. You truly believe every thought that arises in your mind that says, this is so, this is really critical. This is not going to work out.

I'm going to, what am I going to do? Am I going to lose my job? Where am I going to live?

What about the mortgage? Who's going to, can't, and it goes on. And your body says, this guy is in danger.

And fear arises, oh my God. And the emotion further amplifies the fearful thoughts because the thoughts react to the emotion now. There's a vicious circle.

First they create the emotion, then they react to the emotion and create even more thoughts of that kind. Until finally you're in, you have a panic attack. And you don't realize that you are creating it.

You don't realize that, and this is an amazing thing. The, let's call it unhappiness because these are all forms of, unhappiness is a generic term which covers all kinds of things. Unhappiness covers from a small upset to deep despair to irritation, to enormous anger.

They're all forms of unhappiness. Now, the amazing realization is the largest part of unhappiness that you experience in your life, let's say 90%, 95%, does not arise from the circumstances of your life. There remains 5% where obviously somebody close to you dies you weep, you become unhappy.

That's those 5%. Or suddenly you get home and your house has gone up in flames for a little while. You may be unhappy.

We'll come, these are more extreme cases. We may come to that. But 95% of your states of unhappiness, now to hear what I'm saying now, you need to verify in your own life in actual situations.

95% of your unhappiness is not caused by situations you find yourself in, work situation, living situation, financial situation, health situation. It is caused by the mental commentary about those situations. What your mind is saying makes you unhappy, not what's happening.

But you have to find, don't believe me, verify it for yourself. Start with simple situations when you're lining up at the supermarket or you're doing your shopping or at the airport or waiting for the bus or stuck in a traffic jam. So there you are waiting in this lineup or queue and you get, after a while, you get restless and your mind is starting to say things.

It says, why can't they train these people better? Why do they select the most stupid people to do these jobs? I just, I'm not, I need to be somewhere else.

Why are these people, why is it always, I always choose the wrong queue to wait in. Why? And the more the mind talks, the more upset you get.

And it's not pleasant. And when you finally reach the counter, you're very angry. And you might say something to the person and you're spreading the negative vibes to that person.

And then the cashier absorbs that to the person. How do you spread them to the next person? This is how negativity spreads.

Now, this is the simplest example of how unhappiness arises on a small scale. Now, in the same situation, if you're vigilant, you can observe that your irritation, your upset, your anger is not caused by standing there with your grocery in the basket, looking around. Because that situation is completely neutral.

It is caused by what your mind adds to the situation. That is the root cause of the emotions that you then experience, which are unhappy emotions. Now, the amazing thing is most people don't know that.

They think that what they are experiencing and the way in which their mind interprets their experience is a single phenomenon. They have never separated the two. So they are so identified with their interpretations and reactions that the event and the reaction are a single thing that they experience.

And that is deep unconsciousness. And so you go through life encountering all kinds of unpleasant situations, reacting to people. As you know, people are challenging.

But how much of what is happening between you and the other person is supplied, is manufactured by your mind, your mental interpretation of the other, how they should behave but don't, what they should have done but didn't do, what they should not have said but said, and so on. And you can go on to hold stories, making other people wrong, which is the ego loves it because it strengthens itself every time. You could criticize somebody by implication, you are better.

Whenever you can criticize someone, you are implied that you are in a superior position because you are judging the other. You can even do it to a situation or a place. You can criticize it.

So the ego inflates itself through that. And you don't know that this is happening. You get bigger and bigger.

The ego goes, and the more angry the ego gets, the better it is for the ego. Or if it's not angry, it can also be just miserable. Poor me.

Treated so unfairly by life. I had such a bad deal. Why did life do this to me?

Or you call it God, why did God do this to me? I don't believe in God anymore because he did such awful things to me. That's a huge ego too, because it's a mental image.

And you're superior in your own way too because you're superior in your misery to others. You are not as miserable as you. You have suffered so much more than they.

That ego is as big as the guy who works on Wall Street and says, I'm the master of the universe, or thinks it until the bank collapses. Amazing thing, the ego. So you begin to realize that the situations that you encounter are actually not that bad at all.

But the commentary that you supply, that your mind manufactures unconsciously, that's the cause of the largest part of unhappiness. I've even received, and I keep receiving, correspondents, even from people in prison, who tell me that they have learned this lesson. They are still in prison, some are in for life, or they say they're in for another 10 years.

And they say, I feel free now. What they have done, they have given up commenting mentally on their situation. And that means it's the end of the ego.

They're no longer fighting, they're no longer against. They just say, this is what is. And what has happened now is they've become completely present in the now, which is the end of the ego.

They have become internally aligned with the present moment, which is as it is, always. And in their particular case, in prison, there isn't much they can do. Well, they could plan an escape.

That might be an option, but it's a more distant option. This is a good example of surrender to what is in this moment. So an enormous realization is to see that situations are neutral and you lose a large part of your unhappiness by relinquishing the mental commentary that criticizes, judges, blames, complains.

Great thing, complain. Oh, that keeps the ego going. Complain, it's so awful what they complain about this, about them, about him, about her, about a place, what they did, what they.

And the ego doesn't want to let go, but there's a time when an awareness arises, suddenly you become aware of what your mind is saying and doing, aware. For a moment, you're able to step back and realize these are just thoughts. There's the movement of thought.

And this is the awakening is when you realize that in the gap between two thoughts, you have not disappeared. In the gap between two thoughts, there is something else that is much deeper than the ego. Let's look at this gap between two thoughts now.

Here's one thought and here it comes to an end. Now the other one hasn't started yet. And there's a gap.

The other thought is here. One thought here comes to an end. The other thought here hasn't started yet.

And here we go. That's an amazing thing. What was that?

Let's try it again. The space of no thought. And in that space of no thought, you can actually look around too.

And there's no mental commentary anymore. But have you become suddenly unconscious? Have you suddenly disappeared?

No. There is a deeper dimension in you that has suddenly emerged. We can call that stillness.

We can call that presence. We can call it awareness. So you can be conscious.

And this is the secret. This is the next step in the evolution of consciousness for humans. And this gives you, as we will see, that gives you your true and deeper sense of who you are than anything your ego could ever do.

You are the essence of who you are is this aware presence that is deeper than thinking. When you look around this room or anywhere, wherever you may be, you take in your sense, you are aware of your sense perceptions. When thoughts go through your head and you realize that certain thoughts are going through your head, you no longer necessarily believe in every thought that comes into your head.

You just say, oh, there it is. You just see it. And it goes.

Then it doesn't proliferate anymore when there's an awareness there. It only proliferates when the thought seduces you into giving it your total attention. It drags your consciousness with it.

And you go, hmm. Hmm. And then you start thinking one little negative thought goes to many others.

There's something wrong with me. There's something wrong with him. There's something wrong with the universe.

There's something very wrong here. Very wrong. So sense perceptions, you hear, you see, you're aware of that.

You can be aware of thoughts. You can be aware of feeling something. You're aware of an emotion.

Usually, that's what makes up a person's life is what is a person, what does your life consist of? Very simply, the ingredients are as follows. Sense perceptions.

Thoughts, many thoughts about previous sense perceptions. And possible future sense perceptions. And all kinds of other weird thoughts and emotions that accompany the thoughts.

So sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions. That's me. That's my life.

Whatever I perceive and think about, obviously, that's me. But you might've forgotten something important. That is, when you perceive, you're aware of your perceptions.

When the thought arises, you're aware of your thought. When you feel an emotion, you're aware of an emotion. So it all presupposes that there's something in you that makes sense perceptions possible.

There's something in you that makes thoughts possible. There's something in you that makes emotions possible. And can you become aware of that?

If you can become aware of that, then you become aware of really the essence of who you are. And what is that? Consciousness.

Can you become aware that you are conscious rather than always only be conscious of this and conscious of that and conscious of that? Can you become aware that you are conscious right here? And now, what is the most essential thing about you?

Ask yourself that. What's the most essential thing about you? Is it your memories?

Well, even if you lost half your memories, you would still be you. What's the most essential thing about you right now? Can you get to the essence of you?

What does it feel to be you? What is that most fundamental feeling of beingness, of I am? Not even I am this or I am that.

That is thought. You add some thought added to the... There's a sense of beingness, of presence, that is more fundamental than whether you are a man or a woman or whether you are young or old or whether your history is pleasant or unpleasant or predominantly terrible or not so bad.

All that becomes secondary to this feeling of the simple fact that you are present. Can you sense your own presence? It has no content to it.

It's just pure awareness. This is what Jesus was actually trying to explain when he said, the kingdom of heaven, you can't say it's there or it's over there because I tell you, it's the most, it is the most, the innermost part of who you are. That's my translation.

You can't say over there. So in other words, who you essentially are cannot be an object of your consciousness. Every thought you have about yourself is an object of your consciousness.

You're thinking a thought, but who is the you that's thinking the thought? The thought is arising out of your consciousness. So essentially you are conscious presence.

You can sometimes see it in a little baby much more clearly if you want to see it in another, a one-year-old looking back at you, eyes wide open. And the baby has not yet formulated concepts and thoughts. It's just a pure expression of consciousness.

And you look into the eyes of the baby and it can reflect back to you for a second or two who you are at the deepest level. This is why people love to look at little babies because the baby looks at you and has no opinion about you. It just goes.

And it's so lovely. It loves looking at you. And if you can't find a baby, even a dog will do that.

This is why it's so liberating to, there's something that many people are attracted to dogs, cats too, but let's just talk about one animal. You're attracted to the, because you look at the dog and the dog looks at you and there is the consciousness looking through the eyes of the dog. That's the essence of the dog.

And you look into the eyes of the dog who has not arrived yet at conceptualization. It's a species that is still pre-thought. We are not going pre-thought by the way.

We are going post-thought, but the dog is pre-thought and you meet the dog in the pre-thought state of consciousness. And it liberates you for a moment from your thought burdened sense of identity. When the dog like looks back at you and the tail is probably wagging, just because you looked at the dog, it's already in a state of joy.

And that reflects back to you, your innermost being too, because the same consciousness shines through all beings, but at different levels. So you'd look at that dog and you, oh, and for a moment it frees you of yourself. It frees you of the ego.

And you may even notice that for a moment there is no thought in your mind. There's just a sense of beingness and you get it from the dog. The dog reflects it back to you.

This is why I have a little book produced with a cartoonist and the title of, it's mostly about dogs, but cats are also in it. It's called Guardians of Being, which is what I call the animals that live with humans because they reflect something back to you. And this consciousness you can see in another human being too, if you can feel it in yourself, the consciousness that you are, the essence of who you are, that has nothing to do with your personal history.

The only thing your personal history may have been good for is it has taken you into this realization that you are deeper than that. And it could well be that because your personal history has been not a very happy one, that could be the very reason why it has taken you to this point where you are able to go beyond because you are fed up with the unhappiness that was produced mostly by your mind. So this is a wonderful point to reach.

And many of you have already reached it or reached it long time ago. You're fed up with unhappiness. I don't need anymore.

By the way, unhappiness is optional. Challenges continue to come. It doesn't mean when you awaken spiritually, suddenly life will not challenge you anymore and you go.

No. And with every challenge, there's a deepening of your presence. And some challenges might even pull you out of presence again, and you fall back into unconsciousness for a little while.

And then you emerge again. So we're talking about identity, which is the most fundamental thing. Where do you get your sense of self from?

This is the most fundamental thing in your life because if you derive your sense of self from a fiction in your mind, which ultimately is what the ego is, your whole life will reflect back to you that this is a fiction and it will color all your experiences. It will create a neediness. It will create all kinds of emotions that are completely unnecessary, that are manufactured by your mind and the identity in the mind that we call the ego.

The almost like a little entity that doesn't want to go away. It wants to, I want to suffer a bit more. I need my enemies.

I need to complain. What can I complain about now? Well, why does he talk so much?

He's been going on talking for so long. I can't stand it anymore. No.

So the words are pointing to something in you. Then of course you cannot undo your personal history. Of course you remember your personal history and there's your life situation.

Everybody has a life situation. You have relationships. You have a work situation probably or you have lost your job then you don't have a work situation, but that's similar.

You have a living situation. You have a health situation. You have a relationship situation, a huge source of suffering and occasional happiness.

Those things make up your life. You have those situations. But is that all there is to who you are?

So you need to be free. You awaken to who you are beyond your history and your life situation. The essence, your essential being is the aliveness of presence, consciousness.

And you can only get that in the gap between two thoughts. This is why stillness is an important pointer to it. Stillness does not mean you fall asleep.

It could mean you fall asleep because the habitual level where humans exist is thinking. Then the only time when you are free of thinking is when you fall asleep, if you haven't awakened yet. When you move towards sleep, thinking gradually slows down.

When you get very sleepy, there's very little thought going on in your head and you go... And you might even like that because suddenly you can't remember what your problems are anymore. And you feel the pull of sleep, which is so delicious.

What we call tiredness, it's so normal, we accept it. But if you really look at what tiredness is, something absolutely delicious is pulling you. Come this way.

You must come this way. It's so delicious. And at some point, even if you try not to go there, the attraction, attraction of that place becomes so overwhelming that you have to go there.

And in the last moment when you still have some consciousness, you feel, ah. Even if you were out in the cold and know if I fall asleep, I'm going to die. In the last moment, you would still feel the deliciousness of going, ah.

You're moving, but you don't know it anymore. You're moving below thought towards sleep. Another way of moving below thought is having a few drinks.

And that can free you. For some people, it frees you. It frees them of their unhappiness and they become jolly.

Suddenly, suddenly they can enjoy life because they're not thinking much anymore. They're just, it's a way of being present too in some way. And then you think I need another one because if I feel jolly now, I'll be feeling even more jolly with the next one.

But that's not the case because the more you drink, the more you move towards unconsciousness. So you're falling again. You're falling below thought until finally you fall off the chair.

So we are not going there below thought. Yes, that can free you also. But as we awaken spiritually, as consciousness awakens in us, universal consciousness awakens in us, we become conscious of being conscious.

And the moment you are conscious of being conscious, you have risen above thought and you are still, you have transcended thought, which means you're able to think, but you're no longer trapped by it or in it. You're no longer at the mercy of your thoughts. You can use them.

They can still operate, but you can also by choice, and this possibility is coming to many of you already and to many more of you, I would say after this evening, to realize it is possible for you and even desirable in many, many instances to transcend thought and simply be aware. That is by the way, the state of, that is the entire teaching of Zen is contained in this. It Zen teaches you that you can rise above thought, become free of thought and just be aware.

This is why the Zen master often looks so fierce because he's in that fierce awareness and he goes in the old drawings of Zen masters or they might, one Zen master when asked, please explain Zen, the only thing he would ever do was raise his finger and look at you. That was his teaching and he became famous, famous teacher. Some people got it, others didn't.

If they didn't get it, they said, please explain Zen to me. And he would go. And some people went, wow.

[Speaker 8] (7:32:22 - 7:32:23)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (7:32:25 - 9:00:16)

And others didn't get it, they said, did you hear my question? There's in Zen, for those of you who are interested in Zen or might even have spent a decade in a Zen monastery, there is nothing to understand in Zen. You cannot understand Zen because there is nothing to understand.

Zen is about transcending thinking, not falling below thinking, but rising above thinking. This is why that is Zen. Oh, oh.

Now, many of you, especially after this evening, will discover in yourself the ability to step beyond thought when you don't want thought. Not perhaps always, sometimes the challenge is maybe too much and you fall back into thought for a while, it's fine. But from time to time, and you can actually invite it into your life in many, many situations that are relatively neutral, step out of thought and lose the illusion that in order to hold your life together, you need to think all the time about you and your life.

And if you stop thinking about you and your life, it's all going to fall apart. It's not going to, it's going to fall apart if you overthink, which most people do. Overthinking is a disease.

Overthinking means you're completely identified with thinking, you are in fact addicted to thinking, a lot of which is not only completely unnecessary, but actually harmful to your health, to your wellbeing, and to other people. It's harmful to you also because you're making yourself unhappy through it. And if you are making yourself unhappy, the chances are that you're making other people unhappy too.

So overthinking, identification with thinking, that is all part of the unconsciousness, or the old consciousness, as I call it. Now, a certain percentage of humans has reached a point of readiness where they are able to transcend thinking, become aware of themselves as awareness, as presence, as consciousness. And that becomes their sense of identity or sense of self, their presence.

It doesn't need, there's no longer any superiority or inferiority in it. There is in it a recognition. When you now look, not just the dog, it's easier with a dog or the baby, but when you look at another human being, and you can, you're not trapped in the conceptualizing, judgmental mind.

You are looking at another human being, and you can sense the background to your perception of this other human being, the sense perception. You may be looking and may be listening. The background to your sense perception is the space of awareness.

You're looking as a conscious presence, and not as a person, at this human being, because for a moment, your mind is still while you're looking and listening, or just looking at another, into the eyes of another human being. You, either somebody close to you or somebody you only meet casually in a shop or whatever, but for a moment, you're looking. And there is a recognition at that moment.

When you know yourself as consciousness, the wonderful thing is you recognize that essence in every other human being or any other living thing. And that recognition, you recognize that there's something of the same essence that is in you, also in the other. And you are able to, so to speak, look through the personality, which is there, which manifests through their words, whatever they are saying, the conditioned personality, which is their mind, their egoic mind, that of course will be there.

But you're able, if you are still and present, you can look at them, and then for a moment, you sense their essential beingness or consciousness, because you know your own consciousness, and that's the one, the recognition of oneness. And it is only there, out of that state of consciousness, that that which frees you from eternal conflict with other humans, which is ego condemns you to, it is only that that can free you from the eternal conflict. And out of that emanates that which makes you truly human or more than human, almost, empathy, a loving kindness towards another arises, a benevolence towards another human, despite, no matter what their personality is, a deeper goodwill towards another, benevolence, goodwill, love, not in the emotional sense, or certainly not in the egoic sense, love in the egoic sense is a clinging.

I want you, I need you, don't you dare leave me. You know what I'm going to do to you if you leave me. No, a different, a love that really, we should have other words for it in the Old Testament, in the old Greek, ancient Greek, agape is the word for that spiritual love, which is an outflow of goodwill, but all that really means you recognize your oneness with the other, not through some explanation in the head, but as a direct sensing, then you can really like another human.

You can even like another human being despite their personality, which has its quirks and idiosyncrasies like every personality has, you can look through. You can start with a dog, and then if your presence is strong enough with a human, and it may be easier, I wouldn't recommend that you immediately start with family members, because there are humans with whom you share a lot of history, and there's a lot of histories accumulated in the mental and emotional field, and that's not so easy then to see the essential beingness of uncle, John, or aunt, or whoever, or your parents. Start with strangers, somebody you meet in a shop, the receptionist, while you're talking briefly, you look at them, look into their eyes, and there's just a spacious presence, and it's beautiful. And some of them will notice that there's something there that they like when you're with them.

They may not know what it is. They may not know that you are present, and that they're not being judged by you. They just feel comfortable in your presence.

They like you. They don't know why. That is often the case.

Now, be careful that the ego is so cunning that it can come in through, even here, it can come in through the back door again, and then you get the sense that you are doing something to that person. And then you get sense, I'm going to free you of your ego. And you might even say, all right, now I'm doing something to you.

Oh. So just to be aware that ego can come back in at any point, but it is a beautiful way of interacting with another human. The next thing you can try is when you go to a meeting, in case you have meeting in your workplace, occasionally you have meetings, you sit around a table, all kinds of egoic stuff is going on.

People talk and disagree and argue, and some get angry. You can be the one person who holds the space of presence there. And you look at everybody while they talk in that alertness that is presence.

One could say it is a high frequency of presence that in that alertness, you look and you listen, and then the next person speaks, and you look and you listen, and the next person. And then at some point, you may find yourself contributing something, and suddenly words come out of your mouth. And that would be a helpful contribution and more likely to be something fresh and new than just a repetition of old opinions and old viewpoints.

Because you're now in touch with the dimension out of which creativity arises. You're in touch with that primordial intelligence that cannot be measured with IQ tests. It is deeper than that.

It all arises out of that. One thing that I briefly mentioned, some of you may question what this consciousness is. There's still in mainstream science, if they even ever mentioned the word consciousness, they say it is a by-product of the activity of the brain.

It is a by-product, an epiphenomenon, another fancy word for it, of the chemical soup in the brain. On one level, it's a chemical soup. On a deeper level, it's atoms swirling around.

And a by-product of the chemical soup in the brain is, they say, that there's consciousness. The chemical soup produces it. Somehow.

The amazing fact is any scientist who does not have a huge ego or will admit that we know almost nothing about the brain or how certainly not consciousness. Nobody knows what a thought is, where does it reside? What is a thought?

What is a memory? I believe a point will come perhaps soon when science will realize that consciousness transcends the brain, but is associated with the brain in the same way that a radio receiver or a television set receives transmissions and then gives them form. It does not mean that the radio produces the program or the television set.

So if a brick should fall on my head right now, I hope I'm not manifesting it by saying it, I would stop speaking and it would appear that I have lost consciousness, of course. Therefore, a scientist might say, you see, destroy the brain and you destroy consciousness. But it could be that the brain would then no longer be capable of transmitting, receiving consciousness, channeling consciousness into this dimension.

You may know that in ancient, many ancient cultures, the sun was regarded as a deity and the people would pray to the sun. There's some, there's a certain reason behind it and that is that all life that on this planet, including your physical body, the warmth in your physical body and so on is given by the sun. It's an outpouring, a continuous outpouring of energy and it all comes from the sun.

So they worship the sun, regarded the sun as a deity. The sun is the closest approximation, if one wants to use an analogy of what God is. God is the transcendent, timeless, eternal consciousness that exists outside of this dimension.

Totally undefinable, totally incomprehensible. It would be absurd to say the human mind could even begin to comprehend that. But that central sun, consciousness to me is like the rays of the sun.

The sun sends out rays continuously. Every ray of consciousness becomes a human being or another life form. It incarnates into form.

And then the consciousness in you, therefore, the consciousness in me is all expression of the one consciousness that continuously emanates through all life forms and experience itself in this dimension and grows and evolves in this dimension gradually where there's time and experiences the universe and as it does, it creates the universe as it experiences. Creation still goes on. So that is the self-exploration of consciousness in this universe where every single one of us is an expression of this one consciousness.

So the consciousness is the light of God. It is not God. Yes, it is.

It's the light of God in the same way that the sunshine is not the sun, and yet it is the sun. It emanates from the sun. It is still connected to the sun.

So, and this is why some great mystics, both in the West and East, India, even medieval Europe, have said things like the closest you can get to God is becoming still, or somebody else said, stillness is the language God speaks. Everything else is a bad translation. And also in the, there's a beautiful line in the Old Testament, very profound, mystical statement.

It says, be still and know that I am God. It's an amazing and very profound spiritual statement. Now, the strange thing about this statement is, first it points to when you are still, you are aware of yourself as the stillness.

You are aware of yourself as consciousness, because that stillness is just pure presence, pure consciousness. Be still, know that I am God. All these words, each word that this sentence consists of, these words, each word is synonymous with each other word.

Be is the being. Still is the presence, which is the being. Know, there is a knowing, there's a deep intelligence in that stillness.

It is the essential I am, which Jesus also said, according to one of the Gospels, that he made this strange statement. Before Abraham was, I am. But what an amazing statement, that the juxtaposition of the past tense and the eternal present tense of I am.

So I am is also used in India for, to point to your essential identity. And it was Ramana Maharshi, the Indian sage, who recommended, he recommended that you meditate on the question, who am I? Who am I?

He said, take that question into meditation and see what happens. So what you do, then you go into meditation and you ask, who am I? Now, if you find an answer on a conceptual level to that question, you're wrong, you missed it.

So if you go into meditation and say, who am I? And then you go, oh, I got it now, I know who I am. Yeah, okay.

No, you haven't. The secret is, we can do it here now. Who am I?

The secret is that there is no answer that follows that question. There is only the space of awareness. And that's who you are.

Who am I? Oh, that's it. That is so simple.

It's so simple and subtle that humans have overlooked it for thousands of years. The simple realization of who you are, that is very much like the ray of sunlight that went continuously exploring the universe. Let's say that's you and looking everywhere and thinking, and getting involved in this and identifying with this and that.

And suddenly it gets very unhappy, can't stand it anymore. And then it goes, who am I? Still hasn't got the answer.

And suddenly the attention, suddenly the sunlight stops in its doing and becomes a way of being. And then it becomes aware that it's not just out here, it's, there's an enormous depth to it. And it becomes aware that it's connected to the sun.

And that frees it from the usual state that is associated with the ego, which is fear. Suddenly fear goes, a deep trust in life arises because you feel yourself connected to something vast that is you and yet transcends who you are. And to sense that connectedness is frees you from anxiety and fear.

And that I would suggest is the true meaning of the spiritual word, faith. Faith is absence of fear. That's faith is a deep trust, not in yourself as a person, but something deeper that is you and yet transcends you.

That is the next step in human evolution is for humans to live their lives in connectedness with that dimension rather than on the egoic level. And then you manifest a different world. You manifest no longer this absurd level of suffering that humans have been inflicting on each other that can only be described as a severe collective mental dysfunction.

Only then could you explain how in the 20th century alone, the first half of the 20th century alone, humans have killed in the excess of a million of their fellow humans. That's completely insane. But even that seen from a transcendent viewpoint, even that is part of the evolution of consciousness.

The realization that that is insane is part of the evolution of consciousness. And every death, of course, of every, every violent death of every human is tragic on this level. But it is also true that in every human, every human is an expression of the one consciousness that is experiencing itself as a human.

And as such, the essence of every human is beyond death. Death is the end of this form, this brief lived form. And even if on another level, the form continues, you will eventually awaken.

Every form is destined to awaken to its connectedness to the one consciousness. In Buddhism, there's a lovely saying which says, eventually, even the blade of grass will become enlightened. In meaning, eventually, all life forms return to the source.

All life forms begin to realize their connectedness to the source. The source discovers itself, its own nature, through the realization of these, all these life forms. But to keep it on the practical level, for us, the essential thing is inviting into our life these moments of presence.

On the one hand, inviting them into our life. On the other hand, also recognizing when they arise spontaneously. Next time you look at a dog, you're not only aware of the dog and how good it feels, but you're also aware of that for a moment, thinking has subsided for two or three seconds.

When you look at a beautiful tree, or you look at the sky in the morning, open the curtains, look at the sky, no matter whether it's cloudy or blue, for a moment, be there as the aware presence for the sense perception. When you're waiting for something, observe how your mind is resisting that moment, let go of that. You remember what we talked about, all the stuff that the mind adds, that is unnecessary baggage, that creates unhappiness, come into the present moment, alignment with this, and be the presence.

Waiting at the supermarket, if the mind starts up with its complaining, realizing that you are creating unhappiness for yourself, the mind is creating unhappiness for yourself, now suddenly you have a choice. You don't need to be at the mercy of automatic thinking anymore. You step out of automatic thinking, take two or three deep breaths, become aware of your breath in and out, takes you into the present moment and realize this moment is actually okay.

It's even quite pleasant. And the mind had been telling you that it's awful. And in many cases, you'll come to the realization, this moment is actually not that bad, but the mind has been telling you that it is.

And less and less do you then add the unnecessary interpretations to the present moment that spoil your joy of life. And suddenly you experience much more joy and in the beingness of the present moment. And you go around and appreciate, appreciate more the little things that arise continuously around you that are actually profound and beautiful in their simple presence, a cloud, a leaf on a tree, a flower, how the light is reflected off the floor.

You can, everywhere there's an aliveness around you in other human beings. You can appreciate their aliveness. And then comes also a very powerfully transformational way of relating to the present moment, which is gratitude for what is.

Not gratitude, I wouldn't recommend gratitude through creating some mental story that other people are worse off than me, so I really should be happy. So you depend on the misery of others to make you feel better. No, a gratitude that is deeper that comes directly from recognizing the goodness of things without any commentary.

To appreciate what is, to appreciate that you're breathing, to appreciate a glass of water that you're drinking, to appreciate the shape of a piece of furniture, a fruit, anything you see. So I'll give you as a last spiritual practice that was given by, I believe also it was a Zen teacher. A disciple came to him and said, I'm going to travel now for a year.

Can you give me a spiritual practice to take with me on my journey so that I can become enlightened? And the teacher said, yeah, okay. This is your spiritual practice.

No matter where you are or what you're doing or what the situation is that you are in, say the following mantra. Thanks for everything. I have no complaint whatsoever.

So he sent off the disciple. The disciple came back after a year, came back to the master, and the master said, well, the disciple said, didn't work. I used it a lot, but it didn't work.

And then the master said, thanks for everything. I have no complaint whatsoever. And at that moment, the disciple became enlightened.

Thank you. So as you know, here we are mainly concerned with entering the realm of being, of presence. There hasn't been a lot for you to do, just little doings, walking from here to there, eating your food, some talking, some thinking, which is a doing.

But mostly this has been and still is about connecting with being, the dimension of stillness beyond thinking, out of which all thinking arises. Now, when you leave here, many of you, if not most of you, are going back into more doing again. So your challenge will be not to lose the rootedness in that deeper dimension while you are engaged in whatever you do.

And the world will do all it can to challenge you, to pull you out of that rootedness. And it will tell you, not in so many words, but it will, in the form of events and people and happenings and things not working, and so will tell you, this is all important. Give me your fullest attention.

This really matters. It may matter, but as I put it, all those things matter relatively. They may be relatively important.

Whether or not you miss your plane, whether you're not, you find that great job or you lose that great job, or whatever happens, it's all relatively important. But only one thing is of absolute importance, and that is your connectedness with being so that that dimension is with you, as you, in your daily life. That's the challenge.

A few things will be helpful in this. One is letting go of the unconscious assumption that there should be no problems and difficulties. And if they are, that they are undesirable obstacles that really shouldn't be there in the form of events or people or situations.

But if you look back on your life, and I look back on my life, it's always been challenging. There are brief moments when it's not challenging, and that's great, but you know very well that life won't leave you alone. It'll challenge you one way or another.

If you look at the world situation, it's the same. There's all kinds of challenges in the news. First there were the communists, there was a Cold War, and then there are suddenly other huge challenges arising, and it goes on and on.

So in the words of the first sentence in the book called The Road Less Traveled, which I never read because the first few sentences were so good I didn't need to read the rest of it. And the first sentence is, now this might go against certain new age beliefs, and it might at first sound negative because the first sentence is, life is difficult. That doesn't sound very inspiring.

And then the next sentence, although I don't remember, it literally says, and if you know that, you're completely okay with the fact that life is difficult, then it's no longer difficult. So that's all I read, because that says it all already. How does that work?

How is life, when you know that life is difficult, it's no longer difficult? You try to work that out. Well, here's the explanation.

It's really only difficult if you think that it shouldn't be difficult. Because then you're in continuous resistance to things and people and events. But once you accept it's an essential part of life of being difficult, then whenever the next difficulty rises, you say, oh, there's life again, being difficult.

In other words, what does that do? It creates an acceptance of what is. If you carry around the assumption in your head, it shouldn't be difficult.

There should be no difficult people and obstacles and problems, and things should not get canceled, and plans should not be interrupted, and nobody should fall ill, and then people shouldn't die, certainly. That's a travesty. These things should not, they're all dreadful.

There's an underlying assumption, things should go smoothly. And of course, sometimes they do go smoothly. But the irony or the paradox is that once you recognize the fact that life is difficult, that life is not meant to make you happy, it's not meant to make you unhappy, but it makes you unhappy if you have a wrong attitude towards life.

Happiness comes with accepting the fact that challenges are an essential part of the evolutionary process for all life forms. So challenges for you, even if you don't call them challenges, challenge is a nice term because something positive is already implied within it. If you call it problems or bad stuff happening, then it doesn't sound so good.

Challenges are here to awaken you. And even if you're awakening, life continues to give you challenges, and then the awakening accelerates and deepens. And at whatever stage you're at, you won't be free as long as you're here of challenges.

So if you recognize that, you no longer need to be in a hostile, confrontational relationship with life, I don't, sorry about the term, you're not pissed off all the time with another thing happening, I'm still pissed off with life. Just can't go on. And people just can't take anymore, just.

Then you can, there's a kind of accepting, not necessarily welcoming, but sometimes welcoming every situation that arises. That is. So if you welcome it, there's a book by Byron Katie called Loving What Is.

That means you are in an accepting relationship with whatever arises. Of course, it all arises in the present moment. Anything else that arises is in your mind.

So you need to differentiate between challenges, problems, difficulties that are actual in the form of people, events, or situations, and challenges, problems, and difficulties that are fictitious, that are purely created by your mind, creating pseudo problems. For example, when you worry in the middle of the night, huge problems. Are those the real challenges of life?

No, these are fictitious problems created in your mind, dwelling on things, things that happened but should not have happened. Those are not the real challenges of life. Those are the challenges of your mind, the mind-created problems.

So you need to very clearly differentiate in your life between actual difficulties, challenges, or problems. There is a person who is shouting at you. That's an actual.

Or there is the thing you just missed your flight and you can't get on the next one or the next one. Or financial challenges, relationship challenges, family situations, work situations, actual things that happen that need to deal with. But then there's a huge amount of suffering that is generated not by the actual challenges of life, but by the fictitious problems that the mind creates, sometimes around the actual challenges of life.

And sometimes out of, no, out of thin air, things that could go wrong. So on the one hand, you have your mind creating a lot of useful, useless suffering through unconscious thinking. And then you have the actual situations in your life.

So you don't have to endure your mind. When it says life is difficult, that shouldn't really include your mind because that's something you can do something about immediately. You don't have to live with a dysfunctional mind.

Millions still do. That is something that can be transcended. And this is, of course, what we are doing here, what you are doing as part of the awakening is a huge amount of the life is difficult.

A huge percentage of that difficulty is created by the mind. That we can deal with, that can change. That does not have to be.

Once, when you do that, then the next part is actual situations will still occur. Once you know that, then you can come to a more surrendered approach to life and actually almost, or actually welcome the difficult people in your life, the difficult situations in your life, loss, and so on, without demanding unconsciously, not in so many words, perhaps, that demanding this should not be happening and there's something dreadfully wrong when things go wrong in your life. And that makes life really difficult.

This is what the man means at the beginning of the book, the author, when he says, life is difficult, but when you know that life is difficult and you fully come to terms with the fact that life is difficult, it's not difficult anymore because the greatest difficulty is the mental resistance to things that arise and the underlying assumption that they should not. And so once you have then a surrendered relationship with the present moment, because everything arises in the present moment, then it's not really that difficult anymore. And you can, even in the midst of turmoil, still be connected with the realm of being within yourself.

So there's always a core of stillness, if only in the background. And no matter what happens, that core of stillness is there, if you want to call it stillness. It's also, as we saw, and as you know, it's also the source of satisfaction, where true satisfaction or a true sense of wellbeing that goes beyond physical wellbeing, a true sense of wellbeing comes from.

It's the transcendent dimension. So life will challenge you with its difficulties, both small and big. Small happen probably every day in some form.

So you don't get upset anymore when things don't go according to plan. You don't get upset and complain or irritated or angry when people don't behave the way they should behave. And that makes it so much easier when you no longer demand that these things should not be the way they are.

Nobody should, they shouldn't cancel flights. Weather shouldn't be in such a way they can't fly anymore. The body shouldn't get old.

Nobody should have catch an illness. Now, a lot of illnesses are produced, or you're much more prone to have an illness if your mind is very dysfunctional because that lowers the physical resistance. It affects the body.

What the mind does obviously affects the body. Even mainstream medicine is beginning to recognize your mental emotional state affects your physical state. So if your mental emotional state is very dysfunctional, your body's resistance to illness decreases.

The likelihood increases that you catch something. There are other causes of illness. So nobody can be totally free and say, I'm never going to be ill.

The body is a physical vehicle with a certain lifespan. And as it approaches the later stages of its lifespan, it's just like an old car. Things start to go wrong with it.

It's another form. And the older your car gets, the more things need to be replaced. And the time comes when it's just not working anymore.

So it will be easier for you to deal with the challenges of life. If you actually realize that the challenges aren't good, they force you to awaken. And that's what's happening here.

For a long time, challenges, the only thing that challenges do is they make people suffer. And that can go on for a long, long time. I sometimes say everybody has a spiritual teacher, everybody on the planet.

For most people, their spiritual teacher is their suffering. Because eventually the suffering brings about an awakening. And then there are a few who are advanced enough who already have gone through their suffering.

And then they come into contact with an actual spiritual teaching in the form of wisdom, tradition, or an actual spiritual teacher, or even in the form of a book. And they suddenly say, oh, wow, yes. And then evolution accelerates.

So for you, there's already this acceleration because otherwise the evolution of consciousness is very slow. Evolution works very slowly. And for many humans, it's still the case.

That's why we repeat the same mistakes, politicians and so on. Haven't they read any history books? Just go back 50 years and then you make the same mistake again, go back 40 years.

So condemned to repeat the past, this is part of karma. And then you reach that stage where an acceleration begins and you're all at that stage, which is wonderful. So whenever confronted with a challenge in whatever form, look at it.

Be careful that your mind does not weave a whole huge web of useless thinking around it. Then it gets really difficult. And realize most challenges are actually fairly simple.

Here's the situation or the person. I can either do something about it. What action is possible now?

And with that comes that clear looking. What action is needed now? There's that presence flows.

And presence can become, there can be a presence-inspired doing. Before there is a presence-inspired doing, you need to look at the situation. And when you look, look not necessarily just visually, but put your awareness on the situation.

And there is a time span where you are in order to access primordial intelligence, which is in the stillness. Whenever a situation arises, you look at the situation and in the looking, which means giving it attention, there is no thinking. There's just an alert looking.

Facing it. And then how long that is varies. It could be a few seconds.

It could be a minute. It could be two minutes. But often a few seconds of giving it alert attention is enough.

Then whatever is needed will come to you. There are several possible causes of action. And then one that's responding to a situation.

Or you look and you realize nothing can be done right now. And that's perfectly fine. And while nothing can be done, you accept what is and are still connected and sometimes more deeply connected in the face of even sometimes unpleasant circumstances, more deeply connected with a true source of satisfaction, which you can quickly access if you become friendly with what is.

Just becoming friendly with what is, and immediately it's easier to access the source of satisfaction and that which transcends the ego. The ego is sustained by continuous resistance, denial, it's against it. Whatever it is, I'm against it.

And it's usually it's the present moment with brief exceptions. So coming to accept the is-ness of people and situations and realizing this situation cannot be otherwise from the way it is. Why not?

It should be. No, it can't be because it already is. The entire universe, the entire history of the universe has brought about, because since everything is connected to everything else, anything that happens is connected to the totality.

So the totality of the universe, since the Big Bang has brought about this event. So that's what is, there's nothing you can do. Then you can do something and take action, yes.

But prior to taking action, there's an acceptance of the is-ness. Then there is an insight into what is possible. And then action, if it is possible, happens.

Or there is a realization that nothing is possible. Then surrender happens. And in that surrender, you are internally free of the situation.

So in that surrender or acceptance, you can sense the satisfaction arising, not because something is going well, because it may not be right now, but because you are connected with the source of all satisfaction, all life. And it feels it's fine. You may be trapped somewhere and it's fine.

So people, every human acts, speaks, in the way that corresponds to their state of consciousness at that moment. Sometimes you encounter humans. It's very common for humans to fluctuate between being relatively more conscious and quite unconscious.

So you might meet the same person that you know well, a family member, in two or three or more different modalities of consciousness, as you might know. And when you're having breakfast in the morning and the family member or your roommate is coming down the stairs, you never know who is coming down the stairs that morning. It could be a very cheerful and lovely person.

Isn't it great to be alive? And the next morning, it comes to a completely different entity down the stairs and starts complaining. And why didn't you do this?

You should have told me long ago. I've been thinking about that all night. It's just awful.

You always do that, don't you? Who is that? Well, that was the person that was light and cheerful yesterday morning.

And who knows who is coming down the next day? So with people who are fairly unconscious, they are subject to enormous fluctuations. And you also, to the extent that you could call them virtually certain different personalities emerging at different times.

So you're not dealing with one human being, people that I'm talking about, people who have not yet enough presence to bring about a more continuous state of identity. So you have all these people and then you might talk to one person and he says, okay, I'm now very clear in my mind what I want and I promise you those things that I did yesterday, two days ago, this will never happen again. I'm really become very clear now.

It's all sorted out in my mind. And this person is genuinely believing that he's at a relatively, relatively slightly higher state of consciousness. And a few days or weeks pass and then he or she does exactly the same thing as before or worse.

And then you say, he's dishonest. He lied to me, he said he wouldn't do that again. He betrayed my trust.

I trusted him. We had a long talk. I started to trust him again.

And then what did he do? Turned around and did the same thing and worse. Not realizing these are, because the person is relatively unconscious, different sub-personality take that person over, which are just mental patterns, mental emotional patterns that could be called sub-personalities.

They take over that person and then there's somebody else there virtually. And so it's not, if you draw certain conclusions that this person now can never be trusted again. No, that wasn't the same person.

It's several different people there. If you draw some conclusion and even make some universal conclusion, then you yourself become deluded. If you say, you see, now I know people can't be trusted.

They do lie all the time, don't they? So suddenly the one sub-personality becomes everybody. And well, it does apply to the majority of people still.

You need to remember the majority of people are often completely possessed by mental, emotional forms of conditioning. And sometimes certain forms of conditioning arise very strongly and take over that person. And then that subsides.

There's a little bit of, so perhaps occasionally a little bit of awareness there before the next wave of conditioning comes and takes that person over. Once you see that, it's easier also to be with people because whatever behavior a person manifests towards you is the same as whatever the present moment presents. It cannot be otherwise.

At this present moment, nobody can act beyond their state of consciousness at this moment, but you should be more conscious, more conscious? What are you talking about? You talk about consciousness?

Let me tell you what you did. Start arguing with an ego. You can never win.

So dealing with your mind, life is difficult, yes. People are difficult, yes. Situations are often difficult, yes.

But they are much less difficult if your mind does not amplify the problems that you encounter and the people that you encounter in your life. That already takes away a huge burden so that your mind no longer complains and has those patterns that deny what is and that weaves huge stories around people and events and about the past and about the future, the worry, the regret, the anxiety. These are all mental events that do not, these do not have to be part of the difficulty of life.

These can be transcended here and now. What then remains is the actual, and once you have tackled the problem-making dysfunction of your mind, and this is, of course, what we are all here, one of the reasons why we are here, and that is part of the spiritual awakening. Once you go beyond the problem-making dysfunction of the mind, it becomes so much easier to deal with the difficult things in life.

They are far less complex than the mind made them out to be. And there's always just looking, giving attention. Then you become intelligent.

You only become really intelligent when you can suspend for a moment the thinking function. So you rise above thought, and then you become alert, and then you look, and then you'll know what to do. And if the doing succeeds, it's fine.

If it doesn't, you look again. It's the art of living. So without the dysfunctional mind, things get easier.

The dysfunctional mind isn't there anymore when you accept the is-ness of the present moment. So the challenges come, they are external and internal. Your own mind is a big challenge, but you're already in the process of transcending that.

The other challenges remain, and that is good. Do not wait, however, for difficult situations to push you into presence. It's good if that happens, but choose presence even when you're not being challenged because that is vital.

Otherwise, life will, the universal intelligence that underlies all phenomena will see that, oh, this guy needs more problems because otherwise he goes to sleep all the time. Let's give him a few more. All life sees, oh, you're so, you're using, whenever you're waiting, you become present.

When you're in nature, you're present. You invite presence into your life. In the middle of the night, when worry starts, you suddenly realize this is not only futile, it's also destructive, and you surrender that kind of thinking and put your attention on your breathing instead or into your body.

Those are things where you voluntarily invite presence into your life. And then presence power, so to speak, presence power grows in you. Then as when a bigger situation happens, there's so much more presence to deal with it.

I've spent years of my life just dwelling in presence. You don't have to do that. I mean, you can be active at the same time.

There were years of my life where there was very little doing and I was just sometimes spending hours on my bicycle or walking in a park, just being. And sometimes I had this strange feeling that there's a reason why I have to do that. It's not doing it, just call it.

So it's like going very deep in order to go out and make a difference in this world. I had to go very deep within first, very deep, and then the going out became possible. How much difference you make in this world is always relative to how deep you go within yourself, how much presence you access within yourself, how connected you are with the essence of who you are, the essence of life.

That determines how much difference you really make in this life. And so you're all going to make and are already making an enormous difference. And the universe loves you.

Consciousness, the universe is consciousness, and consciousness wants to emerge more fully on this planet and on many other planets, I'm sure, because that is what underlies the evolution of the whole universe. So by having the awakening of consciousness and your presence practice as your main life goal, no matter what you do on the surface of your life, your job, your relationships, your main goal is in your relationships, in your work situation, in your home situation, your main goal is being present wherever you are and whatever you do. Then your life becomes empowered and you will do a lot of good without necessarily feeling that I am doing it.

It flows through you. And those of you who are still looking for something to do, the question often people ask me, what am I meant to do? Where am I meant to be?

Who am I meant to be with? And of course, the first answer is the foundation for it all to find out where you're meant to be, what you're meant to do, who you're meant to be with, the first answer is you're meant to be here, you're meant to be doing what you're doing right now, and you're meant to be with whoever you are with right now at this moment. That's foundation.

I'm not talking about for the rest of your life, but right now, so you come to a full acceptance of whatever is in the present moment. Now, most people who are trying to figure out what they're supposed to do in their lives, they don't give their fullest attention and they're not fully aligned with the present moment, where they are, who they are with, they are rejecting it in some way. And that obstructs the power and obstructs the arising of presence.

So you become accepting and comfortable with where you are right now. So you're meant to be here right now. That's why I'm meant to be here.

So that can become a foundation for realizing what you should do once you accept the isness of present moment, what the doing then arises out of that state of alignment with life, with this alignment with the present moment. Then you might get insights into what it is you want to do, or rather what the universe or the one consciousness wants to use you for. So you no longer look at what do I want from life, but what does life want from me?

How can I be of service to the one consciousness, you could say. And if then it begins to flow through you, and it could be, it might start flowing through you in exactly the same doing that you already been doing, but now you're doing it fully presently. Let's say you're an aspiring actress, but in the meantime, you're working at a fast food restaurant.

So can you be fully accepting of where you are right now without losing your goal, but giving your fullest loving attention to whatever you're doing right now? Even if it seems repetitive, you give it your loving attention. And it is often the case when you are completely aligned and completely accept what is, things begin to change.

When you are in non-acceptance internally, you're stuck. Can also happen that once you accept the present moment completely, you realize this is not, I cannot be here any longer, and you just walk out. That can happen too.

But it would not be a confrontational thing. It's a very peaceful realization, what it is that you need to do. So honor whatever it is you're doing at this moment.

And I sometimes admire in some restaurants, you have waiters or waitresses who are wonderfully present. It doesn't necessarily mean the most expensive restaurant. In fact, the most expensive often, they are just snobbish and they don't, but in some, even in simple restaurants, some are just, when they put a glass down, they're present.

It's done with care and attention. And when they ask what you want, they're present. So anywhere you can practice presence and you can affect people no matter where you are, because you will come into contact with some people.

And presence is contagious, as Tammy just told us. In a good way, presence is contagious. Whoever you come into contact with will be affected by your presence.

And then you will attract almost miraculously the right people or the right situations into your life that then will bring about a change. So by being present, you are connected to the totality and you attract people and situations into your life that are helpful. And then once you realize, oh, this is what I want to do, the doing, the insight comes, or it could be just a continuation of what you're doing already, but now you're doing it in an empowered way.

Might be totally different too. Once you realize and you take more action, empowered by presence, then you find many helpful factors suddenly appearing. The moment you're aligned with the arising consciousness and your main goal is presence, sustaining presence, no matter where you are and what you're doing, then your actions become empowered by that one consciousness.

New ideas come, events, helpful things happen. It does not mean that obstacles do not happen. In fact, obstacles often do happen, but an obstacle, and this is vital, and you need to be very alert within yourself.

When an obstacle arises in the form of something not working out, in the form of a person who wants to block you, sabotage you, whatever it is, an obstacle, or difficult bureaucrats, government departments who don't want you to do whatever you want, many forms of obstacles, and an obstacle arises and you become negative and angry, irritated, upset. That means you've lost the power. You've lost presence.

It's no longer flowing through you. The ego has come in. So how you deal with obstacles in your chosen course of action determines whether there's a continuing power flowing through you or whether the ego has taken its place.

So an obstacle is never fought against. You either walk around it, so to speak, or you transform it by bringing a positive energy to it. So you don't make people who seem to be blocking you into enemies.

So you don't, you transform the seeming obstacle. Often it can be transformed into actually a helpful presence, because your state of consciousness determines the further development of that situation. The situation arises, what happens after the situation has arisen is determined by the state of consciousness in which you receive or respond to that situation.

So a difficult person, if you react egoically against a difficult person, then that person will become even more difficult. And in the process, you, your consciousness goes down, down. You become, and you may well end up at the same level of consciousness as that difficult person.

That happens by the moment you both shout at each other. And this has happened to spiritual people. They lost it.

It's okay. You have to lose it, and then you regain it, and then you lose it again, and then you regain it. So if you find yourself in a shouting argument with somebody, obviously you lost it.

And if you beat yourself up for being in a shouting argument with somebody, you lost it again. And then you say, okay, I lost it again. Am I going to beat myself up again for losing it the second time when I beat myself up?

No. So you become accepting also of your own shortcomings and start again. But it's so vital, any situation that comes, your attitude, your consciousness towards the situation determines how it develops further.

Whether it's a human being or a more complex situation at work or relation, in relationship, so there's an active part in you that determines what happens. In that sense, we could say that the universe, reality, so-called, tends to reflect back to you your state of consciousness. And some people create enormous drama out of very little, a tiny little thing, and their reaction, the egoic reaction, is so huge that the tiny little thing gets blown up out of all proportion.

And then they even convince others that this is a huge drama. One of my shortcomings is that I cannot respond to all the mail I get or read all the manuscripts and books people send. And I would need a staff of several full-time people just to respond to letters.

And if they're responding to letters, they will get more letters back and it would proliferate. I read some, and it's wonderful to read. Often it's a beautiful message, what we have been helped.

Some people, however, their ego may be quite strong. They expect an answer. They don't realize how many people write in.

When my power of now was published, somebody said to me, you should send it to a famous person, and that famous person could write an endorsement, and then the book will reach many more people. So I sent it to Deepak Chopra and Wayne Dyer.

Somebody said to me, you should send it to a famous person and that famous person could write a endorsement and then the book will reach many more people. So I sent it to Deepak Chopra and Wayne Dyer and never heard from them. And I thought, okay, well, they may not have read it or they read it and didn't like it.

I didn't fully realize, I didn't have great expectations, didn't realize they can't read, but they get hundreds of books every month. How can they read my book? I didn't know that, but I didn't have an ego reaction about it.

Later, Deepak Chopra, of course, did read the poem now and wrote a lovely endorsement when I didn't need it anymore. But there are some people who got so angry with me because I didn't respond to their letters that it became gigantic drama. There was letters coming one after another, how dare you ignore me, gigantic drama.

I became the worst person on the planet to them. And this is just a little example of the same relatively insignificant thing can proliferate and grow into some huge tumor in consciousness. So it's a, you're actually, the development of your life and what situations you encounter is related to your state of consciousness.

And as your state of consciousness changes, the way in which you experience the world, in other words, people, events, situations, changes. That's, it doesn't mean it won't be challenging anymore, but the challenges will be of a different kind and dealing with them will become so much easier. And occasionally when a big one comes, that means you're meant to go even deeper into presence.

It's all, there's a, it all works beautifully once you see, because when you, many people, they look at the surface of life and it looks like it's all random events happening and it's all totally chaotic and meaningless and I don't understand any of it. There is an intelligence behind it, but when you only look at the surface of surface reality, you don't necessarily see it. You have a very limited view.

So it's up to you to be aligned with that real intelligence that's behind the entire world that creates form and lives in and through form and yet also exists in a timeless, formless dimension that we couldn't, cannot possibly conceive of. As you know, the universal belief, even now still held by mainstream science is that the universe is a random accidental event that is still the main belief of mainstream science. Every, all life is accidental.

There's no intelligence behind it and you are an accident, somehow happened. And the greatest mystery of the universe, which is not the atomic realm or the galaxies, is the greatest mystery of the universe science has hardly approached and doesn't know anything about. The greatest mystery of the universe is the fact that the universe is conscious and what consciousness is, science doesn't know and some scientists even deny that there is such a thing as consciousness.

What do they say about this? Must be the chemical soup in the brain is having a kind of illusion. But the only thing that you cannot doubt is that you are conscious, even if everything else is a dream, which it could be and in a way it is.

But the fact is the dream is appearing in the light of consciousness without which there would be no dream. So I am conscious and of course science tells you that consciousness is an epiphenomenon, another word for it would be by-product of the brain, of the material brain. So that consciousness, if they even use the word, is produced by something that happens in the material brain and there is certainly a correlation between your consciousness and your physical brain.

It would be absurd to deny the correlation between consciousness and your physical brain. One could easily prove it because if a brick falls on my head now, I won't be conscious anymore. Now, does that prove that the consciousness is produced by my brain?

Not necessarily. It could well be that my brain is a kind of transformer or transmitter of universal consciousness in the same way that a radio or TV picks up signal, transmits it and gives it a certain form. So when you destroy the television set or the radio, nothing significant is destroyed because the radio was never the producer of that radio program.

It was only created to bring those frequencies into this dimension and create a particular kind of world here that is created by consciousness that is permeated by consciousness. So where science is going, whether they will eventually realize, I believe they will, that consciousness is not confined to the human brain. They will see that there is a consciousness in the flower.

There's a consciousness, even in so-called, a tiny, tiny glimmer of consciousness, even in a stone. And so, in other words, the material world, we could use the analogy and say the material world, the world of hard matter is a bit like frozen consciousness in the same way that water can exist in different states. You can have frozen water, you can have liquid water, you can have water as vapor in the air or mist.

So you can, consciousness can manifest and does manifest as the physical universe. It can manifest as the human mind and thought, and it can manifest as presence. So you have the ice, you have the liquid, and you have the immaterial vapor or mist.

It's all water and it's all consciousness. In that, so there is only consciousness. That's just the one behind the many.

Everything is consciousness. The essence of who you are is consciousness. And then the mind says, so what is consciousness?

You can't say what it is because it's everything. So it's, if you said God, yes. And now as a final insight, my mystical insight, this consciousness emanates from a source that does not exist in space or time.

That is the, what Buddha calls the unmanifested, the unborn, the uncreated. That is truly what, if God has any meaning, it is that. You cannot conceive of it.

You cannot talk about it. You cannot name it. It's the, it's that which precedes the Big Bang.

What was there before the Big Bang? Nothing. Okay, so the whole universe came out of nothing?

Yeah. Okay, that's strange. That nothing, that no thing is God.

And then God appears as the world and begins to dream the dream of the world. And after God has dreamt the dream of the world, the dream gets a bit difficult. And all the entities in the dream, the cells in the universal consciousness believe themselves to be independent entities.

And then the dream becomes a nightmare. And then God begins to wake up. That was the plan all along.

And even as God begins to wake up, God continues to create, but at the same time realizes he is her own source. I'm trying to explain to you the entire universe, which is totally impossible, but it's a little hint. It's a bit like that.

That's all one can say. It's a bit like that. But you contain the entire universe and the secret of the entire universe is within you.

You just have to look within. If you want to know about what about the universe, well, look within. You are a microcosm of the macrocosm as the ancient dictum, as above, so below.

God is in you as you. Consciousness is the light emanated by God. Now, in the same way that the sun emanates light, is light different from the sun or is light connect part of the sun?

It's always part of the sun. It's not disconnected from the sun. It still is the sun.

So in that sense, each one of you, me, is a ray of that one consciousness, like a ray of sunlight. And then the ray goes out and creates a world and looks around. And then the ray doesn't realize it's part of the sun and thinks it's an independent entity that makes it really interesting, the dream.

Otherwise the dream wouldn't be that interesting. And then the universal dream starts.

[Speaker 9] (13:56 - 13:57)

Wow.

[Speaker 1] (13:57 - 22:24)

And then it gets difficult and dangerous. And then at some point, this ray of sunlight of consciousness begins to remember its origin, not only origin, but actually the source out of which it continuously emanates. Oh, oh, it's not that bad after all.

It's actually... And then it continues to exist in this world and create even in this world. But at the same time, it's conscious of the source.

That means a totally different world is created. That's the new us on our planet. When humans are aware of their connectedness to the source, what they then do and their activities and what they produce as the world is very different from the world that is created by humans who are not aware of their source.

In other words, egoic entities. And this is what's happening now. It's not that the dream of form is coming to an end, but there is a significant metamorphosis happening.

The dream is turning into a very different dream where humans, as humans become more aware of their connectedness to source, creation will become much easier. Time will come when humans can create by using thought only. Then you don't need factories anymore.

You can create through thought. But that cannot happen until humans are connected, aware of their source. Because if they had the power to create, to some extent, this already happens, but if they had the true full power to create through thought, they could create havoc.

Imagine an ego being able to create whatever it wanted just by thinking about it. But thought is potentially the creative tool. It's already operating now, but it's used unconsciously and often creating not very pleasant experiences.

So thought eventually can be used, but we don't need to go there. That happens by itself. For us, it is vital to live in connectedness with source.

And then that's called lucid, as I said the other day, lucid dreaming, lucid living. And so you become aware of the dreamlike nature of existence and you actually enjoy that. And you create a more pleasant dream for yourself and for others.

So that was the secret of the universe. I left it for the last session. So now you go off little rays of consciousness, reaching different parts of Australia and the rest of the world.

Don't you forget to wrap up warm and if you live in the central or Eastern parts of North America, it's very cold there at the moment, but that's okay, can enjoy that. So we've had a wonderful retreat. I'm grateful for being here with us in presence.

You know what your mission is. But don't become missionaries. Don't try to convince anybody of anything.

Just presence is enough. I'd like to thank our wonderful team to knowing such great work. Other people also here at our resort.

They've been very helpful. And let's, I'd like to ask Kim also to come and join me here to say goodbye to you. Can you jump up?

Yes. Okay. Okay.

I'll be back. Everybody seems awake, both in the original sense and in the spiritual sense. Awake spiritually means, of course, not to be identified with a stream of thinking, but have some sense of presence.

This is an evening of questions, maybe answers. Or I might quote the Dalai Lama in one of my answers. And one of his favorite answers is, I don't know.

And of course, you remember the importance of not knowing from our previous session. We're not waiting for the microphone to be adjusted. We're just present.

Thank you. I feel very blessed and grateful. And I have been all my life.

My question is around acceptance and responsibility. And the difference. We're talking about consciousness and our consciousness and the whole consciousness.

But there's some horrific things happening in the world. And recently, I heard of canned lion hunting as an example. And there are 162 cities marching against this horrible thing.

And so I lead Auckland. But what I found was there were as many egos in the camp of the animal lovers as in the hunters. And they were both threatening to kill each other.

And let's shoot the hunters for killing the lions. And I became quite depressed. I felt very alone.

I felt that I was being swallowed up by, I'm not sure what it felt like, but I knew I had to get out. And I wanted to be, I guess, in the light. And part of me feels guilty for this because I know there are people that go through an enormous amount of suffering and they're still there for other people.

So I guess my question is, where's the line between, what are we responsible for? And I know that seems an enormous question. But I'd really appreciate your wisdom.

Thank you.

Thank you. Well, the foundation for everything that you do is the state of consciousness out of which the doing comes. So that's what ultimately you're responsible for, which is a foundation.

That's your state of consciousness. That implies there's already enough presence in you that you are able to, if not continuously, at least for part of the time, to take responsibility for your state of consciousness, to do things with presence, to speak with presence, to interact with other humans with presence and always realizing the main thing in this situation, no matter what I am dealing with or who I'm talking to or what this is all about, the main thing is for me to do it being present. And then, of course, you will find that many other humans are not present, but you can't just take responsibility for them if they're not present.

All you can do is to emanate presence, to be the voice of sanity, sometimes in a room full of people who are still trapped in egoic reaction. And as you say, sometimes or quite often, people who actually are very earnest and sincerely want to bring about a better world and to fight all those many manifestations of unconsciousness and suffering that humans inflict on other humans and other life forms on the planet and the planet itself. Many of those humans don't realize that their state of consciousness is extremely important.

So they create enemies and generate a lot of dysfunction in that way. The very thing often that you are fighting against, you can easily turn into. So there are so many causes in this world that seem worthy to be pursued, and everybody has to look, see for themselves what it is in the larger world out there, what it is that they feel passionately about.

You have a huge choice because there's so much unconsciousness still happening in this world, manifesting as violence and so on, exploitation. Once you have chosen an area where you want to be active, you need to realize that simultaneously you need to be working on the causal level and whatever else that you are fighting for, if it's working for hopefully not fighting, is a level of effect. These are all effects of human unconsciousness.

You cannot just tackle the effect of human unconsciousness because it's a never-ending battle. And if you only tackle the effects of unconsciousness, then there is a great danger that you yourself, after a while, will become unconscious, not knowing it and still thinking you're doing the right thing. So this could happen when you see people inflicting suffering on animals.

This can generate so much anger in other humans who have a greater sensitivity for the suffering of animals than other humans have who inflict the suffering on animals. But those humans, they can suddenly become so, or gradually become so angry that they actually, as you said, talk about killing the people who kill the animals. Then everything becomes completely distorted.

A very powerful way of changing things, well, first, foundation is your state of consciousness. Then rather than making certain people or groups of people into enemies and pronouncing them as evil, it's a very powerful way of helping to bringing about a change on the external level is simply to show what happens, to show people what these people do. You don't even need to talk against it.

You can just show this is what happens. We have photography, we have all those things, and explain what humans do to the environment or whatever it may be, what humans do to other humans. And the most powerful movies, for example, against war, because people try to, make movies that are didactic, that show, that are preaching against war.

This is unnecessary. All you have to do is show the reality of warfare and the greatest movies that have been made to show people what war is and not what it seems to be when you, politicians talk about it and the media talks about it. And traditionally, it's been talked as this great endeavor, heroic endeavor of our nation defeating the evil enemies and the others say exactly the same thing.

And so then people have written some novels or have made movies to simply show the reality behind those words. And those have been the most powerful anti-war novels and movies. All you need to show to people the reality of what happens.

And that often brings about a shift in the general consciousness of the planet. There are already, I know there's still reason to despair, you might think, but there have been significant advances. If you do look back a few hundred years ago, for example, we are still in quite a few places, torture is still practiced, but there are now, sometimes we regress again towards that, one or two countries temporarily regress.

But a few hundred years ago, torture was accepted by everybody. It was totally normal. Every country did it, every kingdom did it.

There is greater sensitivity now in many humans towards nature, towards animal, towards treating other humans with compassion. So there is a shift in consciousness happening, but the moment you go into areas of unconsciousness, you don't see that anymore, because if you want to tackle unconsciousness, you go into those areas where obviously those things still happen. So the practical advice is trust us, choose where you want to get in, become engaged.

If you feel there's so much going on in this world and I want to help somewhere, so that which is closest to your heart, go there, choose a group that is relatively, there are usually probably several groups working in that direction, talk to them, visit them, choose the one that seems the most conscious. None of them may be really conscious, but the one where there's least violence and anger, and then you make your contribution there. Don't demand that these people should be more conscious, but you can be the voice of reason or rather the voice of presence, the voice of sanity when you interact with the people in your group.

And don't be too attached to the results. So you can be active also with peace in your heart. If you cannot be active with peace in your heart, peaceful warrior is the term, then you will lose yourself.

And it's happened so many times that when you fight the devil you can easily turn into the very thing you're fighting. And I'm only using it metaphorically. So at the moment, are you active in anything?

[Speaker 4] (34:19 - 34:34)

No, I withdrew. I found it was, I was being swallowed up and I don't feel I'm strong enough to stay in the unconscious.

Yes, yes, yeah. It's also possible that you can create your own vehicle in whatever area it is closest to your heart. So you create your own vehicle for initiating external change.

And then you can very carefully attract people to you who resonate with your aims, not only with your external aims, but also with your inner aims, which are primary. So people will realize that it is of primary importance to stay present as you pursue your goals, not only to tackle the effects of unconsciousness, but the cause of unconsciousness. And the only place where you can really deal with the cause of unconsciousness is in yourself.

So maybe you can set up something rather than going into already existing structures, because quite often the already existing structures are a reflection of the state of consciousness of the people in there. And sometimes there's not much you can do. It's a sad fact that even in churches and places of healing, there's an enormous amount of infighting.

And the reason being that these people do not have enough self-awareness. A supreme example, of course, is the rise of communism, which was based on good intentions because they wanted to create a more, they saw all the evils in capitalistic capitalism and capitalist society, the exploitation of workers and so on. And they felt we need to do something about these injustices and the absurd exploitation of humans, millions of humans.

And so communism came into being, which sounded like a wonderful idea. In fact, for quite a long time, many intelligent people in Western countries were in sympathy with Soviet communism. They hadn't realized yet which way it was going.

And much later, we began to realize that it had become quite an insane system, because the people who wanted to bring about, wanted to create a better world had overlooked the one primary thing that is needed if you want to create a better world, which is your own state of consciousness. So as soon as these people assumed power, their latent egos suddenly got inflated to an absurd degree. And the mechanism is, of course, beautifully described in a satirical novel by, I believe it's Orwell, "'Animal Farm' is basically a description of what happened in the communist system."

And this just, and those, that book has made a very important contribution to bringing about the end of communism, because it has to start first in people's minds. Another writer, a less well-known novel about the insanity of Soviet communism is called, "'Darkness at Noon' by Arthur Koestner." Also very depressing to read, but if you see it, you can only say, oh my God, how can people be so unconscious?

So communism failed because it had neglected the primary dimension. At some point, there will be, of course, a society arising on this planet where there is more equality and so on, but it will arise out of a changed state of consciousness, not through violence. So focus on that.

Where do you want to put the focus of your peaceful attention? And then see if you yourself can create some kind of structure, foundation, whatever it may be, that, and then draw, see if you can, and you will, if you remain present, you state your intention verbally or just in your mind, stay present. Then you put out a few feelers.

You contact certain, whatever it is, media, whatever, but you will then draw to you people who resonate with your state of consciousness. And if one or two should come to you who you realize do not resonate, then you would ask them, say, there is another place that's more suitable for you. So it's, and these people working here, then once you have a group like that, the group will have two aims.

One of the aims of the group is to initiate the external change, whatever the focus of their attention is. The other aim of the group is to become more conscious as a group. So you would have, not all the meetings that you have would be about what to do about these evils out there.

You would have also regular meetings about how do we interact with each other? What are the problems that arise as we interact? Those things need to be dealt with.

What is our aim? You would sit together in silence and before each meeting, sit together in silence for a while. At the end of each meeting, sit together in silence for a while.

So you remain connected to the source. And then you would be working on both levels, the causal level and the level of effect simultaneously. And then you will see there will be powerful results.

My main function in this world is to work almost exclusively on the level of cause, which is the shift in human consciousness. There are many things that I would love to work for also in this world to help, but my attention is on that. I know that the universe has put me here to fulfill that particular function.

And that spreads out into the world and eventually, of course, it brings about an external change also.

[Speaker 4] (42:12 - 42:28)

Thank you, Eckhart. I just wanted to say as I'm going, I'm a sculptor and I bring your work into my sculpting. And one of, I write these rules for my sculpting.

And one of them is, all I have to do is get the hell out of the way.

[Speaker 1] (42:30 - 53:10)

It comes through. Thank you very much. Thank you, that's good advice.

Also getting out of the way when you do things. Just not be there as an eagle that wants to affirm your form identity, be right and prove others wrong. Get out of the way.

Some of them, there are some very successful people, even in some business, a few, who function with little or no ego while they perform their function. And that is rare, but it exists. Whether they still relate without ego in their personal life, I don't know.

But there are some that I have observed in their professional life. There are also some doctors and so on. There are nurses, certainly, many do wonderful, wonderful work.

They humanize the hospitals that to a large extent otherwise would be inhuman places full of technology and nervous people. So that is a wonderful thing to see, that you can bring that energy in. When you listen to the news, you may get a somewhat distorted perspective of what's happening in the world.

Because when you listen to the news, you will get the impression this is terrible and it's getting worse and worse and worse. It's not really quite like that because it's always been bad. Look at the first half of the 20th century.

What could be worse than that? Very little. The dreadful insanity of two world wars, the concentration camps, labor camps, awful insanity.

If you doubt that there's a serious dysfunction in the human mind, then you just read about 20th century history. Or if you like, go back a little bit further, other centuries. So when you listen to the news, what the news focuses on is those areas of the world where unconsciousness is rampant.

And those are the areas where violence happens and violence happens continuously. So these are pockets of unconsciousness, which does not mean that every inhabitant in those pockets of unconsciousness is unconscious. Within the pockets of unconsciousness where continuous violence happens, there may be individuals who are highly conscious.

So many things, for example, that happened in Afghanistan, you would say, well, this, they seem to be maybe 1,000 years behind the development. Their collective attitudes often seem to be comparable to what Europe was like in the year 1100 or 1200. Their religion seems to be very comparable to what Christianity was like in the Middle Ages.

And yet there are certain individuals there who are highly conscious, who are more conscious than the average Westerner, far more. So also human thoughts are little, every thought is a little energy formation. It's an, we could almost regard thought as a little entity.

It's an energy field in the mind. So when humans create thoughts, the thought then spreads through words and energy. The thought spreads to others.

These days it spreads easily through the internet, much more easily than before. So you put out one thought and that thought may be a deluded, egoic thought. One person puts it out.

Then thousands of people who see that, who are not very conscious, they take in the deluded thought. It goes into their minds. And this operates very much like a virus.

A thought can take over a human in the same way that a virus can take over the physical body and proliferate and grow. So there are, as I see it, there are viral infections of the collective human mind. And they sometimes move from place to place.

They affect certain areas for a certain period of time. They can affect a religion. They can affect a political system, a tribe.

So the, and then these people get taken over by these thoughts that occupy, almost obliterate all other thoughts in their mind. And they're totally possessed by this basically viral infection of thoughts. So this happened a lot in Nazi Germany, Soviet communism, China under Mao Zedong.

Everybody got totally, their minds got, not everybody, but 95% of people, their minds got taken over completely as if a virus had invaded the collective mind. And then after a while, years pass or a few decades pass and then a little bit of sanity comes back, not more relative to what was before, big sanity, not yet a spiritual awakening perhaps. So often, so what we see in the news is where the thought virus has infected groups of people who are now generating continuous violence.

I don't need to mention, we all know. And then we get the impression that all that is happening on the planet is this absolutely insane violence. Only heard today on the news that the, again, somebody bombed a school in Nigeria or something like that, and 50 or 60 schoolchildren died.

That is totally, totally insane. But these things you hear in the news, you don't hear that there are many other parts of the planet where you must live relatively peacefully. There's nothing happening.

Or that there's a group of people in Kulam who are awakening spiritually and that this is going to make an enormous difference to the planet when they all, when they leave here and go into their different, where they live, the different parts of the world. That won't be on the news tonight. Or that people went to work peacefully, went home peacefully, millions of people in many parts of the world.

So there's a lot of good things happening that are not reported before. Some reason the media has been conditioned or they've conditioned themselves in such a way that they focus on what is negative. One reason being that humans love because there's a pain body in humans that resonates with that.

And many of the media know that they just need to stimulate anger in their viewers or readers, and then they will get more viewers and readers because the human pain body resonates with that. So you get headlines that say, you bastards. And then everybody wants, what's this about?

And then what you get is they're not reporting facts. Every fact that they write about is written about through the emotion of anger that they want to generate in the reader. And people who are unconscious don't realize it.

They think they're reading some facts. What you're reading is you're taking in, again, a kind of virus or bacteria on the mental level, you're taking that into your mind. And something in humans, in unconscious humans, likes that.

And that is connected with the pain body, the dormant pain body that humans carry. So part of the media feeds the collective pain body and they can be quite successful. There are certain television stations like that.

I don't know about Australia, but in the States, there are big newspapers in England that love feeding that. They're very good at it, have been good at it for a long time. And often it's the biggest newspapers that are those that generate negative emotion.

Their main reason for being is not to inform people, but to make them angry. It's amazing. So when you watch the news, be careful so that you don't get drawn into that reactivity.

Just what you're watching is the effects of human unconsciousness. In many cases, you're watching the virus infection of the human mind, and it's been going on for a long time. The only way it can change is through your change in consciousness, because that spreads to others.

Three things. First of all, an expression of gratitude from myself and from my brother, who is currently in transit from overseas, but the way that you have distilled and articulated your information into your teachings over the years has proven very, very life-changing for us. So gratitude from both of us.

Thank you. The second was an observation after our session with Kim this afternoon. There was a lady who asked about the connection between the source and the energies of yin and yang.

So I just wanted to offer as an observation or a visualization that I had to see if it would be useful to other people that it struck me when you were talking about the analogy of the sky and the clouds as thought clouds the other day. That's an analogy that I've used with my clients as well. And when Kim was speaking this afternoon, it came to me an image of the source being like outer space of nothingness, just empty space.

And then the energies of yin and yang, even though they may not be visible, they're still very real, like light sources or light particles or sound waves moving through space. So for that lady who asked that question or for anybody else who might find that useful, I hope that that does create an image that can be useful for you. Thirdly, a question for you regarding dealing with unconscious people and whether you yourself, maybe more so earlier in your life, whether you have felt lonely or isolated or frustrated in dealing with unconscious people and what your approach was to that at different stages of your life.

Right, yes. Thank you. Well, that perhaps is the main challenge for everybody because it is people mostly to who we get challenged by.

Other sources of challenge are, of course, your physical body could present a challenge. There can be financial challenges. But most, a large part of challenges come through humans because humans are difficult.

Many humans are still very much trapped in ego. First part of your question, there was, I was relatively isolated for many years of my life when after the shift in consciousness, I carried on with my normal life. It had a certain momentum.

I was still in the academic world. And then three, four years later, I had to go out of that, leave it behind completely. And then many years happened when I was not related to the world through any of the usual channels.

I had no particular job. No relationships, no close relationships. And I spent many, many days, weeks, months not seeing that many people.

And gradually people would come to me for advice that happened gradually, slowly grew through word of mouth. And then I had that kind of relationship with humans. But throughout, there's always challenges.

Even if you live in relative isolation, you will come into contact with humans that are unconscious. So I think the, you need to welcome that because it's that, it's all these, those challenges force you to become more present. You remember, I talked about the other day, if you want to make the body stronger, you do exercise, you do physical exercise.

And what is physical exercise? It's making life difficult for the body. That's a new way of looking at it.

But if you look at it closely, you'll see it is true because the body suddenly has to make an enormous effort. You're forcing the body. You're giving the body challenges that were not there before.

Lift a heavy weight, run a mile or whatever it is you're doing. And so then through being challenged beyond its comfort zone, the body gets stronger. And in the case of spiritual growth, we need all those unconscious humans to challenge us.

Otherwise, the presence would not intensify and arise. So the first thing we need to do, and I learned that also, to regard these unconscious humans as blessings. So rather than believing you shouldn't be here making my life difficult, you shouldn't regard the unconscious human as a necessary part of being here on this planet at this time.

And so you can welcome them when they make life difficult for you. The important thing is, though, that the unconscious humans do not pull you into unconsciousness yourself. That is the challenge, the biggest challenge.

And what I mentioned in the previous session also applies here. When you are being challenged by situations or people up to a certain point of human development, the moment a situation gets challenging or you meet a challenging person, you become reactive and become more unconscious than you were before you were challenged. So you meet an angry person, you get angry yourself.

You meet a confrontational person and you become even more confrontational, you're fighting. Then a certain thing happens where you reach that level where beyond which the challenges make you more conscious. I think most of the people here will have reached the level where, you may occasionally be pulled back, yes, but may have reached the level where from now on, when challenges come into your life through situations or people, you become more present rather than be pulled into unconscious reaction.

And that's your spiritual practice. That can be your main spiritual practice. So if you realize relationships are your spiritual practice, whether they are short relationships or at work or family relationships, if you can shift the way you look at relationships and then regard relationships as spiritual practice, it's much easier to deal with unconscious humans.

And then the challenge is to stay present while they are being unconscious with you. I learned that early on when, after my shift in consciousness, my father's second wife was quite unconscious and then not only unconscious, she developed a mental illness, but the unconsciousness was already, the mental illness was already hidden in the unconsciousness. The mental illness she developed was acute paranoia and she was in a mental home for a while then came back home.

Whenever I visited them once or twice, as I mentioned before, I stayed in hotels, but many times I went there, visit, stayed with them. And I realized the moment I saw her, I would become intensely present. I would just go.

And then she would start talking to me. Usually the stories would start with talking about her enemies, the people who were waiting down in the street and would follow her, people she would see in shops. And according to those stories, there must be at least one or 200 people whose main occupation is to follow her and make her life difficult.

But that was the story. So I had to listen. The moment I arrived, she would tell me the latest events of what happened to all these people who were following her and doing things to sabotage her life, all fictitious.

And immediately I went into very intense presence. And by the second day, the stories would subside a little bit. And by the third day, she wouldn't talk that much.

And once or twice it happened that I was not acutely present when she was talking. And immediately the old stories would come back up. She would even look at me suspiciously and say, what do you, why are you really here?

What do you want from me? So I noticed there was a, my consciousness had an effect on her state of consciousness. So that was particularly noticeable in that case.

And she became more sane while I was there. And the moment I left, she went back into complete unconsciousness. And many times this has happened to me.

I describe even one or two instances in New Earth or Power of Now, when, for example, that my neighbor came to me in the middle of the night. And she said, she also had some paranoia. She said, these people want to, these are evil people who want to take over my place.

And so you must help me. We need to stand together, imaginary enemies. And I felt this shift into intense presence.

And after a few minutes, she stopped talking. And just, you may remember reading, she said, when she looked at all her papers, this isn't important at all, is it? And I said, no.

And then she left. So practice with humans. If you know what presence is, and if you can get some sense of what I'm talking about, within yourself at this very moment, when I speak of intensification of presence.

Intensification of presence will usually involve the entire body. And you will feel the intensification of presence in every cell of your body when it becomes very intense. And that energy field is not just in the body.

It's all around. It's almost as if presence were filling the space when it becomes very intense. And it's a beautiful, wonderful state to be in.

And it comes when it's needed. You cannot bring it about. It also comes sometimes when one talks about it.

It certainly comes in a setting like this when many people come together with this common endeavor. So the main, well, it's not a weapon, it's the wrong word, but the main tool dealing with unconscious people is the intensification of presence in you, which will result in a lack of reactivity to their unconsciousness so that you can respond to what they say or do and not react against them. And that is an art form and that you can only practice that art form of responding to an unconscious human instead of reacting against an unconscious human.

You can only practice that art form when you are present, intensely present. There are also degrees of unconsciousness in humans. Some are deeply unconscious.

Some have, many humans, you might found family members and so on, they temporarily get taken over by waves of unconsciousness. When sometimes when certain situations happen, suddenly that human being gets completely unconscious. And you can, it often involves the pain body.

So it gets taken over by ego, pain body, and you don't hardly recognize them. This often is a discovery made by people when they start like partners, they love each other. Then the next step is either they get married or before they get married, they move in together.

And that's, it's only then usually that when humans live together or work together, that you notice that periodically, many humans are completely, get completely taken over by some area in their life of unconsciousness. And that's a terrible discovery that people make when they start living together or getting married, because after a few weeks, you will discover another aspect of your partner that wasn't there before. You didn't know it was there and you go, oh dear.

Did I make a big mistake here? And the same thing might happen the other way around. So where, in what areas is it most difficult for you to deal with that?

Is it in your family situations or close relationships or at work, where's the main difficulty?

Predominantly with clients in a healthcare setting and some family members as well, although I've learned to deal with them over time, but particularly with clients who require a response from you and trying to shape that response in a conscious way can sometimes be very difficult.

What do you work, what work do you do?

Physical therapy, physio.

Physiotherapy. Yeah. Yeah, yeah.

Can you give just one example of what you just described to the client? Because it's always easier to understand when one hears a concrete example.

Well, a lot of my day is spent listening to people's stories about their pain. And some of them are very deep-seated beliefs that their pain will never change and that their physical pain comes from a source that can't be altered. And some clients who have mental health issues in relation to their physical problems as well and who are very attached to their mental health issues and very attached to their diagnoses as part of their identity.

[Speaker 2] (1:10:42 - 1:10:43)

Yes, yes.

[Speaker 3] (1:10:43 - 1:10:48)

And continually seek responses from other people that confirm that identity.

Exactly. To them. Yes, yes.

So when you are present, your intuition is also more accessible. So there may be certain things that at times you can say to them, a little hint, or whether you ask them to go into the body and feel the body so that there's a little bit of dis-identification from the mental image of who they are. So the more presence you bring in as your main tool, the easier it will become to deal with those humans and the more helpful you will be to them.

It doesn't mean that everybody will awaken who comes to you, but miracles do happen through presence. I told you before, I thought I was a healer for two or three years because people said to me I was doing healing. So that, and I became dissatisfied because the people who then started coming to me were only interested in their physical symptoms.

And I realized what they really need is a shift in consciousness. So there may be some similarities with what you do.

[Speaker 3] (1:12:09 - 1:12:30)

I think most definitely. And the trouble is that when you're in a consulting room with somebody for half an hour, you can't just go, I've had enough of this, and walk out. Whereas with other people in my personal spheres, I can say, okay, it's time for me to go now.

So that's where I think the biggest challenge lies therein.

Yes, people working with others in that capacity, whether it's physiotherapy or whether it's psychotherapy, at some point, something else takes over. And that then becomes, when presence takes over completely as you deal with people, then it will become much easier. Psychotherapists even who have been trained to apply a particular modality of psychotherapy to their patients, at some point, after a few years, some of them kind of gradually forget about the modality or it's no longer primary.

In some of them, presence arises spontaneously as they sit with people. And then they become really effective in what they do. And they may no longer even know what it is they do because it's not them that does it.

There's a line, of course, in miracles, which may help you because you are a kind of healer. A healer does not heal, he or she lets healing be. So, and then something else takes over.

And that's the key to your success with your clients.

Thank you very much. I will use the challenging people to strengthen my spiritual muscles.

[Speaker 1] (1:14:00 - 1:14:10)

There's no shortage. The universe is abundant.

[Speaker 8] (1:14:33 - 1:15:28)

My question is around, before you were talking about intensification of presence. So at times I've felt intense energy in my body, throughout my body. But that's more rare.

And it's, I feel that I experience presence in more of an underlying underlying calmness or, yeah, calmness. So my question is, is presence experienced, is there something consistent with presence? Is there something that's felt or a consistent feeling?

Do you mean, does it always feel the same? Is that what you mean, perhaps? Well, the, as I said, the intensity of presence can vary.

Then, so presence is the energy field. Now, this is very hard to talk about, but I'll just, I will make an attempt. It is almost as if there's a place inside from where presence emanates.

And that place is timeless. And I can only compare it in the sense perceived world, it could compare to this, like the sun that continuously shines and yet it has no form. So it's like a space rather out of which presence emanates.

So the sun is an actually positive presence. But if you imagine that the sun were an empty space out of which the light emanates, then you get a better, this is closer to the truth of how it is experienced as you go very deeply into it. So there is a space within or a spaciousness that is the point out of which the emanation of presence happens.

And that space is absolute repose, absolute stillness. And to feel that in yourself is joy, very joyful, in the, for lack of a better word. There's an aliveness there, but it is absolutely still.

That's the core. And that is, perhaps as I speak of it, you can get a sense within yourself what that is. You can only sense it when you're not thinking, you can't be thinking and sense that.

That's the innermost stillness within you. Out of that emanates presence, which can emanate directly from the body, can also move into your mind and begin to use your mind and inform the mind and speak through the mind. So there were times in my life when I was very passive for, you know, my episodes on seeking on park benches, but even after that for long periods of time, I was so immersed in that inner stillness that there seemed no point in doing anything.

And you don't need to go that way. I didn't have any guidance, so nobody could tell me what to do with that. So I gradually had to learn for myself that you can be active in the world.

And at the same time, completely rooted in the stillness. So you particularly mentioned the state of calmness when you can feel it. So it may be that you have that connectedness with a still point within and feel that very strongly.

It's very hard for people to, people also differ in their choice of words when they speak about it. So you could ask, if you go to India or you go to any Buddhist country, you may find that, ask them about spiritual awakening, you may find that the words they use to describe it are very, very different. And only if you know already from direct experience what it is they're talking about, you can recognize that they're talking about the same thing.

So I've already said too much about it because what I have said, those words may not be the words that you would choose to talk about your experience of presence. So are you able to suspend thinking for certain moments without going to sleep?

I'm not sure.

Okay, try it and try it now. Okay, stop. Okay, how was that?

[Speaker 8] (1:21:25 - 1:21:27)

I don't remember a thought.

Okay, so there was no thought. Because not thinking is not memorable.

[Speaker 8] (1:21:33 - 1:21:35)

Yeah. Okay.

Now, this is very significant. So the mind doesn't know what to do with not thinking because the mind is thought. The mind cannot really appreciate how important not thinking is because what the mind is interested in is, let me ask another question.

That's what the mind is interested in. It's not interested in stepping aside and allowing no thought to arise. So the mind has a certain momentum.

The most important thing is to become familiar with that state of no thought. Far more important than any question that could arise in your mind or any answer that the greatest spiritual teacher could give you. So that's why I mentioned in, I believe, in the New Earth, I was visiting that big center where they offer countless fascinating courses on developing this and that faculty and spiritual development and physical development and all kinds of huge number of courses are offered.

You can have anything, a menu of courses. You can pursue any interest, wonderful and fascinating. So I don't know if you remember reading it.

I wrote, somebody came to me and showed me that program, that menu of fascinating courses and workshops. Said, which one do you think is most suitable for me? And I looked through it.

There's so many, I don't know. But I can tell you this, what the way I put it at that time was be aware of your breathing, just for a few days, and you will gain more than attending any of these courses and it's free. Be aware of your breath as you go through daily life, as much as you can.

What does that imply? That implies there's a space of no thought because you cannot be aware of your breath and think at the same time. So if you want rapid acceleration of spiritual awakening, this, by the way, is the last question for tonight appropriately.

If you want rapid acceleration of spiritual awakening, don't ask another question because the next question and the next and the next won't get you any closer, especially after. Well, as you can see, I'm winding down the question. Especially after being here for several days, I have said all that can be said about spiritual awakening.

The next step is up to you and it does not consist in, well, let me see. No, I need to, something else I need to know. I know that some questions are helpful because, but ultimately the most essential thing is bring presence into your life now, for example, by being aware of your breath as much as you can.

It's just one way of bringing presence in. Or feel the inner body as much as you can. And that's rapid.

Or if you can just step out of thought already without using any of those portals, just move out of thought. And some of you can do that already. Then choose that as much as possible in your daily life.

Choose to be in thoughtless awareness whenever you don't actually need to think. And that's quite a lot of the time, especially moving from here to there, doing habitual things, listening to people talking. Be the presence.

That's the spiritual practice. There's no other spiritual practice. Everything else would point to that, but this is the most direct spiritual practice.

And very rapidly you'll find the shift happening. But it's your choice now. Before, unconscious humans don't have a choice.

When there's no inkling of awareness in you, you don't even know that apart from your thoughts there's anything else in you, you have no choice. You are being used, you are possessed by thought. You have a choice.

Now with choice comes responsibility because the moment you have that choice, it implies that there is sufficient awareness in you for you to have choice. Once that has arisen, that choice becomes your responsibility. We have to look at it from that point of view because if people ask me, well, who is responsible, presence or you and all kinds of strange questions, the most useful approach is to see that you can choose to be present.

That's your responsibility. Choose to be present in many, many situations in your daily life. Choose presence over useless thinking, for example.

When you're in bed at night, when you wake up in the morning, when you're walking in nature or walking to work from here to there or traveling on public transport or sitting in your car, stopping at a red light, choose presence over thinking. You are able to do that. First, you have to remember that you have a choice.

That comes one. Okay, I have a choice. And then exercise the choice and take your attention away from thinking and put your attention on attention itself.

Become conscious of being conscious. That's your job now. And then you cannot not experience an accelerated arising of presence.

It's that simple. But the weird thing is, many people who have the choice still do not exercise their choice. I'm now, what I just described is looking at it from one perspective.

From another perspective, which is also true and actually more true, but less helpful, it is true to say that when you exercise your choice of being present, what is really happening is that presence is choosing to manifest through you. But what presence wants you is to feel that you can have that choice because it helps it to manifest. Ultimately, there isn't you and presence.

You are an aspect of presence. So, forget about what I just said. But exercise your choice to be present, no matter where you are.

And if you lose it, fine. It's coming back again and again. Of course, you will drift off again sometimes.

You drift off into thinking. You may drift off into reactivity and find, and then come, but then come back. The moment you notice it, the moment you notice that you've drifted off into reactivity, your choice is to come back.

If you cannot come back directly by saying, okay, I'll just be present, then use either your breath to bring you back, use the awareness of the inner body to bring you back, use some conscious movement to bring you back, or use sense perception to bring you back, looking without labeling. It's all, all the, especially natural things are helpful. You look at them, look at your dog.

He's not thinking. So, and immediate, it's so easy to be present with an animal, with nature, with the sky. You can use those things as help.

So if you need some additional help to be present, use that. I sometimes call that a portal into presence. Use the portal of the present moment, which is what present is.

Okay, what's the problem right now? What's wrong now? And then you have to, because the mind has been telling you for an hour that things are very wrong.

And then you have to, well, what's, what's wrong? What's the, what's the actual problem at this moment, which after all is all that ever exists? What's the actual problem at this moment?

Well, this has just happened and this might happen. No, this moment, nothing. I'm sitting here breathing.

There was a man working with Byron Katie, a spiritual teacher, and he was talking about, oh, I'd love to have enough money. And if I had enough money, what I would do, I thank you for your question. I don't know if this is still the answer to your question, but the man was saying, if I had enough money, I would move to Hawaii and that would be so great.

That's my dream. And she said, well, what would you do in Hawaii? Said, well, I would sit in a deck chair by the beach or in my backyard and look at the palm trees, breathe.

And she pointed out to him, well, where are you sitting now? Is the chair comfortable? Yeah.

So what's wrong with that chair? How different would it be to have just a slightly different view around you? You can be in Hawaii now.

It's an inner state. It's just the mind telling you, you need to be somewhere else in order to be happy. You need to be somewhere else.

It's here now. What's wise to seek, postpone fulfillment to some future imagined point, not realizing that the source of all satisfaction is within you already. And then sense that as your very presence.

And then the rest is, as Einstein said, I want to know the mind of God. The rest is details. The mind of God is consciousness and everything else, whatever happens or doesn't happen, you catch the bus or you miss the bus, you lose money, you gain money, up and down.

Hot and cold. That's all the details. So now you go to sleep, lie on your bed and feel the presence pervading the body.

And when you wake up before you do anything else, lie on your back, feel the aliveness in the body, and then look around. That's a good way of going to sleep and coming out of sleep. Improves your dreams too.

Waking up in a dream, you might've had that once or twice. You suddenly realize you're dreaming. And usually quickly the dream comes to an end.

And what's happening here is really very similar. You're waking up to your essential reality and then your whole life feels a little bit like a dream unfolding. At least it does to me, but it's quite pleasant.

And so you're awake and in the dream. That's a lucid dreaming, they call that. And what we are doing here is called lucid living.

Very similar. Oh, tastes so good.

Welcome to another live meditation. Meditation is finding the inner stillness. It doesn't need to be created.

It's not an attainment. It's always there waiting to be discovered. It's underneath the stream of thinking and it is possible to sense it in the background even while you're thinking in daily life.

But most importantly, you discover it and you sense it most strongly when thinking subsides for a moment. But what's left is awareness or presence. And that's happening here.

This is an invitation to you to stop thinking, which does not mean going to sleep. It means being highly alert, present, without the movement of thought. Or if there is thought, just little fragments of thought.

When you know you're not interested in thought, then the power of thought that thought usually has to seduce you, to hypnotize you, becomes diminished. Most people live as if under some hypnotic spell throughout their lives. Hypnotized, mesmerized, drawn into, identified with completely, every thought that arises in their mind.

That's a very unfulfilled and unfulfilling existence. Existence. Emotions often reflect thought, mostly reflect thought.

And so certain types of thought often create certain types of emotion. And this becomes part of the hypnotic spell. So you're then trapped inside your own little world.

Whether it's predominantly a personal little world or predominantly a collective mind-made hypnotic spell.

It doesn't make much difference. And so that's why these, the term awaken, waking up, awaken, is used in many spiritual traditions. You awaken out of the hypnotic spell of being identified completely with a stream of thinking, which then gives you your sense of identity.

The thought-based identity, the person, the personality. In order to be able to think well, you need to also be able to step out of thought.

And then thinking can become a powerful tool that can be used by consciousness. Thinking being an aspect of consciousness. Consciousness has taken form.

[Speaker 2] (1:46:49 - 1:47:21)

But if you're not able to step out of thinking, thinking becomes self-serving and becomes the main source of the trouble difficulties in your life. So I won't say very much.

[Speaker 1] (1:47:24 - 1:47:37)

You can keep your eyes open if you like and look at me. I'm not thinking. This may help you to connect with that state within you.

You can close your eyes too, if you prefer that. Or you can alternate between looking and closing your eyes. If it's not enough for you to look at me and step out of thought as you look, if thought still intrudes, as you probably know, you can place your attention on your breathing that stops thinking.

Or you can place your attention on the inner body, feeling the aliveness inside your body that can become an anchor for presence and takes your attention out of thought.

So whatever it is, the important thing is that it's expressed negatively, so to speak, to be free of thinking. Expressed positively is to be aware of yourself as the awareness, to sense your essential presence. So it's the two perspective on the same thing.

Freedom from thinking, being able to sense your essential presence, the presence. I sometimes call it your presence, although it's not yours.

So I may occasionally say a word or two just to remind you why we're here.

And I'll use my bells.

I may use them occasionally for those of you who have drifted back into thinking and then the sound of the bell reminds you to step out of thinking.

[Speaker 2] (1:50:14 - 1:58:42)

Look at me, sense your own presence or close your eyes and be aware of the fact that you are conscious, that you are consciousness. Consciousness. No effort, no trying, no doing.

You're not doing a meditation. You can't do a meditation. You're becoming aware of being.

Doesn't involve any doing. The alertness arises naturally. You don't need to force it.

So the two seemingly incompatible states merge and they are alertness and relaxed. Alert and relaxed. Not trying to achieve anything.

On the level of doing, there are many things you can still do and accomplish. On the deeper level of being, there's nothing you can add to yourself and you're already complete.

[Speaker 7] (2:09:09 - 2:10:57)

Thank you. Thank you. I was watching a talk with you and Neil Donoghue Walsh and he said, you know, we both wrote great books but the difference between him and you is that you live it.

And so first I just gotta thank you for being such an example, for something that's truly missing in most of the world. But my question is, what's a day like in the life of Eckhart? It sounds like a bad reality TV show, but yeah.

[Speaker 1] (2:10:59 - 2:12:30)

It's not terribly interesting. It's very ordinary, unless when I'm traveling it gets a bit more interesting, because there's a plane to catch, and there's a hotel, and so on. But when I'm not traveling, it's extremely ordinary.

I love being, so there's always set aside time for just being still or walking in nature. I'm notorious for not meeting deadlines. And everybody knows when they say, there's a debt, this needs to be done, this thing needs to be done by, so and so.

Well, we'll see. And I love nighttimes, so I sometimes don't go to bed until 1.30 or 2, and sleep about five hours. And I like little things, going to a cafe, have a coffee somewhere.

Nature, as I said, love walking in nature. Reading occasionally, being, doing whatever needs to be done, people call, there's always things that need to be done, I do them quietly. Some things don't get done at all, and then they disappear.

[Speaker 7] (2:12:33 - 2:12:39)

Easier for you, right, yeah. Are you still able to go out in public, though?

[Speaker 1] (2:12:39 - 2:12:40)

What?

[Speaker 7] (2:12:40 - 2:12:41)

Still able to go out in public?

Well, that is interesting, it's, I go out, usually with a baseball cap, which I never really liked, but I've been wearing them for years now. Because I love privacy, I love to be invisible, I love to be in a room and being able to just observe what goes on in the room without anybody being aware that I'm there. That's more difficult now, so often people come up, even with a baseball cap, they come up, and usually it's lovely, they say some, that it's been so wonderful, my life has changed, it happens almost every day.

And that's wonderful, I prefer not to be recognized, but the moment it happens, I'm happy, and I respond, and it's a loving interaction. But my preference is not to be seen. I'm an introvert by nature, so even to go out and give talks was a very strange thing for me, I knew that this is what the universe wanted me to do, or the universe acting through me, so it's things, one surrenders into things, and then they're fine, it's not my nature to go out on stage and talk.

And so, every situation brings its own challenges, the loss of privacy and so on could be seen as a challenge, and requires then surrender, to see in this world, there are polarities, you gain something here, you lose something there, in the world of polarities on the surface level, you experience polarities. The gain here has to be paid for something. So the fact that the teaching has gone out to so many people, that's wonderful, of course then, yes, privacy is lost, then you need to accept that.

Before I had privacy, but very few people were reached by the teaching. When I did workshops in the 80s and early 90s, there was one evening talk in England that had been scheduled, nobody turned up. So I was alone, I just sat there.

But I had my privacy. And then I had a workshop once, usually I had about seven, 10, 12, 15 people for little workshops, or one workshop had been, somebody had organized a workshop for me, and I arrived for a weekend, Saturday and Sunday, one person turned up, waiting at the door, and said, okay, let's do it. So not that many people were reached, but wonderful privacy.

So that's how it is, it's simple. I don't live in an ashram where some spiritual teachers live in an ashram where they're surrounded by people who go. And that can be, of course, comforting for a while to the ego, if you still have an ego, hopefully not to the spiritual teacher.

But it's not, I prefer to be in every, normal, everyday life, and go to the supermarket, and so on, so it's not interesting, unfortunately. And not even glamorous, except occasionally when I visit Oprah, then suddenly it's, ah. Driving into the big, the gates open to the big mansion, and you drive in, shh, oh.

Oh. But otherwise, not that much glamor. Thank you.

Thank you for the opportunity. The last conversation that I had with my dying son, 14-year-old, with cancer, 13 years ago, after praying on that night, he asked me, mom, how can I become more aware of the presence of God? That was his last question.

So I remained silent, and then I answered, there's nothing that we can do, only to ask, and it will be given to you. And he didn't say a word. He just moved his hand, and kind of grasped what was in the atmosphere, and he just grasped it, smiled, and gave me a hug.

So, I felt I needed to share this to you and with the audience tonight. And my question, Eckhart, is, what's the relationship between the ego and consciousness, stillness, while we are sleeping, especially at night, long sleep, and our mind is active, and we are dreaming, and we feel that is a reality, but sometimes we are aware it's not a reality. But I want to continue in that reality.

I feel magnetized. So, what is that interaction that is happening there?

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (2:19:40 - 2:26:28)

There are two dimensions to sleep. One is when you're asleep, and you're dreaming, and the other one is normal life, where there's also identification with all the things that the mind produces. And there's a connection, of course, between the two.

The focal point of what we do, of awakening, is to awaken in the dream that is called ordinary life. And the presence that comes into your life through that, which is a disidentification from the mind patterns, the mental, emotional conditionings, the ego, which is identification, complete identification with the mind, which is ego, that may also have an effect eventually on what happens in your dreams. It may transform the nature of your dreams.

Your dreams may become more benign or more pleasant, and you may find from time to time, or more often, within the dream, you suddenly become aware that you are dreaming. It can be quite nice. But the most important thing, of course, is that you become aware in ordinary life that you are dreaming when you are dreaming, when you're totally identified with the mind, to become aware then.

And then that awareness may come into the dream also, and suddenly you're like, oh, I can do anything. It's only a dream. Usually soon after you wake up.

The ego gradually diminishes as you stop identifying so much with the mind. And that is one of the reasons why the nature of your dreams becomes more benign, because the ego just lives in a violent reality. There's enemies and there's fighting and defensiveness and aggression, and that is reflected in the dreams.

Many dreams arise, usually often there are emotions associated with dreams. We tend to think that what we feel when we dream is emotions that we have when we dream are caused by the dream, but they're not. It's usually the other way around, that the dream is caused by preexisting emotions in you.

The mind is trying to explain the emotions that you feel, and it creates images as explanations for the emotions that you feel. This is the genesis of many dreams. When you look at it afterwards, it looks as if it were the other way around.

I felt fear because I saw this dreadful monster running after me in the dream. I've also really, no, the monster, there was an emotion of intense fear in you. The mind didn't know what to do with it, and then it created an image to correspond to the emotion, and that image became the dream.

It translated the emotion into an image, and it became, so you saw it there, and then you confuse, of course, cause and effect. The dream is the cause of the underlying emotion. The underlying emotion is there because of the egoic consciousness that creates an unpleasant reality and creates many negative emotions that are completely unnecessary, but it's created by the ego with its paranoid, delusional systems and many other dysfunctions.

So that is interesting because it can also be applied to everyday life. I saw, for example, dysfunctions in human consciousness. I observed a person who suffers from paranoia, and paranoia means you see enemies or you feel persecuted by people or groups of people or followed, you misinterpret reality, and when I looked closely at this, I saw that there was intense fear in that person, and the fear was so much, the fear could not be explained by the reality around this person because the reality around this person was fine.

The mind had to explain the fear. So the egoic mind came up with a delusional system and says, I am fearful because of this person who is following me, wasn't, he was just walking, and I'm fearful because these people are watching me while I'm here, they're here, they belong to this conspiracy of government conspiracy, they have a whole department wanting to control me, and that's why I feel this fear. So again, it's the other way around, and then eventually that person ended up with at least 100 people in full-time employment in their view just to follow me and to control me.

They're all around me. The government must be spending a lot of money on one person, but that is because the fear came there, the mind attempted to explain the fear and came up with that delusional system. So that's, the important thing is presence in the ordinary, the dream of ordinary life that bring presence into that more and more, and that will change also the nature of the dreams that you dream when you're asleep at night.

We have two dream worlds here, but for your focal point must be the dream world of ordinary existence.

[Speaker 10] (2:26:31 - 2:26:32)

Thank you.

[Speaker 5] (2:26:50 - 2:28:03)

It's a great opportunity to experience being in the same room with you. This is more of a personal question. Throughout my life, maybe most of you have experienced this where you feel like you're being guided or supported or helped along the way, and more recently, a couple of years ago, I had a major incident where I had like a, it was a near-death experience, and for some reason, I was, I survived it, and I'm here, and there's no real deal breakers that came out of it, but, so I, I mean, you know, I can walk, and you know, but, you know, so my question is more along the lines of did I make it from just pure luck? Is this the universe?

Is this my ego thinking I'm special? Is it, is it my karma to experience this?

To experience what you're experiencing now, or you?

Yeah, the experience of having gone through this near-death experience. Yes. Fortunately, I came out of it.

I've always had a good attitude. It was a medical accident that laid me out for a couple of years, and of course, I became much more spiritual, but before that, you know, I read your Power of Now and New Earth and followed it on Oprah, and I somehow, there was a feeling like, boy, I was almost set up for this.

[Speaker 1] (2:28:50 - 2:34:00)

Well, that's true, perhaps, for everybody, but in some, for some people it's much more obvious that you went through the life experiences that you went through, in your case, the near-death experience probably brought about, although you don't call it not a deal breaker, but it probably brought about a deepening in you, and it is through the difficulties, more than the good things, that we awaken spiritually.

That's the, that's unfortunately the case, sorry, but so it's through the huge challenges that the deepening happens and the awakening happens, and that's the reason, so you don't really, the mind might be very curious and say, yeah, but I want to know why me? Yeah. But I don't know why you, and I don't know why me.

The question didn't ever occur to me, because the me, I don't sense that there is a me to whom kind of it happened, really, although sometimes it might be expressed in that way. There is a, that sense of separate I-ness becomes more, less dense, loses its density, and this is why it happens, and through encountering the challenges of life and the losses and the suffering, some of it seemingly coming from the outside, some of it self-generated through egoic unconsciousness, and often a combination of both, through the suffering, it happens. It wouldn't happen without it, and really, that's all we need to know.

Any further thing you can speculate, perhaps you suffered in past lifetimes enough, so you just need it a little bit more now. It doesn't, it's not important. It's just to realize that when potentially bad things, there's always grace hiding behind the seemingly bad things.

It's hiding there, and we can be grateful retrospectively for the things that went wrong in our lives because it's brought us here. We wouldn't be here without that, and that really is all we need to know. The mind can never stop asking questions, and even for a little while, when I became peaceful, the mind said, it didn't say that much anymore, but occasionally it said, am I going to lose that again?

It started to write down in the first few months my daily experience. I said, I need to write this down because in case I lose it again, then at least I'll remember. So, but I didn't realize that the mind had already subsided considerably, and my mind activity had been reduced considerably, maybe by 70 or 80%.

So I experienced wonderful peace without knowing why and without knowing that my mind activity had been reduced considerably. I didn't know that. I experienced it as peace.

Somebody had said, why are you so peaceful? I don't know, and only years later, I realized, oh, I'm not thinking that much anymore. That's why I feel so peaceful, and then when I realized that, I could begin to help people step out of their minds.

Before, I couldn't have done that because I didn't know what was the causal factor behind this wonderful experience of peace. Didn't know that. And so, there are many questions, though, that the mind can ask that are not really helpful and unnecessary.

Understanding all kinds of things, in most cases, understanding doesn't necessarily bring you to awakening, but the need to understand, to relinquish the need to understand, well.

It's the great mistreatment. Yes.

And now, when I say to relinquish the need to understand, doesn't necessarily mean that I don't want anybody to ask any more questions. Yes. Ah.

This is audible.

These are called teaching sessions, but there's not really any teaching. Teaching, but words are limited, we have to find some words to describe it. Teaching would mean that I'm adding something to you, knowledge, information, facts, or an experience even, but that's not what this is about.

It's not about adding anything to you, there's so much there already, more than enough. You have more information than the Buddha ever had. And, of course, there are beautiful maps or signposts in existence, and that may be some of the spiritual information that you have, beautiful maps or signposts in the form of ancient scriptures that point the way to the transformation of human consciousness.

And here we are not using any of the existing maps or signposts, beautiful as they are, profound as they are, many of which originated in this country, which could be called the birthplace of spirituality. Not that there's anything wrong with those maps, they are beautiful, those signposts. But every age creates its new signposts that corresponds to the needs of the age.

The old ones can still work if used rightly, or they can become a hindrance if used wrongly. Now, you may notice I use the word maps or signposts to describe ancient teachings, spiritual teachings. And why?

What is a map is never it. The map is not the territory. The signpost is not the place to which it points.

So all teachings, ancient or contemporary, point beyond themselves. And the essence of all teachings is the possibility of the transformation of human consciousness to a state that is free of bondage, free of suffering, free of conditioning. So the teachings point the way to that.

And they are beautiful, because those genuine teachings came out of that transformed state of consciousness. Those few individuals in the past who became free of their conditioning, free of the false sense of self, false me, the egoic identity, they taught out of that state. The teaching arose out of that transformed state of consciousness.

And so it has beauty and power. And it has such beauty often that these ancient teachings drew so much attention to themselves, because they are so beautiful and you can compare one map with another, one signpost with another, that people began to study, compare and collect maps and signposts and interpret them. And from then it was just a small step to forgetting that to which they point, because one became so absorbed in the form of the teaching, and not only that, after a while when you began to love that signpost so much, that map so much, you had a sense of identity with it.

And all those other people also loved this signpost so much. And you could begin to argue with other groups of people who loved other signposts. Forgetting that they point to the same place.

And then you could carry, metaphorically speaking, the burden of signposts with you. That has happened, can still happen. And then it's also possible that a signpost, when there was readiness in a human being, he or she just needed to hear, to look once, twice and immediately realize the truth of it.

And it worked, as it should. This teaching is relatively neutral culturally. It's not Buddhist, not Christian, not Hindu.

And yet it embraces the essence of all of them. It is not rigid in its form. There's nothing to believe in.

And the essence of this teaching, which is our gathering here this week, is the possibility of the transformation of human consciousness. Your consciousness, so to speak. And since all language is limited, form is limited, these words are also signposts, of course, since all form is limited, every word that I speak is also limited and isn't quite it.

It's only one perspective on it. And even if I say the transformation of human consciousness, it's not quite true. No single statement that anybody makes can contain the truth.

It is a perspective on it. This is good to know, once you know that, so that you do not grasp one statement, one perspective, identify with one perspective and say, this is the truth. The transformation of human consciousness, yes, this is one perspective on it, but it implies then that something in you needs to change, become transformed before this new state arises.

Something in you needs fixing, it implies that, but that's not true. Transformation of consciousness also implies that you need time. For this change to happen.

But that is not the case. So what is the essence then of that transformation of consciousness that doesn't need time? Is that possible?

And here we come to the essence. And the only reason why we are here is to know that state of consciousness for ourselves, not as something that needs to be achieved in the future, but as something that is already in you now. Now, how do you know that beyond making it into another belief?

Because you could adopt that belief when you hear certain teachings, they tell you you're already enlightened. And that could be a very satisfying belief to add to the content of your mind. And then for a while you could convince yourself that this is true.

The teacher told me that nothing needs to change. I'm already enlightened. For a while that adds a little bit to the mind-made identity, the mind-made sense of self, and you feel great.

You finally made it. The mind-made sense of self always seeks to improve itself, to add something, to complete itself, to enhance its sense of self. And if you can catch a belief, a big powerful belief that somebody gives you, and you can then add it to the accumulated content of your mind with which you identify as yourself, then that for a while is very satisfying.

You've become big in that. The self has grown to an enlightened, me the enlightened one. But it's only satisfying for a while, and then life will show you that that wasn't it, and maybe you're not quite enlightened yet.

And then there's looking for the next thing to identify with, experience, another belief, more knowledge, then you look for the real spiritual attainment to add to me. And so the striving away from who you already are continues, the movement towards future continues, the grasping, the continuous reaching out and grasping to complete yourself spiritually, materially, you've gone beyond that, perhaps, and now spiritually. Relationships, maybe you've gone beyond that.

Self-completion, the looking for that. And here comes this strange teaching that says you can never find that. In the future.

And yet, don't believe me. If it is already the case, if you are already free, enlightened in your essence, then what is the difference between you and the spiritual master, if there is such a thing? Well, one could say the master knows this to be true, and you don't know it to be true.

Yes, but how do you know it to be true? How does that manifest? And it's very, very simple.

It's not the case that the master knows more than you. Some masters may do. Other masters may be very simple people, little education.

You know a thousand times more than they do on the level of knowledge. But they know the one thing that matters. And you know many things.

So the answer is simple, and I'll tell it to you now, in case you want to leave, go home early. Because I don't want to build up this and say, I'm going to tell you the answer on day six. The master is totally at one with this moment.

He or she does not oppose internally this moment. He or she offers no inner resistance to this moment, to the is-ness of now, to whatever arises now. It is not resisted internally.

And that is the end of all that is false in you. The entire egoic structure depends on your inner resistance to the suchness of this moment. It perpetuates itself.

The mind-made sense of self perpetuates itself basically through its resistance. It is a state of resistance, a state of insufficiency, a state of continuous wanting or fearing the mental projection that you call future. Wanting and needing the future as something that comes towards you, to add to me, to complete me, and fearing that something may arise in that mental projection that we call future that might diminish me.

The two movements connected with future, the enhancement of one's sense of self, no matter what form that may take, that is looked for in and through future. That is why there is this enormous mental pull away from the aliveness and fullness of now into future because what is being sought, the seeking is to add more. The future will complete you.

And this is true up to a point. You need future in your spiritual practice. I'm not completely saying this is all nonsense.

No. You need spiritual, for many people, spiritual practice implies a progressive movement, a progressive movement towards the liberated state. But a point comes in your progressive movement where you suddenly realize the fallacy of time as far as the one thing is concerned that truly matters in your life, which is knowing who you are beyond form.

Finding yourself beyond mental constructs. Then suddenly you realize the fallacy of future as far as your spiritual liberation is concerned. But before you could realize that, you needed your spiritual practices.

You needed time. You needed suffering. And spiritual practice is not necessarily spiritual practice in the conventional sense for people.

Spiritual practice for many people means suffering. There are many people who have no spiritual teacher except suffering. And suffering is the greatest, the greatest spiritual teacher.

So they needed that because there are two statements that are synonymous when I say you do not need, ultimately, you do not need time. This is not true for everybody. It is only true for that human being who can listen to that now and realize the depths and the truth of it.

And we are only here to explore the depths and the truth of that statement for the whole week, which is time. We explore the timeless state of consciousness here. Something in you doesn't even like what I am saying, perhaps in some of you, because you are still identified with time and the movement of time as the me that seeks completion through it.

And if only that me, the little egoic self in you listens to these words, it won't like that because its very existence is bound up with time. So it is quite possible that some of you may, if you haven't been here before, may feel a strong impulse to leave. And there is nothing wrong with that.

It simply means there is not yet the readiness to hear the simplicity of this truth and the depths of it that says you don't need time. And there is fear even to want to go more deeply into that statement to see what that means. There is fear.

Who fears that? The time-bound sense of self fears that statement. And that's fine.

That means you do not need more time. It's not true for you. It means you need more time.

It's fine. But this also is connected to suffering. There is a synonymous statement with you do not need more time.

It is the statement you do not need more suffering, which is the ultimate teaching of the Buddha, the end of suffering. You do not need more time implies you do not need more suffering. And again, this may be true for you or it may not be true for you.

It is not a statement that is true for everybody. So whatever your spiritual practice has been, whether it's been through teachings or through suffering or a combination of both, the question is whether there is an inner readiness to hear these words and to, if only, obscurely sense the truth of these words. Not understand.

If you start thinking about it, you won't get very far. You don't need more time is true, therefore is true and not true. And this is not satisfying to the mind.

I will often say things that are true and not true. That pointer may be true for you or it may not be true for you. The mind doesn't like that it says it is either true or untrue.

And in science, this is the case, well, has been until recently, until they discovered molecular physics in subatomic particles and see that they behave in such a way that those statements don't apply there anymore either. So the question then, do I need time? Do we need time for realization?

The answer would be you need time until you realize that you do not need time anymore. So all we are doing this week is to go deeper into this statement, to explore where this signpost, which is these words, to explore where this signpost points. You don't need more time.

I don't need more time to be who I am, to be myself fully, completely. How do I know that beyond making it into another belief? How do I know that beyond me giving you new practices that give you more time to practice, become good at, and then regard as an attainment, once you've become good at it, as an attainment you can add to yourself.

It feels a little bit bigger through that. So how do you know it? You know it, and here, through entering into, and I'll say it now, it may frighten some of you, entering here, as this is our only practice this week, only one practice, entering into the surrendered state of consciousness that does not need more of anything.

It does not need more of anything, because if you need more of anything, even spiritual attainment, that is not the surrendered state of consciousness. If you need more knowledge, that is not the surrendered state of consciousness. If you need more experience, that's not the surrendered state of consciousness, let alone other basic, we know all the other things, status, possessions, money.

If you need the psychological need for the next moment, which is deep in everyone, I need that inner reaching out to the next, what's next, what's next, that restless looking towards the next moment, which is part of the normal human state of consciousness, that's all the unsurrendered state of consciousness, the surrendered state of consciousness, and this is vital, and so I have to repeat this, because it's easy to forget, more, you don't need more anymore to complete yourself.

The more, more on the level of playing with phenomenal things is beautiful, I need, you need, of course you need more food later today, you need more, more skills, you can learn a few more new skills, that's part of living in this form, but more in the psychological, the psychological need for more, where the self needs to enhance itself through more, you're realizing that is the unsurrendered state.

And the last thing that people don't want to let go of, is you even surrender the need to understand more, and then you go beyond, you go into the surrendered state of consciousness, when you simply welcome the suchness of this moment, whatever form it takes. That at first looks like an absurd spiritual practice, because very often, in fact more often than not, this moment does not look all that satisfying. So to say, I totally surrender to the suchness of this moment, including all the, whatever I feel is not right with me, what I'm feeling at this moment, it may be restlessness, it may be anger, whatever it may be, you mean you want me to be stuck in this moment forever?

But of course that's not what it is. And what better place to enter the surrendered state than India? And maybe this is why this country has produced more spiritual masters than any other.

You have to surrender here. India teaches you to surrender. That is the, even without going to any teachers, it is a teaching in itself.

The illusion that you can control the material universe, the illusion that out there there is anything substantial that lasts, which you could have in the West, because you have substantial shopping malls and freeways, and everything works, it all works. And it gives you the illusion, it gives you the illusion that there's something lasting there. And this, sooner or later, even there, reveals itself as an illusion.

The shopping malls will crumble, unless you crumble first, your physical form. It's insubstantial, but the insubstantiality of the physical is more apparent here. And the only way to be here, unless you want to suffer, is to surrender to what is.

It doesn't mean you can't say, oh, could you please heat up this soup, or whatever. I prefer hot to cold, or whatever it is. You can say something and do something and initiate action, but in that, be surrendered, because it may not work.

And whatever action arises, let it arise out of the state of alignment with the form that this moment takes, even if it looks unsatisfying. During this week, sometimes the form that this moment takes will be beautiful. And then the next moment, or rather the next form that this one moment, the only moment there is, takes, may be not beautiful.

It may be a limitation on your freedom. For most of you, or all of you, unless you are ascetic practitioners, where you are now is not as comfortable as your home. Facilities, you haven't got, so you have limitations on your life here that you may not have at home.

You have others there. You have limitations on your life here, physical even. The food may be strange.

Many kinds of limitations. And so there is, you can observe the reactivity of the little me that says no to what is, internally, and wants to be somewhere else, or blames or criticizes or complains in the head about the form that this moment takes. That is the unsurrendered state.

That is how the egoic entity survives through resistance. And it can get very strong here if you don't know how it operates. So our spiritual practice here during this week is, just be watchful and alert and ask yourself, observe yourself internally, am I in the surrendered state or the unsurrendered state of consciousness?

The unsurrendered state denies, resists or tries to get away from what is. The surrendered state has surrendered its need for more, has surrendered its need for this moment to be different from what is, because it has recognized that what is, is already as it is. And it has recognized the futility of resisting that internally.

It embraces the suchness of this moment, whatever form this moment takes. You do not demand that the form that this moment takes should be different from what it is. You do not oppose that.

What happens when you no longer demand that the form that this moment takes, and please observe this little signpost I'm giving you when I say, the form that this moment takes, because this moment is eternal, there's only this eternal one now, never changes, it cannot, it is, remains eternally as now. What appears in it is the world of form. A form of life appears in the vastness of the field that is the eternal now.

In this vastness, forms appear. And they appear, and that is the appearance of this moment. The form that arises, a situation, a place, an event, a person, comes, it's happening now.

Of course it's happening now. Nothing can happen that is not now. Whatever happens must happen in this eternal field of now.

We cannot fully understand through the mind what that means, but it is an amazing realization that there is nothing that is not now. To be and now, life and now, are totally synonymous, totally one. Nothing has ever happened that wasn't now.

Nothing will, can ever happen that is not now. How? Future moment can only appear as now, otherwise it has no reality except a mental projection.

And when is it happening? Now. And the memory of a past moment, there is no such thing really of a past moment, as there is no such thing as a future moment, there's only form that it takes.

There's only one moment, which is now, one eternal now. Now, the form that this now takes, the form that appears in it, as you go through life, a continuous flux of forms. Now, most people, all they know is the forms that arise in the now.

They have a relationship with those forms, which is either a relationship of desire, or a relationship of fear. They want to have these forms, or they have aversion towards these forms. And you can observe this this week, how the good things come to you, how beautiful, the river, the holy river, the sunset.

And the next moment, there's something dreadful happens. It's the now, it's not really the next moment. Even I use those words sometimes, because language works in that way.

There's no such thing as the next moment. The next, the form that the moment takes, then changes. So, most people, all they relate to is the forms that arise in the now, and their relationship is one of fear or desire.

They fear or desire those forms, aversion or attraction towards these forms, because all they know is the forms. What they don't know is the now, beyond the forms. And this doesn't make sense to the mind, either.

This is a signpost that points... The truth of this cannot be understood through thought, because the transformed state of consciousness is beyond thought. This is where we are now moving.

Let's see why, what happens when, as is the normal, in the normal state of consciousness, when you resist internally, or deny, or run away from internally, from the isness of now, the form that this moment takes, the reaction against it, the reaction against the form that this moment takes, as an inner contraction, an inner no, an inner running away from it, it strengthens the form identity in you, that is the mind-made self, identified with mental, emotional forms, content of your mind. The mind-made self, the me, with its experiences and its conditioning, its knowledge, it strengthens its form identity through reacting to other forms.

So you get trapped in the world of form when you are in a reactive relationship towards what arises in the now. And to be in a reactive relationship, which is desire or fear, is part of the normal state of consciousness. And the reactive relationship to the world of form is what keeps the me, the egoic entity, going.

The more every time you react against, your form identity contracts and strengthens as the me, you feel stronger in your sense of self. And you can notice it in yourself when you argue with somebody and you are trying to be right. And this is a very common example of strengthening your sense of self by identifying with a mental position and fighting some other mental position there.

So you are reacting to form. Or an event comes into your life, a person comes, a situation comes, and there is a reaction, or you are strengthening your form identity through the reactivity to form. And that's what keeps the world going, that keeps that state of consciousness going.

To go beyond that, and it only works if you are not ready. You wouldn't even want to listen to this. The fact that you sit here and listen means the readiness is there.

The readiness to go beyond that and enter the state of non-resistance, enter the state of surrender, of welcoming whatever form arises. This is our spiritual practice, and this is the best place to practice it, and we are here welcoming whatever form arises, inner as an emotion, a feeling, or outer form. Because it is, it already is.

You say yes to that. You are no longer in a personalized relationship to whatever arises. You embrace what arises through that yes.

It is. Embrace. And what happens when you embrace the form of this moment?

You become who you already are. You become, and I'm only using pointers, the pointers are not it. Words.

You become who you already are and what you already are. You become very deep and spacious. As you allow the world of form to arise and to subside in that field of now, there's a great sense of spaciousness now around this form that arises, this event, this person, this thing.

It is not resisted. And suddenly, one could also say there's suddenly a vast peace around it, no matter what it is. The form itself may not be peaceful.

The form itself may be a limitation on your physical form. It may even be a limitation on your psychological form of me. But it is allowed to be.

The limitation is not resisted. Let's say you're trapped in a cold room. And it's just a simple example.

And that form that this moment takes, which is while the body feels, is simply allowed to be. Any condition is simply allowed to be. And suddenly, there's this vast space around the condition.

Anything that is, you could practice that with anything that is uncomfortable in your life. And there may be things here because you would probably be more comfortable at home. And sometimes you may wish you were at home in your comfortable armchair watching television.

There is a discomfort that arises somewhere. There may even be pain. But let's just talk about a little thing like a discomfort that arises.

And so you can react. So the discomfort becomes a reaction which leads to mind movements, which strengthens the me. Because the me has made the moment, the now, into its enemy.

And it gets stronger through that, through the mind movement and the emotional movement that makes the now into its enemy. And you can complain about it in your head. Why did I ever come here?

I shouldn't. They shouldn't. Why don't they?

So you can... So the discomfort reacted against, is denied, resisted, and mind movement begins. Emotions that accompany that mind movement flow into and strengthen those mind movements.

And it's all connected. Your sense of self gets stronger in that. And you're complaining inside your head and maybe to somebody else.

I'm not saying you can't complain in the sense of telling somebody to change this from here, to do that. But I mean the psychological complaining. And many people live in a constant state of that.

There are marriages, people living, husbands and wives, who are in a constant state of mental complaining about their husband or their wife. It's so normal, they don't even know it anymore. For 30 years they've been complaining in the head.

It's their normal state. But with everybody it's like that. It may not be in your marriage, may not be like that.

But some are, quite a few are. So a discomfort arises. And instead of the reactivity strengthening the egoic entity that needs its enemies to feel I'm me, if only the enemy is this little situation that creates discomfort.

That will do, any enemy will do to strengthen the self, the me. And of course when you complain, you are right. And the situation is wrong.

That is the essence of the complaint, the inner complaint. I am right. Either the person, or it may not be a person, the situation is wrong.

That's the nature of complaining. You are putting yourself in a position of rightness, me, right, a mental position. Then your sense of self becomes identified with that mental position of rightness.

And therefore you are under the delusion, it's all unconscious, that you are more yourself now. It feels great, I'm against something. And it's unconscious.

People don't know that this is how the self, the false self, perpetuates itself. How it loves all the things it complains about. It needs them.

It's looking out for the next thing it can complain about. And then what happens if suddenly there is a shift? The discomfort arises, whatever it may be, and is met in that state of yes.

It's allowed to be. The discomfort is there and is allowed to be. And you actually embrace it.

That's all right. And that continues as a little movement, the discomfort movement, cold, a little pain here, whatever it may be, pain there. Water is cold, who knows.

And it's allowed, and there the discomfort continues. And you continue to simply be with it. And suddenly there is something more than that, or that little me.

Then what happens now is not something that one can put into words, because you go beyond form now. There is a space around the discomfort. And you can do that with any bodily condition, any physical condition.

Just stay with that. And suddenly there is a sense of spaciousness around it. And there is an enormous peace around that.

And the discomfort is still there. So the discomfort is any form of pain, suffering. You're simply allowing it to be as it is.

Allowing it to be as it is. So use... This is great that we have some discomforts here.

Theoretically one could have a retreat center that is so comfortable. Everything works totally perfectly to satisfy all your needs. Just the right temperature.

The thermostat works perfectly. The water is just right. The environment is totally soothing and peaceful.

Some celestial music in the background sometimes. Maybe one day, and it may be in California, they may create such a center. Wow, wouldn't that be great?

And yet, there wouldn't be very much spiritual practice there. It doesn't come in that way. Here you have the natural things that arise in an environment that to many of you is foreign and strange.

And many things arise here. In others there are schools, like Zen monasteries, where they consciously make your life as uncomfortable as possible. Where you get very little food, it's cold, they open the windows, and you meditate all night in this painful position, facing a wall with cold wind blowing in, and an empty stomach.

Then you can watch what arises in the now. And it may perhaps at one point you give up real resistance because you can't stand the pain of the resistance anymore. There is more to it than the form of this moment.

But you're suddenly aware of a vast space around this temporary form that includes the physical body. And that is, some people have described it as enormous peace, suddenly around. In the same awful place, the monastery, whatever it was, and there in the midst of that spaciousness, there's the physical pain, there's the empty stomach, there's the discomfort.

It's there somewhere, it's not a self anymore, there is simply, there is that discomfort, there is that feeling of empty stomach, and yet there is no me in it, it's just there. So your sense of self is no longer in the form, the psychological form or the physical form, your sense of self, where is, in some traditions, they now say you have discovered no self. The self has dissolved, which is true.

The false self has dissolved through entering the surrendered state. The false self has dissolved. And what arises then is, Buddhists may call it emptiness, or it may be called the self, the one, the unconditioned one consciousness, out of which the whole universe comes, out of which every phenomenon comes, that remains, and there it is, not known in a subject-object relationship, known as yourself.

Not that which arises, but the field in which everything arises, is who you are. You are not that which happens in the now, you are the field of now. That's the depth of what now means, the eternal.

Now is the eternal, unchanging one. And it's so easy to know that as the essence of who you are, and you can see how absurd it is to look for it in the future. The essence, eternal presence, the essence of who you are, to look for it in the future.

So, that's why this spiritual practice does not require time. And yet, and there's always a paradox whenever we speak about it, because all language is to do with time, and the phenomenal world. And yet, we are here for one week, which is time.

A whole week, exploring that which is beyond time. Sounds paradoxical, almost. Why do we need a whole week to explore the timeless?

Well, maybe you don't need it anymore. Maybe it's, once or twice it's happened that people have walked out and later contacted me and said, I'm the person who walked out after 10 minutes of your talk, because I realized the truth of it and I don't need to come anymore. That realization, of course, may be true or false.

If it's only a mind movement, life will soon tell you that, oh, this is not the surrendered state. I'm shouting and screaming at my wife. Is that the surrendered state?

So, our practice then is allowing this moment to be simple. The rest happens by itself. And there is enormous intelligence in this field of now.

It is the essence of all intelligence. The mind is a tiny aspect of that vast intelligence that is in the field of now. And one more pointer.

As you surrender to now, whatever form this now takes, the incessant mental noise that we call thinking, 90% of which is unnecessary, slows down. Because a large part of the compulsive streams of thinking that most people are identified with as me, as themselves, completely identified with those continuous streams of thoughts. And the reason why those thought streams have an addictive quality, a compulsive quality, is because your sense of self is in them, a me, your identification with those thought streams as a me.

And the me wants to sustain itself, so it can't stop. And the me can only perpetuate itself through non-surrender and resistance. And that gives fuel to the compulsion to think, because it's an expression of the non-surrendered state.

You're trying to control things somehow. And so you lie awake at night for two or three hours trying to work it out, control your life, fear what might come, rehearse something, project fantasies. With entering the surrendered state, the mental noise slows down by itself.

When you say yes to what is, mental noise will begin to subside. Still there to some extent, but you're not in a fighting mode anymore towards the universe. And to be in a fighting mode towards the universe is what creates that enormous momentum that is behind compulsive thinking.

It comes in waves and waves and waves. And there's always a me in it. And so with the surrendered state, that calms down.

So you don't need to stop your mind. That creates another problem. Just be with what is.

Allow this moment to be. Then the mind stops by itself. Because it's not compatible, compulsive thinking with allowing this moment to be.

And when the mind subsides, that continues stream of thinking, there's the spaciousness. There's the stillness that is underneath the mental noise in everyone. It's already there.

And that is none other than that spaciousness that is there beyond the form that this moment takes. And that stillness, again, every label is so limited. Every signpost is limited.

Stillness. Spaciousness. Awareness that does not need thought.

Beyond thought. Thought can arise in it. But it is beyond thought.

Vast intelligence. Unconditioned. What humans think of as intelligence is the ability of the mind to solve puzzles, to store knowledge, to analyze information.

It's very limited. The entire universe is an external expression in the manifested expression of vast intelligence expressing itself as form and most of it comes out of stillness. The flowers come out of stillness.

Exists in stillness. That beauty that no mind could create. Entire galaxies coming out of vast stillness.

They say the universe came about, scientists say there was a big bang when the universe out of one point suddenly exploded into existence. And then they ask, what was before then? And then their mind stops.

Well, it doesn't stop, but thought cannot reach there. What was there before the universe was there, before the big bang? That state of the unmanifested is still in you.

It's never gone away as your essence. The big bang happens continuously. The universe comes into existence every moment.

Don't think about that. Ultimately, this is now that there's a strong evolutionary impulse now on this planet that is forcing humanity to evolve into a state that before was the privilege of very few individuals here and there. They were the early flowerings of consciousness.

But it is the destiny of all humans to be, to express this flowering, to be openings for this flowering of consciousness to happen. So where the person, you come here as a person, which is the caterpillar, but you're already ready to go beyond that. Then the person was there and it's become dense and heavy in its last stages of personal selfhood.

And then the person gives way, just as the caterpillar dissolves as caterpillar and out comes this incredible, beautiful being. The person gives way to the flowering of human consciousness. Yes, you're still here in a physical form, but something far greater has emerged through this form.

And this is why we are here, to go beyond this absurdly limited sense of self with me, with my little bit of past and my little bit of history, my little story, and a pathetic little bit of future that I think is going to complete me. And there's so little, even for those who are young, it's not much. How can I complete me in those few years?

What can I possibly add to me to make me complete? It's an illusion. So to go beyond that absurdly limited sense of self to the vastness that you actually are, not as a limited me anymore.

You simply then become an expression of that, and it emanates then through this form. And so this is the only way now the planet can be saved, is human consciousness to become transformed. Until recently, it's been a luxury, that transformation.

A few here and there, and now, we have to. This is why it's happening. And we encounter a state of consciousness that is beyond thought, characterized by deep, vitally alive stillness.

And out of that, thought can still come. And those thoughts that come out of that are inspired thoughts, new thoughts, realizations. Thought is form, and this is the formless.

Knowing yourself as the formless, and then move through the world of form and enjoy that. This is the first time. It's only when you know yourself to be beyond that, not through some idea, but through being in the surrendered state, it's only then that you can enjoy the world of forms, truly.

When you are no longer in a personalized, reactive relationship to the forms that arise in your life, in the now, of course, then you no longer desire nor fear any particular forms. You enjoy the dance of form. And you may contribute to it.

You may create new forms. They come out of presence, not because egoic need to complete itself. So a completely different doing happens.

Completely different motivation for doing. No self-seeking through doing, not trying to get to some future point where you're going to complete yourself, and if you don't get there, you'll be unhappy. And if you do get there, you'll also be unhappy.

Of course, many of these things have been pointed to in ancient teachings. There's the Bhagavad Gita, a beautiful, one of the most beautiful signposts, the path of surrendered action, where this, the action, the doing, is not a means to an end. That is surrendered action.

The doing is not inferior to some mentally projected result that you want to achieve and thereby enhance your sense of self. Surrendered action is never a means to an end. It is sufficient unto itself.

So your practice is, be watchful of this moment. It's always this moment. A limited way of putting it would be to say, what is your relationship with this moment?

In ultimate terms, you don't have a relationship with this moment. You are this moment. But from a more limited perspective, you could ask yourself, what is my relationship with this moment or the form that this moment takes?

Surrendered or resistant? And you watch. And as you watch, many times you can watch non-surrender arising.

And then you watch non-surrender as a physical contraction, as an emotional movement, or as mental judgments. Often the three go together. Physical contraction, the emotion, and some mental judgment that says something about now or a total projection away from now.

And you see yourself in your favorite restaurant at home, having a meal there. And suddenly you come back to, oh, if you observe yourself in a non-surrendered state, that's all that's necessary. And allow that to be.

It's the human state. Allow it. So it's as whenever a no arises in you, a no to what is, and you suddenly see it, accept it.

So the yes, you bring the yes into the no, always. You cannot fight non-surrender through more non-surrender or trying to achieve a surrendered state. It's enough to know that you are not surrendered.

That is the arising of presence. That is the arising of the unconditioned consciousness. And there you can allow, it allows that.

And then something happens to the non-surrendered state because it is not compatible with surrender. Of course, many teachings speak of surrender to God. And of course, this is what it is.

You can only surrender to God by surrendering to the form that this moment takes. When you ask, well, God couldn't possibly have created this dreadful form that this moment takes, this situation. It's a limitation.

It's a limitation. I want to know myself as unlimited. And here I'm faced with limitation wherever I look.

That's the form that this moment takes. The form that this moment takes cannot not be a limitation. Even if it looks like great, after a little while, the great has become a limitation on you.

Look at the West, it's become very wealthy and prosperous. And at first it means I'm now unlimited. I can buy whatever I like.

And then you buy more and more and another visit to the shopping mall and another visit and another. And suddenly all the things that you have bought have become a limitation on you. And everything is suddenly, buying doesn't fulfill you anymore.

And then you walk around the shopping mall depressed. So in the world of form, what looks sometimes like, now this form has come and freed me, always turns out to be another limitation because it is form and all form is limitation. So to project some situation mentally where you are going to be free of all limitations is absurd.

It is not in the nature of the world of form to be free of limitation. It would be a contradiction in terms. Form is limitation.

So wherever you go, you encounter limitations and every time you think, now this will free me, this person will make me happy, in other words, unlimited, then this very person that was supposed to make you happy will be the greatest limitation on your life. So it's not seeking where it cannot be found. So it's not by running away from the limitations, but by finding a new relationship towards the limitations.

And that new relationship towards the limitations, not that you can't take action to improve things and paint your house, but a new relationship towards the limitations in your life from one of feeling bad about them and thinking there must be some other situation that's better than this, well, maybe try another one and then the same arises again. Okay, try some other place, go live somewhere else, and then after a while the same arises. Okay, well, now just say yes to this.

The very limitation becomes an opening through the yes. That's the beauty of it. What before looked like a universe that was there to frustrate you, how could God allow this?

The universe looks, it was there just designed to frustrate you. And that's how some people live in such a reactive relationship. They're so angry.

Everything is just designed to make my life difficult. That's how it seems. And then your relationship changes towards what is.

And you allow it. And there's the limitation, whatever it may be, big, small, discomfort, little discomfort here, a little cold there, or present cell around you, fairly big limitation, physical condition of the body limiting you, can't move anymore, can't move fast anymore, who knows? Sooner or later, limitations will come.

Big ones will come too. Form. It's form.

And so it's not resisted anymore. Then something opens up where there before was limitation, becomes an opening into the formless and the unlimited. You've walked through the limitation.

Yes. This is the cross, the meaning of the cross. Crucifixion means limitation, at highest degree of limitation.

Can't move anymore. Totally limited. And then surrender happens in the face of the unacceptable.

And suddenly the cross becomes a symbol of the divine. The torture instrument becomes a symbol of the divine. And there's deep wisdom, no matter, you don't have to be a Christian to see the wisdom that is embedded in that, deepest, one of the deepest symbols of humanity.

And in most churches, they don't understand it at all. They don't understand the depths of it. They make it into some formal belief structures.

But the depths of it is to see that the non-duality that is there of the divine and the world of form, of the limited and the unlimited, they are one. It's through the world of form that the divine is reached. By going through it, not running away from it.

So, this is, to know this is our spiritual practice. To go deeper and deeper into this is our spiritual practice this week. Use, of course, there's great beauty here too, and there are limitations on you.

Use them wisely in your practice. Use this moment wisely, rightly. It's precious.

It's the only one there is. Ever. We will meet again in the now.

The hands of the clock will have shifted and show the 3.30 position, but it'll still be now. We may also have, as we go into this week, periods of silence. Thank you.

Be as you are. Be as you are. Be as you are.

Be as you are. Be as you are. Be as you are.

Be as you are. Be as you are. Be as you are.

Be as you are. Be as you are. Be as you are.

That's the wake up call. I'm not implying that anybody here is asleep. Wake up, awakening, the normal state of consciousness is the normal state of consciousness, which is thought, and then there's the state of sleep.

And what the normal state of consciousness is relative to sleep, the awakened state of consciousness is relative to the normal state. The normal state, in other words, and this is why for thousands of years the term awakening has been used, the normal state of consciousness compared to the awakened state of consciousness is very much like sleep, or rather dreams, dreamland. So the awakening is simply the awakening out of the dream of thought, out of being totally immersed in that dream.

Not that thought does not arise, it still can arise and does arise, and yet you dwell beyond thought in the state of presence, stillness, alert, awake, stillness, in which nothing is known and yet everything is known. So we've looked at a portal this morning, a portal into that state in which you're no longer trapped in thought, then that portal is surrender to what is. There's another portal that is continuously here, and that is the state of consciousness consciousness, out of which these words come, nothing personal about it.

Nobody's achievement, nobody's attainment. That would be to create another form identity around that which is beyond form. There's a state of consciousness out of which these words come.

You can tune into that, so to speak, I'm using language loosely, you can't use concise terms here, you can be receptive, tune into, become sensitive to the state of consciousness that could be described, because you might ask how you become alert and aware of an underlying field of stillness, one could say, out of which the words come, sound comes, it's gone, they're all pointers, point out of. And usually when you sit here only identified with thought, you would only be interested in that which arises, which is the words, and you would always be a little bit impatient for the next word to come, the next sentence, the next concept, the next idea, and you would find that we are not proceeding fast enough. The flow of information is insufficient for the mind, so you can detect, if you can detect within yourself a certain impatience or restlessness, which implies not enough, more please, more, more, that is, trapped in mind, trapped in thought, trapped in a thought-based sense of self, looking for more, and not getting enough here, and if on the other hand a state of alert presence, of just being here, in that open, spacious alertness, if that arises, then you become attuned to that field out of which the words come, the unconditioned consciousness, then of course every word carries some past, words come, words are old, every word is old, and yet something of the unconditioned flows even into the words, and then the words have a certain power that goes beyond any informational value that they may have, or not have. So, a portal that is continuously here, but it could elude you if you only look for content during these talks, if you only look for the content in these talks, then you would be missing that dimension that really matters here.

The content is only a relatively small part of the talks, so you become attuned to an underlying field, one could say, another way of putting it, you become aware of an underlying stillness here, whether you perceive it as external, or internal, or don't know where exactly it is, a certain stillness, and you notice that underneath the words, and in between the words, there is a field of stillness, that noticing, and you might, at first it might appear that that field of stillness is in this room, which to some extent is true, it might appear that that field of stillness comes from this form, which to some extent is true, but really, the moment you notice it, it's in you, because it can only notice itself, it can only know itself, not through thought can you know, or even notice, that field of stillness, because that field of stillness is beyond thought and beyond form, and thought is form, so through thought you have no access to it, and this is why the miracle happens, the moment you are aware of it, you have gone within yourself, beyond thought, and you have entered a dimension of consciousness that is unconditioned, whereas the whole realm of thought, or the mind, is the conditioned, consciousness has taken form as thought forms, the conditioned consciousness, what arises here is the dimension of consciousness that we could call unconditioned, and it is there, the moment you notice, become aware of, not so much one could say, what is there, but you become aware, and this is a slightly mystical statement, you become aware of what is not there, and ordinarily, in this world, nobody is aware, not very few, are aware of that dimension that underlies the conditioned, the vastness that underlies the conditioned, that is not separate from who you are, that is who you are, but you can never know it in the conventional sense, people look for self-realization and believe it is a state of knowing something about themselves that they hadn't known before, it is not a state of knowing something in a dualistic subject-object relationship, I know myself, you've already split yourself into two, in that sense you cannot know that unconditioned, it cannot be known as it cannot become an object of knowledge, so you cannot, because it is ultimately you, you cannot become an object of knowledge to yourself, because whatever you can know in the conventional sense is knowing something about yourself, which is the form in which you appear, and so you would know something about yourself if you underwent ten years of psychoanalysis, you would have a lot of knowledge about yourself, things you didn't know before, going back to childhood, reactive patterns, all kinds of very interesting things, and so, after ten years, the psychoanalysts might say, we have come to the end of our treatment sessions, your self-knowledge is now complete, and he would hand you a file, a huge file, containing all the self-knowledge, and you would then know a lot about yourself, and you could say, I know everything about myself, and then you might think, okay, I must be self-realized, but you only forgot when you said, I know everything about myself, you forgot about the I, who is it that knows, and what is it that it knows, it knows the conditioned, it's forgotten the knower, the knower, can the knower be known, no, the knower is the knowing itself, it cannot know itself, becomes very hard to talk about these things, because all language moves in the realm of duality, even every sentence structure has a subject and an object, this is why sometimes in teachings, paradoxical statements are used, or metaphor, or symbols, it's never it, it's maybe a little bit like that. So here, we enter, or we allow to arise, that dimension of consciousness, that is the prerequisite of all knowing, before any, before you can know any object of knowledge, there's the field of knowing, and the miracle is, be careful with words, don't think that they are the absolute truth, the miracle is, you can know yourself as that, not in a dualistic sense.

Let's forget about this now, let's return to, becoming simply alert to an underlying dimension of stillness, so that your total attention is not absorbed by that which arises, the words, and of course, no word is ever going to satisfy you on that level, so when you are fascinated by sense objects and mind objects that arise, not one is ever going to satisfy you, and you would always, any statement that I can make wouldn't be quite enough yet, there must be more, that's not the answer.

Yes, and then what? So you're no longer simply fascinated by that which arises, here it's the words, your total attention is not drawn into that, in other words, you're not, your incarnation into that form is not, is no longer total, because you reincarnate, so to speak, in a wider sense, every time you identify with a thought stream totally, you have reincarnated into that thought stream, your sense of self is completely in it, so you continuously reincarnate into arising phenomena, it could be external things, experiences, and you're totally, it matters absolutely, and so, one could say, the deeper sense of coming to the end of reincarnation is to no longer reincarnate into total identification with form, into seeking yourself, or believing that yourself is in a form, and here we are speaking at the moment primarily of thought forms, so to, this compulsion to reincarnate always into the next thought stream, to be totally fascinated by it, and always needing the more to make your reincarnation complete, and never getting there, that's, we are moving, that is being trapped in that normal state of consciousness, and that is still the majority of, on the planet, is still trapped in that, but very powerfully, something else is arising now, and it's arising here, so the words, you give them attention, but they no longer have your, they no longer have your total attention, there's some attention that you give to the words, but you also give attention to the underlying stillness, even as you listen, and of course, the moment you do that, the unconditioned consciousness is there in you, and your mind becomes still, without losing consciousness, you're fully aware, you're aware of the silence, but what really is that silence, or rather that stillness, the stillness is the unconditioned consciousness, awareness itself, and you're aware of that, now that sounds as if it were dualistic, but it's only because I'm using language, you're aware of awareness, when you are aware of stillness, and the moment you pay attention to stillness, you've become still, and that might at first be like a phenomenon outside of you, that you are attentive to, oh, and you may notice there is a certain alertness that comes with that awareness of stillness, and you cannot be aware of stillness through thinking, thought, stillness does not exist for thought, thought can come in subsequently and say, oh, that stillness, how nice, or it can say, oh, you see, you've lost it already, I had it, I had it, only a moment ago, how can I get back to it, that was such a wonderful experience, and it's not really an experience, because it is, the stillness is always there, so during these days here, learning what that means, to be aware of that underlying dimension, not only in these sessions, and then when you leave here, become totally absorbed again, or reincarnate again totally into arising thought streams and sense perceptions, but carry that awareness, awareness of underlying awareness, I'm speaking of things that you can't speak of, that's why it's sometimes a little funny, you carry that with you, not only here, although you can perhaps sense it more powerfully in these sessions, but then you walk out into, out there, into the gardens, and the river, and there, certain perceptions arise, and you're aware of those perceptions, and some of them will be very beautiful, and occasionally some may be ugly, this is the world, and you watch, and you, underlying the sense perception is a field of alert, still presence, in which the sense perception happens. And that means the compulsion to reincarnate into another thought stream is suddenly not there, you're happy not to reincarnate for a while into another thought stream, the true joy arises out of that state of presence, there is a very subtle joy in that, which in some teachings is called happiness, but I wouldn't use that word, it might even be a wrong translation, that joy is in essence an intrinsic aspect of yourself. I sometimes call it the joy of being, and so it does not depend on what forms are arising at this moment. So there is, you enjoy the play of forms, but the joy does not come from the forms.

If the joy comes from the forms, it's not joy, it's pleasure. Pleasure is something you derive because a new form has come in and makes you feel good for a while, and then it leaves you and makes you feel bad, or the good turns into bad. So if a form gives you joy, it's not really the deepest, the true joy that is an intrinsic part of your self nature, it gives you pleasure.

But pleasure exists in the realm of opposites, and what gives you pleasure will also give you pain, either because it leaves you or because it turns into its opposite, such as in a relationship, marriage, divorce, pleasure, pain. Or in business, gain, loss, and so Ramana Maharshi said, and of course that is a translation, and it may not be absolutely correct translation, happiness is your true nature. I would re-translate it, and perhaps in the original what he said is closer to that, joy is your true nature.

But don't look for joy, you would create some new object, mind object, you don't need to look for it, no, simply do not reincarnate continuously. And it's so simple, these sessions are helpful, and they are helpful beyond words, the words are helpful pointers, but there's much more to these sessions than the words. And so, be alert here to that dimension that is beyond the words, because that dimension is also beyond thought.

And that is where we are going, to know what that is, which one could describe as consciousness free of thought. And this is the next step, one could say, in the evolution of human consciousness. Which until now, we've just come to the end of thought, which means humanity, human consciousness being totally dominated, run by, identified with thought.

It started, as the myth tells us, in the Garden of Eden, which one could say is a symbolic representation of the arising of thought. They ate of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, evaluate, judge, the arising of thought, loss of Eden, and I'm told, the translation of that word, Eden is place of joy. Thought arose, and it was a great thing, and gradually, over many, many thousands of years, identification with thought came in, self and thought became one.

Mankind had to move through that. Now, that state of consciousness has become more and more dysfunctional. Look at the history of the 20th century.

Dreadful. Madness. So the dysfunction becomes apparent now, because we are arriving at the end time.

You may have seen people walking around, I don't know, they may not happen in India, but in the West, with placards, the end is near, the end is nigh, we have arrived at the end. And perhaps they don't realize how right they are, when they say, we have arrived at the, well, perhaps they should put a little another word in, we have arrived at the end of time. Because to be identified with thought, totally, is also to be governed by time, past and future, to live exclusively through memory and anticipation, and all that that implies.

So, and a completely limited and false sense of identity. We are moving out of that. A new state of consciousness is emerging.

This teaching would be pointless, nobody would even hear it, if it were not emerging already. So, this form is no more than a midwife, a mid husband, mid wife, I don't know, simply to help along the birth process. And not, I'm not here to make it happen, that would be frustrating.

Why aren't, and you are not here to make it happen in yourself, that would be equally frustrating. And you would come to the end of the six days, or seven days here, and say, I was looking for this great spiritual experience, and somehow it didn't happen. I was looking and looking and looking, and because you were looking for something, and you missed nothing.

So, you were looking to reincarnate into some experience, and didn't get it, or if you got it, maybe you got it, and say, oh, I had such a great experience there. And then you are back wherever you live, and then a few weeks later, it's wearing off. Oh, I wish I could get that back.

Where is it now? That was so great, and then you think, maybe I need to go back to India, back to India. That's where it is.

So, the essence of this gathering is very simple, but also very subtle. It can, it easily eludes you if you are too much in your mind. So, not only here, but also out there, be there as a field of alert presence.

That which you sense here, the underlying field, and know what it means, the beauty of this, to be free of thought. But don't look for that state. It comes by itself.

And in one moment, you are free of a million years of conditioning, as the unconditioned arises. Because if you had to undo the conditioned bit by bit, you would never see the end of it. There's so much.

So the unconditioned arises as the state of consciousness that is free of thought. That all the great teachings, not so directly, point to, some directly, some indirectly. When Ramana Maharshi was asked, how do we measure our progress on the spiritual path?

How do we know if we are making progress, they asked him. And he said, and some people don't like this, they say, no, no, he didn't really say that, but it's there. The degree of absence of thoughts is your measure of progress on the spiritual path.

It's as simple as that. And then some people say, no, what he really meant was, who is talking? Thought.

Trying to convince everybody else that that's not what he said. But be careful here not to make the state that is free of thinking into another future state to be achieved. Because you can't achieve it in that way in the future.

Not as something to be added to you. It is an enormous, the greatest renunciation, and the only ultimately true renunciation is not so much the renunciation of worldly things, the renunciation of sexuality, the renunciation of possessions, the renunciation of certain kinds of food, whatever it may be. The ultimate renunciation is, I'll say it, to renounce thought.

And thought, it says, tries to convince you that in that renunciation you would become, you would revert to the state of the cabbage, the vegetable. And it says this is not a desirable state. And that is true.

You don't want being a cabbage. It's beautiful for the cabbage. But the cabbage lives at one with the totality.

All vegetative life, all nature lives totally in the state of oneness still. So it's totally right for the cabbage to be the cabbage. But it is not the destiny of humans to revert to the vegetative or animal stage.

Although compared to humans, nature and animals are very, very sane compared to most of human life. There's enormous sanity there because they have not left, they haven't gone out into more and more highly differentiated form and form identification. They haven't left the source, they haven't gone that far from the source as humans have.

And so, yes, there's great, every animal is so rooted in being still compared to neurotic humans. Wow, just look how an animal moves and is itself, completely itself, not trying to be something, it is. But we are not going back there.

The animal also is free of thought, although occasionally the beginnings of thought movements can be observed in certain animals. We go beyond thought. One could say we are rising above thought where we do not lose the ability to think.

Simply means we are no longer reduced by thinking. We are no longer trapped in thought. We can now use thought.

Thought will operate when it's needed. It will be applied to a particular situation. But whenever even a situation that needs to be resolved, a challenge that arises, and it can only arise in the now, before thought arises, attention is given to it.

And that attention is the state of thoughtless awareness. Pure, you're looking at the totality of the situation in stillness, alert, alive stillness. There's a looking.

In that looking, enormous intelligence operates, and I'm looking in a wider sense, it may not necessarily be through the eyes. Attention is giving to the situation, complete attention in stillness. And then, perhaps, either spontaneous action or thought that then leads to action arises.

Spontaneous realization, perhaps in the form of thought, what needs to be done, or action without the intermediary of thought arises, and it's right for that situation. So thought can still operate. It already does in all creative people, people who create in whatever their field of activity is.

They become highly creative, and many of them don't know that they have the ability, even if it may only last for a few seconds, to be in the state of thoughtless awareness. That is the creative state. And there are many people, those who are creative, relatively few compared to the majority, they don't even know that this is how they create, and some of them do know it.

That it arises out of the state of still, alert presence, which is the higher intelligence, the unconditioned intelligence that operates. And then the insight comes, or the doing happens. But we are going beyond that.

We are not trying to do something with it, and those people have access to it in the limited field of their activity. The moment they move away from that, they are just as neurotic as everybody else. So we are moving beyond thought, not back, we step beyond thought.

This is humanity's destiny, and it's urgent now, not in the sense of, oh, we must get there. It's urgent in the sense that there is an intensity now to the arising consciousness, because the madness that is the dysfunction of the old consciousness is also getting accelerating. It gets worse, and at the same time, the new is already arising.

The two movements, the old still not even having reached yet the end of its madness, and the new arising at the same time. The old is still much more visible in this world. The madness of the old state of consciousness, with its need for conflict and problems, and the violence that arises out of that state, and the immeasurable suffering that humans inflict on each other and on themselves out of that state.

That madness is continuing on the planet, you only need to watch the news on TV or read the paper. That's a continuation of what we have seen in the 20th century and before that. And the new is arising, not so much visible on the surface of things yet, rarely mentioned in the media.

Occasionally it is mentioned already here and there. This is why we are here, simply not to make it happen, but to allow it to happen. We are simply opening the door wider, so that, unless we are not offering resistance to that anymore.

So, your practice here is continuous, but don't make impossible demands upon yourself.

Of course you will get drawn even here, back into mind streams, yes? You may reincarnate into a reactive mind stream.

And then a moment comes when suddenly there is an awakening out of that. Oh. As you can see, how clear, how obvious the difference between the states of the awakened state.

A moment ago you were in that heaviness, that dense energy. And suddenly you step out. And it's almost like having left, when you are on the plane, it goes through the clouds and suddenly the clouds are underneath you.

Oh, and there is vast, clear space. Infinite. And the clouds are still there, but you are not in them anymore.

Oh. And so, as you walk here, through the gardens, along the river, see if you can be in that state where the sense perception does not absorb your attention entirely. Nor the mental labels that arise to do with those sense perceptions, or to do with something totally different.

They don't absorb your attention totally. Attention remains free as the field of attention. In other words, you perceive in and through stillness, without needing to label everything immediately through the mind.

Of course, you know you're looking at this flower. You know it's a flower without having to tell yourself that this is a flower. You know it's beautiful without having to tell yourself that it's beautiful.

And so you realize that there is vast knowing beyond mental labels and concepts. And then you know far more than you could ever know through labels or concepts, because you sense there is a depth to that which we call flower and an aliveness to that which we call flower. That mystery that is not explained by the label flower at all.

That mystery that is covered up by the label flower and gives you the delusion that now you know what it is. Just a sound. You've made a sound that has come out of your mouth, or you've uttered the sound in your mind, and that gives you the delusion that you know what that is.

Children are told that when they learn a language, the delusion is reinforced every time you tell a child, that's called such and such, I have forgotten the names of flowers. What's that? Gladioli.

This is a gladioli, if that's what it is. And the child will believe you. Dreadful.

Dreadful. So what can you do? Do you tell a child, don't call it anything, that doesn't work either.

But you might say to a child, well, look at it, smell it, touch it. Look. And then, as an afterthought, you can say, oh, by the way, we call it such and such.

Instead of saying, it is such and such. Then that creates some distance from the label, so that the child doesn't totally believe in that label. Because then you get more and more trapped in concepts and labels until you reach the age of, then finally at 18, you're totally imprisoned, you've been through the system that has done it even more to you, and you're totally imprisoned in a conceptualized reality of mental labels that concern both the world around you, and they're all conditioning, all the surrounding culture has conditioned you with whatever mental labels they've put into you.

And you inhabit a conceptualized reality, not knowing how dead your universe has become, how dead and deadened your reality has become. And you live equally in a conceptualized sense of self. You make yourself into mental concepts, and so this is the essence of not knowing who you are.

That's the essence of this false self. Once you have a false self, nothing is seen as it is, and everything is misinterpreted through that conditioning. Everything is distorted and deadened through that conditioning.

And that's how people live. And that is, our entire civilization has come out of that. And is it surprising how mad the civilization is?

Of course it's not surprising considering the state of consciousness out of which it has come. So we are stepping out of that, the compulsion to label continuously, and so you move here, you walk through the gardens and along the river, and what arises is the state that is free of the need to label. And should a label arise in you as you walk, which is a thought, you recognize it as just a thought and not it.

And then it arises and passes and you're back in just... And then somebody comes towards you on the path, walking, and some mental judgment comes in concerning the form of this being. And you recognize it as a thought, no more.

You no longer completely believe in it, you're not completely in it anymore. You allow that to be also. So gaps arise in which there are no labels.

In which seemingly you no longer know anything. And that's why it's a little bit frightening for some people to enter that realm because it seems at first as if you no longer knew. How can I need to know what's going on here?

I need to judge it in some way, classify it in some way? No. And you see how beautiful, powerful, intelligent and deep that state is of not labeling.

And great intelligence operates here. But it is not the limited intelligence of the human mind. It's only a small aspect of the vastness of intelligence that ultimately you are.

So it's a little bit like you become like a child whose mind is not yet totally burdened by labels but a child who is already very much looking at everything because everything is new but hasn't got many accumulated labels yet. And that child looks in a state of great awe and wonder because everything is so alive and new. It hasn't got enough labels yet to deaden the entire world.

And the child is open and alert. And again, this is only to give you a little pointer. We are not going back to that.

We are going beyond where it has certain similarities with that state that a child is in whose mind is not yet totally burdened by labels. It has certain similarities with the state that an animal is in who is in a state with great connectedness with the one. The whole of plant life exists in such deep connectedness with the totality in such deep stillness being totally and completely and utterly itself, the tree.

So, and this is why Jesus said, truly I tell you, you must become like little children if you want to enter the kingdom of heaven. It is similar to the state of that child in that age and yet it is beyond because you've already moved through thought and you've come out the other end. But that one could say, that innocent perception, fresh, new, alive.

And there you can enjoy the play of phenomena. And there's such a wonderful play of phenomena in this country. Such multiplicity of forms and life forms and human beings.

Amazing. And so you walk as just an aware presence, a field of aware presence. And you know yourself as that awareness, not conceptually.

You perceive through stillness. With occasional interruptions of labels and there's not a problem. Because you know there's mind movement and then it subsides.

Space again. Another mind movement. It subsides.

Fine. Not a problem. And then perhaps a big mind movement comes and for one hour you're completely in it.

Perhaps it got triggered by something that wasn't quite right in your room or something that in your room something happened. And, ah! And then finally it comes to an end.

I must get out of here. Yes, you can get out or you can stay. Whatever it is.

It's fine. If you stay, you can surrender here. If you get out, you surrender there.

So the awakening, this is what it is. Out of it is a million years of conditioning. Out of mind.

And that's where the teaching comes from. Otherwise I would have to prepare what I'm going to tell you. That would be a lot of work.

I have to feed them information for six, seven days. No. It comes out of the stillness.

It does the teaching. I don't have to do much. And it's possible to live in such a way that whatever you do is almost, one could say, being done for you.

You're no longer in a struggle and conflict relationship with the world. Needing to complete myself by getting somewhere. Achieving something, becoming someone.

And suddenly it's done for you. And this is why Jesus used the term awakening. There are quite a few parables about staying awake, not going to sleep.

Buddha, the root of the word, means awake. One who is awake. There's a beautiful title, a book by Krishnamurti, called The Awakening of Intelligence.

And of course, that is what it is. It is the awakening of true intelligence. Not the limited ability to solve IQ puzzles.

Nothing wrong with that either. But much greater, vaster than that. Beautiful, we have the teaching of Krishnamurti that points to the same.

Not quite as directly, because he liked to teach through negation. So he asked, let's inquire. Can we get there through thinking?

Can we get there through thought? Is it possible to have... And so he asked more and more questions about whether thought can get you there.

And of course it can't. And he wouldn't agree with it, of course, but the entire teaching tells you, don't think. Rise above thought.

But that would be a positive teaching. His tradition was negation, which is a powerful teaching also. Now, in those of you in whom this is arising strongly already, those of you, and in some of you it is arising very strongly already, in others it's just beginning to arise, in those of you in whom it is arising strongly, you are able to say no to thought by saying yes to what is.

No to thought, to simply by choice say, I'm not thinking. If this is not willpower, it doesn't work. To suppress thought through sheer willpower can work for a little while, but the kettle will continue to boil, you're holding the lid down, and suddenly thought will erupt again, more strongly than ever.

So that doesn't work. But in those in whom it is arising strongly, you can simply choose to step out of thought and say, okay. And this is why Nisargadatta Maharaj, the teacher, defined the meditative state, and he was only talking, he must have been speaking to one or two people at the time, he defined the meditative state as the radical refusal to harbor thoughts.

And when you look at a photo of his, you can see how radical he is. He was speaking at the time to certain people. This does not yet apply to everyone.

The arising presence is not yet strong enough in everyone to be able to say, this is true for me, that I can simply radically refuse to harbor thoughts. I'm not having any thoughts, that's it. Now that looks like an act of choice.

And then of course you come into conflict with those teachers who say, there's nobody there to choose, and so on and so on. Of course it looks like choice because it still looks as if there was somebody here, there is a form here, and that form does something, and from the perspective of form, it looks like an act of choice. I refuse to harbor thoughts.

And then you walk through the gardens, refusing to think. That looks like choice, doesn't it? Because you could choose to think, but you choose not to think.

But how is it that you can make that choice? You can only make that choice because presence is arising in you, and it's only because of the arising presence that you can say, I'm making that choice. So who is choosing?

If presence were not arising, there would be no choice. Presence is beyond the person. Presence is the evolutionary impulse of the universe moving through you.

The totality, the one. So, of course, we have the relativity of language. On one level, it is true to say you have a choice.

On another level, it is not true at all to say that you have a choice. See, no statement is absolutely true ever. You have to see where it is at, what perspective, what level.

So both statements, you have a choice and you have no choice, are equally true. And the mind doesn't like that. This is so wonderful to be part of the evolution of consciousness on the planet.

Through this little form, it wants to flower. And you thought you were a little person. Needing this and needing that and protecting myself against this and that.

Now, as the unconditioned arises, as the stillness arises, through which you perceive the world and allow it to be this moment, allow it to be that realm of stillness, that dimension of consciousness, is also the dimension of the sacred. This is the only dimension where the sacred is and dwells. It's always there, but it's concealed.

The sacred, the dimension of the sacred, is always concealed in now. Why is it concealed? Because you are not in the now.

The now is obscured to you by mental noise. But the moment your attention enters now, you realize the now is always sacred, no matter what form it takes. The sacredness doesn't lie so much in the form, although it includes the form, there's a greater vastness to now.

And that is the realm of the sacred, that space of now. So there's a sacred river here. When you go down there, you can honor the sacred river by being, by perceiving it, and being with it in the state of still, alert presence.

Not conceptualize it, label it.

And that means the now is more important than past or future, because you realize it is life itself. In the normal state of consciousness, certainly past and future are more important than now. So the normal state of consciousness, which is unconsciousness, is characterized by that, the implicit assumption or belief that past and future are more important and more powerful than now.

And then a moment comes when you realize the now is all there ever is. In truth, life can only be now. Then you honor life by honoring this moment.

And then, whereas before the now existed in some obscure region on the periphery of your life, you were only peripherally aware of it because you were so absorbed in past and future, now past and future become peripheral. Yes, they still have, to some extent, they are needed to move in this world. You as this form, you can't get out of that, where you seem to be flowing in that stream of time, which is like a train you're on, and it won't stop.

You can't get off. I recently saw people that I hadn't seen in 15 or 20 years. 20, I think it was.

It's a little shocking what time does to the human form. On that level, yes, it seems to exist. And I almost felt inclined to say, my God, what did time do to you?

Yes, on the level of form, you as this form, you are subject to time and subject to the impermanence, which implies time, short-lived, fleeting, all forms. Everything, every form is quite fleeting. When you're totally identified with the form, you don't really know that.

You only exist in a state of fear and desire because you're identified, you don't know.

And it's an amazing realization when you realize how fleeting all forms are, that knowing is already the beginning of liberation, not as an intellectual fact or belief, but to see how short-lived all forms are. And when you grow older, you see it very clearly, when you reach the age of 60, 65, 70, 75, people around you begin to die, one after another.

My mother says there's nobody left now that I know. They're all gone. And then, of course, you see it everywhere, in every natural form.

Now the seeing of that, when you see it, realize it, that is already liberating because that seeing arises from that which is beyond form. If the entire world were green, the color green would not exist because there would be nothing to differentiate it from. If everything were fleeting, you wouldn't even know it.

But the fact that you know means there's something that is not fleeting. And that is why to contemplate the short-lived, impermanent nature of all forms is already liberating. And when it's contemplated and allowed to be, and this may mean at this moment, a form that's right in front of you shows signs of the passing of time.

It's become wrinkled. It could be a mango, it could be an apple, or it could be the human form. It's very similar, what happens to an apple is what happens to the human form.

What time does to an apple and what time does to a human. Very similar when you look at a fresh apple and a fresh young 20-year-old. All shiny and then time does its work.

And 50 years later, which isn't very much, it's all wrinkled. But with humans, there's the potential in that for the flowering of consciousness through the fading form. Now, I don't know about the apple.

The apple can only speak for itself. But I know that for humans, that is a great potential is hidden here and there's another portal here into the liberated state. And that portal is this form that is moving towards dissolution.

Of course, all forms are. And suddenly you see it, not only here, but you see it everywhere. And when there's no reaction, you allow that there's something incredibly peaceful in watching the form arise and dissolve.

And that which knows that is beyond form. That is why there are certain works in literature, they never talk about anything that is beyond form. But they show you the impermanent nature of life and they are spiritual works.

It is already spiritual, you don't need to talk about anything that is beyond the impermanent nature. Just to show you the impermanent nature is spiritual. Because it makes you into the seer of that.

So there are the Shakespeare sonnets, talk a lot about how beauty fades, how quickly, what time does to it. And to read it can be a spiritual experience because it puts you into the position of seeing impermanence. And even something that is not, you might think it's just entertainment, and on one level it is.

Even a film like Titanic, where you see all these forms that die and at the very end they appear again like actors on stage. They played their role. And you see how death, you're watching death.

So one could say what we really talk about is death. A form dissolves. Death.

Now there is a saying in a sacred scripture which says die before you die. And there is deep truth in that and in a way this is another perspective on why we are here, what this gathering is about. One could put it like this.

Death will find you, it's found you already, because we are all slowly dying. And eventually it will catch up with you. Now find death before it finds you.

And that's the essence of spiritual practice, is finding death, embracing death. There is another state of consciousness, which is the end of identification with form. The end of deriving your sense of self, identity, from form.

Because that is the normal state of consciousness. And the identification with form is twofold. The physical form, identifying with the appearance of the body.

And some people have that very strongly, that a large part of their sense of self is to do with identification with the physical form. And then you have the psychological form that you identify with as thought structures and emotions that accompany those thought structures. Accumulated content of the mind, images of who I am, what the world has told me about who I am, the surrounding culture has told me about who I am.

Or I may have reacted against what the surrounding culture has told me about who I am, but I'm still not free in that, because even the reaction is a conditioned reaction. So there's the psychological form of me, which is me and my story. Which may be mostly a personal story, it may be mixed up with a collective story of us, me and my tribe, my nation, my religion.

It's the story of me that is the psychological form of me. And everybody has their story that is the me. And everybody knows that the me lives in a state of dissatisfaction with its story.

It is a characteristic of the story not to be at ease or fulfilled for very long. It is not in the nature of that story-based identity to be at peace, fulfilled, or free. The very structure of it goes against that.

The very structure of that kind of identity doesn't allow it. It's based on fighting something or someone, being at odds with something or someone. It's based on a sense of separateness.

It needs that. So the identification with the body, sometimes they become very much mixed. You may identify with the appearance of the physical body, and the mental images may form as me, as such and such.

So especially people who have a beautiful body or good appearance, their psychological me is strongly bound up with their mental image of body. And for a while that gives people a very pleasant sense of self. Sense of self always is comparative, whether it's to do with body or with other identifications.

You will compare yourself to others and then see where you fit in, in your identity. There is an attempt to be more than others in the story-based. And if you cannot be more because you're better, greater, no more, look better, or stronger, if you cannot be more there, then what's left to you, you can be more miserable than others.

And that also works. And some people have that strongly. If they can't create a satisfying identity in having more knowledge or more beauty or more physical strength or more money than others, then at least I can feel more miserable and have a self-image of one that has been treated unfairly by life.

That's very satisfying. Because now you know who you are, so to speak. And then you seek to confirm that story-based, image-based identity by selectively interpreting life around you.

You see only, you begin to see only those things that conform with your sense of identity. There's selective interpretations of reality and selective perception. And everything that you perceive as you move about your life is totally filtered and distorted then through the self-image of me.

And only those things that conform to it are allowed in that strengthen the self-image. And so everything is interpreted according to that. And you think that's reality, but it's the conditioned, heavy filters through which you interact with people.

And then, so it becomes like a script in here that's been put into here, and you act it out. And that becomes then your life situation, your life drama, your life story. And you go through the movements looking for more of you through more, adding more, more future, never finding it.

And then it could happen that you're suddenly confronted with death close to you, someone close to you. Or the possibility of imminent death that might happen to this form. Or you're suddenly confronted with great loss in your life.

Which is another form of death, something you had identified with. Status, possessions, relationships, great loss. And suddenly forms dissolve.

Forms in which there was the self. The self was in those forms. And those forms dissolve through some disaster, some form of death.

And sometimes it affects even the mind forms with which you had identified. Because the trauma and the shock is such that it shakes the rigid mind patterns that before were running you and pretending to be you. And suddenly those also die.

And you don't know who you are anymore, you can't explain it anymore. Before you thought you had these ready opinions when people asked you, you would put out your opinions, you knew it all. And suddenly something comes and suddenly the explanations don't suffice anymore.

Death, that wasn't supposed to happen. Some religious people begin to doubt their beliefs when somebody close to them suddenly dies. That wasn't supposed to happen.

I had a contract with God and there was not supposed to be any death. Form dies. Thought forms die.

And the whole story based identity can come to an end in the face of great loss or death. Your whole story doesn't make sense anymore. Any great loss or death in your life has that potential, but not always is that potential realized.

It can also happen that great loss or disaster can make the story more heavy, more miserable and more unhappy. But the greatest potential is always death and wonderful portal is when a form dissolves. Or you see the dissolving form, it may not have dissolved yet, but it's moving there, so the portal is beginning to open.

And suddenly a form is gone and it leaves a hole, an emptiness. Someone close to you dies, you lose your entire possessions, whatever it may be. A hole is left.

There was the beautiful fabric of your existence, your life story, maybe it was all in place. Because some people, for a few years in their lives, they have it all arranged so neatly, that you look at their lives and say, how is it possible? Everything in his or her life seems to work so well.

It's rare, but occasionally you see it, it's like a picture book. A family, two children, both doing well. Happy marriage, beautiful house, good job, promotions, status in society, two or three big cars.

It's too much. Usually, when you scratch and look beyond the surface, you find something else. But let's just say that yes, they are happy in that they have neatly arranged their life situation in such a way that everything seems to be working.

And it's only a question of time before something in there collapses. Because the structures that they have created that look so solid, all these life insurance policies, or huge corporations are sustaining me with billions of dollars behind them, and I have shares in that. Surely my life is now secure, and my family's life is secure.

There's a true foundation. And then time does something to the seemingly solid structures. It's such a shock when the disaster happened on September 11th.

This huge structure, so solid, and it took only a few madmen, and they collapsed. And so, to some, it's only a question of time before something comes in, and somewhere, the solidity of those structures will reveal itself as illusory. It'll start to crumble somewhere.

And if you've had 10 or 15 years living in the illusion that these things are so solid, then it's a great shock you're not even prepared for it. That was supposed to happen. I was walking north of Los Angeles in a little park, and there was an old building that had burned down.

It was part of an estate, and it burned down 40, 50 years ago into a wild garden. There were only the ruins. This beautiful wild garden had grown up around it, trees growing inside the building.

And this is, nothing is solid. It's easier to realize that, that nothing is solid. That's why we are here.

And that's why this country has produced so many sages and enlightened beings. Because it's so obvious that things are not solid, and that it's so obvious that the physical structures are short-lived, and there isn't that sense of solidity around you. So I was walking there, and there was actually, the city council of Malibu had put up a sutra.

As you entered the garden, and the sutra read, Danger, all structures are unstable. And so I read the sutra and said, thank you. And then to walk there was a teaching to see, it's deeply, a deeply spiritual thing to walk around a decaying structure.

It's returning, for it was form once, differentiated, and it's returning into oneness. It's halfway between form and no form. Anything that is decaying is halfway between form and no form.

And that's why when you are there and allow it to be and watch, it's liberating. It liberates you from form. So what could also liberate you from form is the realization that your own physical vehicle is subject to that.

It may even be imminent. And that is a great portal, to know that you have little or no future as this form identity. Of course, there's great fear in that.

It can be potentially you could contract totally in a state of fear, but the potential is there for it to become an opening. And what arises, what then flowers through the decaying form is unconditioned consciousness. The form is decaying, and the flowering is there.

So I've seen it, there was a beautiful being in Vancouver, Joyce Frazee, passed away recently. She had come to many of our gatherings, and she herself had become an effective teacher. And her form, through an illness, began to dissolve.

And as it began to dissolve, and she found it more and more difficult to move, she would still come to our gatherings. More and more, the light of consciousness was shining through the fading form. And looking into her eyes was beautiful.

I hope somebody took a photo of her so that you can look into her eyes and see that the light of the unconditioned was shining through her eyes. And through her entire form, it was shining through. And that is the beauty, when death comes, that's the greatest portal.

And she was able to surrender to that, so it was open wide. And it didn't matter anymore how much longer this form would be here. The flowering had happened.

It's flowered. The whole evolutionary impulse of the universe is towards that. And somehow, and I cannot explain it in words, it's beyond, we don't even attempt to fully, to really understand what is behind that, it's far beyond understanding.

But just to say that there is the evolutionary impulse of the universe is behind that. Consciousness wants to flower through the form, the human. It will flower through any form.

It doesn't say, you are more worthy, I will choose this form because you are more worthy. It flowers where there is a transparency, where the form, the rigid mind structures give way. They die first.

And identification with that, me, mind made self, goes. And this is why we are here, because as you sit here, you are finding death before death finds you. And these, the heavy, the mind structures that you are identified with as me, the thought forms die.

So the flowering is happening here before death finds you. You embrace death already. But it doesn't matter when it happens.

And consciousness will move through. It could be a criminal, killed several people, inflicted suffering on others, and of course on himself. And in that midst of hell, in his cell, waiting for execution, suddenly, inside, the entire structure of the self, mental, emotional structures, dissolves.

Because the suffering is unbearable. And suddenly, something shines through. And now he doesn't care anymore whether the execution happens or not.

And there have been cases like that. There was a woman in Texas two or three years ago, who had killed two people with an axe. She had been a prostitute, a drug addict, and with her lover, killed two people with an axe.

And she was on death row for several years. And at some point, something happened in her, and surrender happened. And suddenly there was a being of great softness, beauty, through.

The strange thing is, there was not even guilt anymore, because guilt is still to be identified with unconscious movements as me, to derive your sense of self from the movement of unconsciousness, and saying, I did that, that was me. She saw the dreadful nature of that, but it no longer disturbed her peace. That wasn't her at all.

That was not the consciousness that had now emerged. And then she was executed. She interpreted it in a Christian sense, I believe, because that was her surrounding culture.

When this happens, sometimes when people speak about it, and tell others about what happened to them, they may use certain words that correspond to their language or culture. But when you look beyond the words, you will see that they all point to the same. And there are some of those to whom it happens, who can't even speak about it.

They just look at you, and you look at them. They may be uneducated, they may not have much to say. And yet you look, and you see there's something that shines through that is deeper than a person, than any person could be.

The personal dimension has given way to that. And so it is always, it is sacred when that happens. But so far it's been relatively few human beings to whom this has happened.

No longer the case now. It is the destiny of all humans to go through that transformation. It is certainly your destiny, otherwise you wouldn't be here.

The purpose of your life is to enable that to come through you, and it's happening already. So we embrace the death that is here, when you surrender to what is. That's the greatest death.

The resisting me entity gives way. You can surrender through suffering, or you can surrender through, voluntarily, through the yes to what is. Which, as we saw yesterday, takes you beyond the form.

You are no longer reactive to a form. So the yes, that simple thing, takes you beyond form. And I pointed out yesterday, often, that which you say yes to is some form of limitation, because it's form.

And that in other cases, that which you say yes to may be some form of death, some form of loss. And that is particularly powerful. Any kind of loss or death leaves an emptiness behind, when a form is no longer there.

And you don't run away from that empty space. And it's an opening into the formless. One could say, every form obscures God.

And the death of the form enables God, which is the formless, one life, to shine through. Therefore, death has long been recognized as sacred in ancient cultures, who had not denied death. Whereas the modern culture, modern western civilization, denies death.

It's not, they don't know it's sacred, they don't even want to talk about it. They don't want to see a dead body. You can't, it's not allowed.

It's illegal to see a dead body. They would send you to a psychiatrist if you asked to see a dead body. There must be something wrong with you.

So death is hidden, because the western culture is totally identified with form, with mind. So the worst possible thing for it is death. Oh my.

And even in hospitals, they don't know anything about death, where death happens continuously. Old people's homes. Every old people's home, potentially, would be a spiritual center.

The greatest ashrams would be old people's homes, because that is the potential of old age. But it's not recognized yet. So, they would be the most sacred places.

So these ancient cultures have recognized the sacredness of death, not knowing perhaps why. Intuitively, they knew it to be sacred. But now you can see why it is sacred.

Because the formless shines through where there was the form. And that can happen when there's physical death, but it can also happen when you die psychologically to the me. And that is the spiritual transformation.

And that can happen through intense suffering, or through the power of a spiritual teaching. Or in many cases, a combination of both. And I suspect that in many of you, it's a combination of both.

You've had the suffering, otherwise you wouldn't have come. And now there's the power of spiritual teaching, which tells you, you don't need to suffer anymore. And you don't need anymore time before you can enter the surrendered state.

Why would you need time to enter the surrendered state? Do you need more knowledge before you can enter the surrendered state? Yes, but before I enter the surrendered state, I need to understand the universe completely.

You've had many pointers already. Everybody here has read scriptures, beautiful pointers. No, I have not yet fully understood the nature of the universe.

I need a few more years, says the mind. And the amazing thing is, a deep understanding happens, not in the way that the mind imagines it. A deep understanding of the universe happens as you enter the surrendered state.

There is a deep knowing there that is beyond concepts or labels. A knowing that the mind knows nothing of. A knowing that can even inform the mind, and the mind then can give spiritual teaching.

Because it is linked into that, the unmanifested, the unconditioned, the seed of all intelligence. Pre-form, before it becomes a thought, it's there. And then there are other things.

I need to sort out my life situation before I can surrender. Because my life situation does not look balanced. There are so many loose ends, I need to sort it out.

I have so many problems to deal with, I cannot surrender yet. And you don't realize that the act of surrender deals with all problems beautifully. Because in surrender, you enter a state that is free of problems.

And yes, you still have a life situation. But you don't inhabit a conceptual identity based on your life situation. Yes, you have three court cases against you.

Yes, your wife has filed for divorce. Yes, you are on your way to meeting your lawyer to file for bankruptcy. At this moment, you are at the bus stop, waiting for the bus, knowing that you have court cases, your wife, divorce proceedings, and you are going towards your lawyer for bankruptcy proceedings.

Potentially, you could be very unhappy. You could be, because your story isn't going the way it was supposed to go. It has deteriorated.

And potentially, you would carry the burden of an extremely unhappy conceptual sense of self based on your life circumstances, your life situation, and you derive all your identity and your sense of self from that. Your me would be very unhappy and very heavy and dense. And you would be talking to yourself as you stand at the bus stop.

And saying, this is what it had to come to. Now, 30 years of work, all for nothing. The whole marriage has been an illusion.

I've lost it all. All that work that I've put into it. I even have to give up my credit cards.

What? Who am I? Nobody will want to talk to me.

You are confirming to yourself that your life situation is very bad. Your sense of identity is derived from the story, the deteriorating story that you are telling yourself. And perhaps, you start telling others the very dreadful story of you.

And what happened. And they will confirm to you that, yes, you have a right to be very unhappy. Surely, destiny has dealt you a dreadful blow.

And you should be unhappy. Or you could be standing at the bus stop and allow your attention to move into this moment. And with that, a certain alertness arises.

In that alertness, you feel yourself breathing. You become aware of the totality of this moment as the sky above you, the air you are breathing, the ground you are standing on, the moving energy forms that go past you called cars, and there's a tree, and there's the field of alert attention in which all those things arise. And there comes the bus.

The bus. The doors open, and you get in, and you sit, and then the bus moves, and in that state of alertness, you look out of the window, and the wonder of phenomenal existence goes past you, all these forms of life. And you are there as an alert field of presence.

And you still remember where you're going, but you're fully there. Your identity is not derived anymore from a story you're telling yourself. That is a conceptual identity.

You're not denying that there are situations that you need to deal with, because you're dealing with it already. You're sitting on a bus going somewhere to deal with it. You're dealing with it already, and this is a beautiful moment.

You're sitting there, perceiving, and more than perceiving, being the still field through which the universe is being perceived. And when you're as that alert, you can sense the entire body as alive. We may have come to that also.

And then you get off the bus, and then you walk into a door which says, Attorney at Law, and you sit down, and then you say, okay, this is the situation, he says. Your bank balance is zero. Your debts are five million dollars.

I recommend that you file for bankruptcy. Okay. And then you hand over your American Express Platinum cards.

You've lost your cards. And perhaps your sense of self was somehow in each card a little bit. Because whenever you paid in expensive restaurants with the American Express Platinum cards, they respected you.

That is satisfying. You are getting that confirmation that you are somebody. But as you hand over the American Express and other cards, that leaves a little bit of an emptiness.

And as you accept that emptiness, it feels incredibly peaceful not to have these cards anymore. They're gone. Not that you formulate some kind of new belief that says, it is more pure not to have credit cards.

I am now more pure because that's you creating another thought structure to reincarnate into and derive a new sense of self from somebody who is now so spiritual that he has no credit cards anymore. That's worse than having credit cards. No, that's not how it is.

You simply allow the loss to be there. And that is suddenly the peace that you were already in deepens. And then you might have to give up your big home.

And again, there it is. And the next moment you have to sign something and it's gone. And then you might live in a trailer for a while.

And as you sit there, this moment is still sacred and beautiful. It doesn't really matter so much anymore the forms around you because you don't need the forms to reinforce or enhance your sense of self. Where is your sense of self?

It is the field of alive presence. You know yourself to be that still alive. Field of attention.

The forms, you don't need them for an identity anymore. So the trailer, of course it's not as comfortable as the big mansion. The space around you is smaller, confined.

It makes a noise when it rains at night on the roof. And yet, all it means is there's a different scenery around you. You're still sitting somewhere.

A little less soft than before. Less, a bit less. Not that much space.

But what do you do? You just have to step out and you have a lot of space. I'm seeing when your sense of self is not story-based anymore, you can accept the ups and downs and the gain and loss that come with every life story.

As the changing forms around you, the comings and goings, the play of opposites, gain, loss, fine. And there's peace in that. And the strange thing is, great, you are now aligned with the totality.

Before you had tied yourself into a little knot of a me. Life cannot flow very well through a knot. It can flow a little bit, but it's not a free flow.

And that knot was the me. Then the knot gets untied. Not that anything gets destroyed.

Simply the illusion of that little me against the universe goes when the knot is untied. Energy is just the flow of energy. The difference is, two people running to catch a train.

It's moving already. One is in great stress trying to get there, catch that train. The other one is running and enjoying the movement of energy as he's running to catch the train.

He's more likely to catch it than the other one and not to fall off. So that suddenly, helpful factors come in that you didn't even know about were there. Suddenly they are there.

But it all, the strange thing is, the state of completion is already here. No matter what form your surroundings take, the completion of you is already here. The self does not need more anymore.

So any more that comes into your life is simply the play of forms. They come and you say, nice, if more comes again and maybe a year later you have another mansion. Maybe.

But you won't be the same. You will move in that mansion not feeling that this is mine. Not seeing it as my achievement.

Simply seeing, yes, another beautiful structure around me. Of course it won't last. A beautiful structure around me.

So the world of form doesn't give you that satisfaction anymore that it gives you, which of course is short-lived, but you need it for yourself. Your sense of self. The satisfaction that a big mansion would give you when your self is in that, it belongs to me.

And then you invite others and they come into the mansion. It's an extension of you. You feel, okay, you're coming to visit me.

This is me. Look at me. That doesn't happen anymore.

There's simply an innocent enjoyment of the forms, but no link of the self with the forms. Because you can see the whole idea of owning something is a fiction. How can you say that I own this house?

What does that mean? It's a fiction in the mind that others agree with. That means you own it.

If others don't agree with it, it's a delusion only in your mind, which could say, I own this ashram. Okay, you can live with, if that delusion gives you an enhanced sense of self, you can live with that and say, I'm not telling anybody, but you know the truth, I own this place. Nobody knows.

Now then, people would call you deluded, but there are people like that, but then if others agree with your delusion, then they will actually sign papers to tell you that you're right, you own it, they all agree with me, now I own it. But it's the same delusion except that others agree with my delusion. It means nothing.

This is how, of course, people move into a time will come, of course, when ownership will become totally meaningless. They try to do it with communism without going through transformation of consciousness first, and of course that didn't work. So the whole idea of me in that structure becomes absurd.

You can enjoy the physical structures knowing it's just that it's not going to last. It's fine. And so, you move into the mansion and then perhaps one day you walk out, you don't even want to be in it anymore.

It's possible. It makes no difference. So, it's the changing scenery around you that's different.

The circumstances of your life that change, the passing of time, means simply the scenery around you is changing and it's fine. You actually enjoy that. And you realize, yes, the famous sutra of Malibu, all structures are unstable.

That was, reading that was so, oh, yes. Did they know what they were saying? I don't know.

My suggestion is that we introduce some silence into our retreat. Of course, there's already an underlying silence here. But in addition, that we spend some time on the external.

It looks like spending time keeping silence. And those of you who want to keep silence throughout, of course are free to do so. I may recommend certain periods of time when we all keep noble silence.

Those of you who, beyond that, want to be in silence are free to do so. We may set aside a section in the dining hall for those who don't want to be along the walls. You don't have to face the walls as they do it.

That's a Zen practice. And so, if that is your choice, then if somebody approaches you, you can just go. But don't make sure that you don't discriminate to whom you do this.

If you do it, it's not a problem. Now, when there is a period of silence, then of course you are alone with your mind. And that's fine.

Recognize thought as thought. The thoughts that come. Recognize thought as mental noise.

Recognize every thought as a particular perspective on things, a limited perspective, a limited position. Every thought can only give you a fragment of what's there. Any thought concerning another human being that you may have is fragmentary.

And the opposite statement about that human being is that there's no absolute truth in any judgment that thought makes. Every thought is some form of judgment, some form of interpretation. And so you don't totally believe in everything that comes up because it's the conditioned mind.

You recognize that. So, in other words, as thoughts come to you, especially during the silent period, your spiritual practice is not to stop them, but simply not to take them that seriously. That's all.

To have a relationship to thought that doesn't take thought all that seriously. Thought, of course, wants to be taken seriously. I am the complete attention.

I matter. I am the truth. Believe me.

Every thought wants to draw your attention in because through that it grows and it can proliferate into more thoughts, related thoughts. That is to be trapped in the stream of thinking. That is to be trapped in form.

Every thought wants that also. But, of course, what is happening here on a beyond the personal level is that consciousness is moving out of its identification with form. Consciousness has played the dream of form for a long time.

It's become this universe. A beautiful dance of form. And now consciousness says, OK, it's waking up out of that beautiful dream.

And what is happening in you, whereas before consciousness was thought, it was in every thought, now consciousness is moving out of the thought forms. This is only a relative way of looking at it. You can't really explain it.

So it's freeing itself from the disguise of form. And that is the unconditioned consciousness that arises. And that happens with the simple thing of not taking your thoughts that seriously.

OK. And so then they pass through more quickly. If you don't take them that seriously, they come and go.

They're not fueled by identification with them. And then you will find yourself sometimes being in the state of simple, alert presence in which you can perceive without labeling. You just allow this moment to be so completely that the need to interpret it mentally isn't there anymore.

And yet there's a deep knowing here. But to the mind it looks like unknowing. A beautiful work written in the Middle Ages is called The Cloud of Unknowing.

It's a mystical treatise by an anonymous author written in the Middle Ages in England. How to know God. And he says you know God not through knowing, through entering the state of unknowing.

Non-interpretation. Because every interpretation that you have is conditioned. So to say yes so completely that you do not need to interpret whatever form this moment takes, that may include a human being that comes into the space of now.

And the enormous freedom that comes with not interpreting other human beings through mental judgment which is thought allowing that human being to be as he or she is. Giving him or her one could say space. That's true love is allowing each human being to be without imposing labels and interpretations.

Whatever label or interpretation you impose on another human being through the mind tells you nothing about who that human being truly is. It only tells you something perhaps at best about their particular conditioning, form of conditioning, behavior that they display which is due to their conditioning at best. At worst it's more than a projection of your own mental conditioning and in many cases it's a mixture of the two which accounts for a mixture of what you see is the conditioning in the other person through the eyes of your own conditioning and usually that is what creates human interactions and the conflict in human interactions.

So to be with a human and that just allow them to be and when you speak again they speak to you during those periods when we speak you may be speaking in the dining hall you may be speaking in the gardens while another human being speaks to you be in the state of alert attention which is the state of listening totally to giving total attention as you listen to the words complete attention not preparing the next statement or interpreting what the other person is saying just give complete attention maybe you won't say anything maybe some words will come who knows that is the unconditional consciousness into human interactions so in the meantime while you are alone with your mind don't take the mental noise too seriously it isn't all that serious don't carry around with you the burden of your life situation and start thinking about what you left behind all the unsolved stuff that you left behind things you have to face when you get back home where is it now?

if it has any reality it must be here now yes you will face it when you get back home in the now but you can't face it now you can only make a dream world of thoughts around it and an unhappy identity so don't carry the burden of a conceptualized self in the head and walk around this beautiful place with that burden of a me and what is going to happen to me nothing is happening to me this moment is all that there is so to start with I recommend that we keep noble silence between now liberation that we keep noble silence between now and our next meeting and then we'll see after that see how we feel so we keep noble silence between now and our gathering this afternoon and then let's see what happens after that you don't need to know that of course we will also have time for questions during this week later on in the week not that any question really matters because it will be thought and that which is beyond thought anyway we will have questions

Access points into a state of presence. Of course you don't linger inside the portal. A portal is there to go through, or one could another way of putting it is that the unconditioned comes through it, emerges through it, or just a matter of perspective.

Even surrender after a while disappears. The portal disappears as a portal because it becomes your natural state, non-resistance as your natural state. Surrender is the transition between resistance and non-resistance.

You relinquish resistance, and that's surrender. When resistance doesn't arise anymore to what is, there's no surrender anymore. And even the present moment, which is the main portal one could say, becomes simply the state of presence, and not so much needing to not move to a past and future because that movement doesn't occur anymore.

There's simply the timeless now. So you use as your practice here, of course always the main portal is the now, and then surrender takes you into now. Every portal takes you into now.

Death takes you into now. The inner body, which we may address this afternoon, takes you into now, into the state of attention, awareness, aware presence, in which thought becomes secondary or disappears altogether. In any case, thought no longer dominates you.

Thought loses its power to make you unhappy because you don't take it that seriously anymore. Do you remember our practice for today? Not taking thoughts that seriously anymore.

And then you see that what has, to a large extent, what makes you unhappy is not that situation or that place or that person, that life situation. It's thoughts about it, and every life story consists of thoughts, and that's where people's identity lies. And those thoughts tell you something.

Those thoughts interpret something according to their conditioning. And there's never, suffering doesn't arise from pain could happen, but suffering is never in the situation. The situation is as it is.

Even several, Shakespeare saw that already. Nothing is either good or bad, but thinking makes it so. That, of course, started when the eight of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, beginning of thought.

So the interpretations may still happen, but you don't take them that seriously anymore.

And then you realize in any situation, the unhappiness arises out of thought, out of the story that you weave around the simplicity of this moment. And often this moment doesn't fit into the story.

So there's a clash between where you, as the story-based me, want to be, where you want to be, who you want to be, what you want to be, who you want to be with, what you want to be doing, as the story-based entity, me, and where you are. That clash. Who you are, where you are, who you are with, what you're doing.

This isn't, I'm not supposed to be doing this. It doesn't fit into this, the story of me, how it's supposed to unfold. So this is the great renunciation, compared to which other renunciations are quite insignificant, secondary, and often don't work.

Renounce material possessions, renounce sexuality, you can renounce all kinds of things, status. But very quickly a new mental image forms as me, the one who has renounced. And that happens very easily.

It happens so insidiously. The ego comes in through the back door. You can go and shave your head, renounce your name, adopt a spiritual name, put on robes.

And the idea behind it is beautiful. It's letting go of your whole form identity. But since the ego is so insidious, it comes in through the back door.

And now that you've put on the robes and shaved your head and walk with an alms bowl, if you become a Buddhist monk, it could be many other things, very subtly an image forms of you have a new identity. Of course you have. You're a respected Buddhist monk.

And people, well, if you live in the East, in the West, they wouldn't care less. So if you come with your alms bowl in Thailand, they will put things in and show their reverence. And then that could enhance your sense of self in a very subtle way.

Or if you go to the West with your alms bowl, they might say, why don't you work for a living? So that doesn't feed your ego that much. So very easy to renounce can very easily create a new self image and a new story.

Now you've become the renunciant. It's shifted. And there's an me that feels in some way special.

Can happen, doesn't always happen, can easily happen. But the alternate renunciation, there, those things cannot happen because now you renounce the very root of the false self. The very root is renounced.

And that is the need to think. Thought itself is renounced. And then you see how addictive thought is.

It is not easily renounced. It comes back in waves. Thought waves come back.

And what can you do? You watch the thought waves come back. You may get drawn in, lost in thought again, until you come out.

And then presence is there for a moment. You're awake, alert. And then another thought wave may come.

And you may still be there as the witness of the thought wave, not totally taken over, in which case it subsides quickly. If you get totally drawn in, it will linger for much longer, a whole thought movement. Now, this isn't something that we are trying to do.

It's something we are allowing to happen. If you get into the position of trying to do it, it becomes problematic again, and the me comes back in. We are not trying to become free of thought, but the state of presence is emerging already and wants to emerge.

We simply allow that to emerge. We cooperate with it. So a great help here, especially here, because there's such enormous momentum in the human mind, is to, again, I prefer to use the word allow, is to allow your attention to sink into the body, rather than being totally head-centered.

You allow your attention to sink down into the field of body. And that becomes an anchor for staying present. And there are ancient meditation methods that are designed precisely to take your attention out of thought stream, so that it's not all your attention is absorbed by thought streams, which is the normal state.

They take attention into a body. And so I believe the ashram is offering a meditation tonight, which I don't, have not experienced personally, but I'm told it puts you in touch with the body, so it must be good. And it's probably related in some way to the old Buddhist meditation called Vipassana, which some of you know, which takes attention into the body.

Here, I'm not making it into a technique as such. Simply, I'm pointing to the possibility of sensing, as you sit here, sensing the aliveness inside your body. And then the body becomes a portal.

And at first, it appears that, yes, the body, at first you might feel, sense certain feelings. And then you go a little deeper, and there's simply a sense of spaciousness. So the body becomes a portal.

At first, it might appear as if the, what I call the inner body is another object that arises in your awareness. But as you move deeper, and the observer and observed merge, so it's no longer a sense of me up here, sensing the body down here, but the two becoming one. So there is a generalized sense of aware presence that pervades the entire body.

So one could say that aliveness, it's not confined to the body, because the whole world comes alive when presence arises, and you're not deadening everything through conceptualization. But you sense great aliveness. And that is in the entire energy field of the body.

And you dwell in that. You are that. Then the mind hasn't got your attention anymore.

It can't manufacture thoughts continuously, because your attention is here. You also connect a vast field of intelligence that is the beginning of that vast intelligence, the one intelligence out of which the whole universe has come, that is, manifests itself as the flower, the tree, the planet, the sun, the galaxies, and is also, he has brought into being what appears to be a physical body temporarily, which contains great intelligence, every cell, every organ. No human mind could control the functions of the human body.

They put all the computers together in the world. It couldn't control the functions of a single body, because it requires enormous intelligence to coordinate thousands of functions. And this happens continuously through that intelligence that indwells here, not thinking.

The body doesn't think about how it's doing it, just as the flower doesn't think about how to become a flower. It happens. And so you already, by entering that portal, you have access to that vastness of intelligence.

So sensing that aliveness, at first you may feel certain parts of the body more strongly than others, hands or feet, and that's fine. And then sense a generalized aliveness in here. And that's where part of your attention is within.

Some people feel, as I said, certain parts more strongly. Some people feel the belly. Some people feel hands or arms.

Some people, eventually you will sense a generalized aliveness, and you cannot locate necessarily any particular part of the body anymore, nor do you have to. If you see certain Buddha statues, you'll see, I'm not talking now of the Chinese Buddha with a huge belly, but other Buddhas, they have a slight belly, very slight, and the Buddha is resting here in the body. So there are practices that can take you into the body.

What I'm suggesting here, these are helpful. I'm suggesting you can do it without needing to go through any practice, although if you have an additional practice, that is helpful. I may take you into the body today, or at some point, and make it almost into a meditation.

We may do that. But I want to avoid giving you techniques as such, and sensing the inner body is beyond technique. It's too simple for that.

And see how much easier it is when you inhabit the body with some of your attention, to be here in the state of simple blood awareness. And so there is, you're aware of what arises in your sense perceptions, the words in this case, and you sense the energy field of the inner body, and there's no thought arising anymore, or very little thought. And you can do that as you go out into nature.

You sit on a bench, on the grass, use the portal of the inner body, and then start looking around. Beautiful practice. And you look at all the different forms of life around you.

And you just look at each form in that innocent perception that does not interpret or label what is being perceived. And now it becomes easy, because your attention is anchored here. So that's perhaps the greatest, if you can, that transition from needing to interpret and needing to label, to being free of the need to interpret and label, not that you have lost your ability, you don't know what things are anymore.

No, the need is gone. You have the freedom not to think. The freedom not to label, not to interpret, to allow to be.

And in that, a greater intelligence comes in. It's almost as if, through your eyes, that greater intelligence, we're looking at the world of form and enjoying it, knowing deep down to be a manifestation of itself. Knowing the world of form to be a manifestation of itself.

So it sounds at first insignificant to be sitting there and simply practicing watching without interpretation. It's the greatest shift in consciousness that can happen to you. That simple thing of sitting somewhere, and that's, we are starting with an easy situation.

You're not being challenged. A different matter arises, we will address that, when life challenges you. And then thought will rush in.

And then all the patterns of thought and emotion will rush in, want to rush in. We'll put that aside for a moment. Let's first of all see in situations that are helpful, non-challenging.

This, of course, is one. And being in the ashram here is another. And here, to be able to sit somewhere, stand somewhere, connect with the inner body, and perceive free of thought.

Or, not perhaps entirely free of thought. Perhaps labels will come and go. And then there's a gap before the next label arises.

Another, it goes. You're not fighting any thought. If it comes, it's allowed.

Nothing important. Sometimes thought will want to take you out of that, and pretend. Any thought will want your attention back.

The mind will try, and it's very clever. The human mind is clever. It will try to get your attention back, through some interpretation to do with your sense perceptions, or something totally different, that you really must give your attention to now.

So the mind will attempt to get, to draw your attention out of the now, out of the body, back into itself. Once you know that, you can watch it and say, oh, there it is. And then you're back in presence.

You can watch the river. You can sit by the river, and watch it connect with the inner body, and be there. The miracle then has happened.

You are not perceiving any longer, through the conditioned mind. That's, and the need to think isn't there anymore. The compulsion.

You are free not to think. The only thing that I have achieved in life, although it's not an achievement at all, is I don't need to think. Somebody some years ago asked me, what have you achieved?

And at that time, I hadn't written a book yet, so I hadn't achieved anything. And all I could say was, well, I don't need to think anymore. This is not highly regarded in our culture.

And it's, but it's not the case that you cannot function anymore, although at first it is a new way of functioning. It took me some years to function in this world, in that state, because I had no guidance and no teacher. So that state at first overtook me, and I lost all interest even in functioning in this world.

And then gradually the ability to function in the new state came back. But you have better guidance than I had. And so you do not need to become dysfunctional as the new state of consciousness arises.

It's happened to people. Ramana Maharshi became, one could say, dysfunctional, because he didn't even put food in his mouth anymore. So in Western terms, certainly it would be called dysfunctional.

But fortunately, in India, they recognized here that there was something there that was of great value. And so they didn't put him away. In the West, they would have.

So as the new arises, of course, it's a new way of being in the world, a new way of interacting, a new way of perceiving. And of course, first, it's strange at first. So I'm suggesting, become familiar with that and allow it to happen at first, especially as you contemplate nature, the world of nature, whether it be the river or the trees, and enter that state of perception that is free of labeling.

And you can sense the alertness that is there underneath the perception, the alertness that makes the perception possible, the presence through which the perception happens, as you sense it as that underlying stillness that fills your entire being. But it's also all around. There's a field of stillness, and there are the phenomena that you are perceiving.

And you are the field. And that includes this. And so it's not really the body.

The body can give you access to that field as a portal. And then when you go through that portal, a vastness opens up, so you don't become confined in the body. And so you sit and watch the movement of the river, perhaps, the movement of the little animals, and perhaps the movement of people.

And there are always the two dimensions as you watch that which you are perceiving, and that which makes the perception possible, the field, the spaciousness, and so you have, you dwell in both worlds, the world of form and the world of space, and so you have, you dwell in both worlds, the world of form and the world of space, and so you have, you dwell in both worlds, the world of form and the world of space, and so you have, you dwell in both worlds, the world of form and the world of space, and so you have, you dwell in both worlds, the world of form and the world of space, and so you have, you dwell in both worlds, the world of form and the world of space, and so you have, you dwell in both worlds, the world of form and the world of space, and so you have, you dwell in both worlds, the world of form and the world of space, and so you have, you dwell in both worlds, the world of form and the world of space, and the formless, or rather you dwell within the formless, and can still interact with the world of form. and the formless, or rather you dwell within the formless, and can still interact with the world of form.

So this is how you can use these surroundings here, and the river, and then everything one could say that you contemplate is teaching you, especially nature, stillness, especially the river. And you bring something to it. Your perceptions complete, completes it.

I don't want to go into any kind of philosophical speculation or say anything that requires belief on your part, but I'm only suggesting would the river even be there if you were not there? Perceiving it, being conscious of it. Are not the two needed for the river to be there?

And that sacredness, is that not both within and without? Would the sacredness be there without anybody knowing it? And the same you practice in your room.

Now, almost certainly the room that you are in here is not as comfortable as home, unless you're an ascetic monk or nun. And there are certain things that you may dislike. It's not functional, it's not good enough, but you can sit there also and contemplate the things in the room, sit on a chair, just for a few minutes, 10 minutes, 15 minutes, 20 minutes, and you contemplate and allow it also to be as it is at this moment.

And no labeling, nothing's labeled. I was surprised by that state one morning when I woke up after dreadful suffering during the night, during which the mind made self dissolved. It couldn't sustain itself any longer.

It had created so much suffering that it self-destructed when I couldn't live with myself any longer. And the self that I couldn't live with dissolved suddenly. And what was left was I, presence, I am presence, nothing in particular, just that.

And so I woke up and I opened my eyes and I looked at the room. For the first time without labeling anything. And I knew without labeling it that everything was alive.

And I was astonished. And I walked around the city in that state of non-labeling and I didn't even know that I wasn't labeling. I knew nothing.

All I knew was there was so much peace suddenly, even in the city, so much, the peace is everywhere. I didn't know why. I didn't know that my mind had virtually stopped.

Later I realized it when a Buddhist monk had talked to me and talked about the cessation of mind. And I said, oh, that's what it is. And now I'm suggesting that this is not something that happens only to a few.

There are many human beings that I have met that have come to the teaching who are already stepping out of mind identification and entering that state. Not all at once in most cases, that's relatively rare, but it happens. It means not all at once do they dwell in that state continuously.

You can only enter it now, but dwelling in it continuously may take a little while. That's where time is still needed. Time is not needed to enter that state.

It's now. So that's the renunciation of thought. And an enormous depth opens up suddenly.

You become very deep and you realize how deep and mysterious every phenomenon is, every natural phenomenon, how you have been reducing it to something, to an abstraction by labeling everything, interpreting everything. So this is the practice that I suggest to you in the days to come, to be here as the observing presence, to invite that state that is free of thought. And if thought arises, you simply recognize it as thought without making it into a problem.

So then we come, this is perhaps the main practice and use it then also when you move, not just when you sit. It's first when you sit, then you start, you move between here and your room. And there are steps and be there with every step and to watch as you walk without making it into some formal, formalized thing.

You cannot practice Tai Chi and be looking forward to the end of your movement. That wouldn't this bad practitioner. So that is, again, a helpful practice, but if it's confined to your practice and the rest of your life, you go back to the mind-identified state.

It's not helpful. It can be a helpful additional practice. Moving in Tai Chi, your hand moves from here to there, let's say.

I've never learned it. I don't know Tai Chi at all. I only know presence.

So the hand moves. And usually in every movement, you want to be at the end of the movement. That's the mind projection of wanting the end result, of wanting, of making this moment a means to an end.

Even when you reach out for a glass, you want to be there already. And then when you gasp the glass of water, you already want it to be here. And before it's here, you want the water already to be in your stomach.

It's always looking to the, you're being pulled by the mental projection of future. That's how most people live. The future pull, which is a mental projection, determines their actions and they're being pulled.

They're pursuing always the mental projection in every movement. And so to bring presence into a movement means it's, at no stage is this movement a means to an end. You don't need to arrive.

You're here already. You're here, here, here. And so you can practice little things like picking up a glass of water and drink it in the state of pure awareness, in which this moment is not a means to the next moment.

So if it's a means to the next moment, it would go like, now what's the next thing? And you can see that that is the grasping quality of, and the next thing might be a magazine or the TV because it's the mind seeks reincarnation into the next stream that it can identify with. Pick up the phone and talk to someone.

Unnecessary, but it gives something to do. And then there's the possibility of simply picking up. First, you might slow down a little when you do it like that, where you use the space, you use the physical movement from here to there as a space of awareness.

That movement while the glass travels to your lips, you're simply present with the movement. Sense everything, how you touch the glass, the temperature. And even as you drink, be so present that there's no thought around this activity.

And then it travels back and that is still another space of simple, pure, aware presence. It's not, it's very beautiful. And a different quality flows into that doing than when you're being pulled by a future projection.

And a simple thing like walking across your room from one end to the other, a state of simple presence, not needing to get there. Nothing is going to change when you get to the end of the room. It's still the now, not needing or walking up the stairs.

Beautiful, present at every step. Is your life going to be more fulfilled when you reach the top of the stairs? No, it's just another place.

It's the now again. Any movement, so you bring in little, you can only do it. Now this looks, you might mistake it as if you were trying to bring something about in you.

But the only reason why we are pointing to this, the only reason why you're able to do it is because presence is arising. And then it manifests as somebody who is picking up a glass in the state of thoughtless awareness. It's only happening because presence is arising in you.

But from the limited perspective of you being this entity, it looks as if this entity were doing some spiritual practice. So this is vital, this little bringing awareness in there and it wants to come in.

[Speaker 2] (5:10:34 - 5:10:40)

We sit on the floor when we're eating and the plates are on the floor and we lift the spoon up.

[Speaker 1] (5:10:40 - 5:10:42)

Right, okay.

[Speaker 2] (5:10:42 - 5:10:45)

And I was thinking that might be a good opportunity.

[Speaker 1] (5:10:45 - 5:38:45)

Yes, that's quite a long way. That's a good, and it's an unusual, for most people, an unusual way to eat. So you might have had some mental complaints about that in your head.

And so you do that. That's any situation. Allow the presence to be there.

So you do simple things at first. And of course here, it's arising as you sit here. And then, during those times when you interact through words here with other people, there comes the first challenge.

The first real challenge. You get small challenges even when you sit in nature. It's your own mind.

But the first bigger challenge comes through human beings because in most cases, human being means human mind, the conditioned mind. And the moment you speak words, the mind is there very strongly. Concepts, words, and you get drawn into a mind stream, reactive mind stream, and conversation.

And you lose the underlying awareness, totally dragged along by the mind stream. Don't know that you're being dragged along. You're just being dragged along completely in it.

So here again, as you interact with other people, the most helpful thing so that you don't get dragged along by the mind stream and into reactivity, listen, giving complete attention as you listen to the other person. So you make listening your practice, but listening combined with sensing the inner body as you listen and giving complete attention in that state of listening. Now, not many people can do that because they're all immersed in mind.

They're not really listening to you. They're listening to their own minds and they want to get in what they have to say. Or they are interpreting what they're listening to, labeling.

So the ability to truly listen is the ability to be still as you listen. That's the only way you can listen, to listen in the state of stillness, which is the state of thoughtless awareness. That is listening.

Nothing else is true listening. And that ability comes almost by accident to certain people who work with others as counselors or psychotherapists. After years of being with people, some of them develop the ability to be in this state as they listen.

And it's only then that they become truly effective in their profession, because it's only then that a greater intelligence is taking over, not the limited accumulated knowledge that they're trying to apply to you by labeling your condition and calling you this or that and putting you into some kind of pigeonhole and category. And sometimes after years of listening and applying accumulated knowledge, after a while, they get tired of applying the accumulated knowledge and they begin to just be there. And the state of attention arises and the spaciousness that is there, that is the state of thoughtless awareness arises.

And then the other person comes into that field and then true transformation and healing becomes possible because it's now that that intelligence that is unconditioned can begin to operate. It might not even come through you because there is the field. Through this form, the field is there of pure spacious presence.

That means it could come through the other person. When the field is there, it could even come through some external factor that at first doesn't seem to be connected at all. Do this.

listen whenever you interact with somebody. Be in the state of pure listening, pure attention. And to dwell in that, sense the inner body as you listen.

So you're almost listening with your whole body and you're giving total attention. It doesn't matter that much anymore what is coming out of the other person's mouth. You're not only reacting to that which is coming out of the other person's mouth because in that state of thoughtless awareness, you are connecting with that dimension in the other person.

You are able to go penetrate through the screen of mind that may still be coming at you and touching that unconditioned consciousness that is there underneath the mind stream in the other person. And not only that, often it is the case that through that, that unconditioned is being awakened and begins to come forward. And of course, that's the essence of spiritual teachings.

And to a large extent, this is also what is happening here. When you are in that state of pure listening, miraculous transformations happen in people around you. So you're no longer, your attention isn't absorbed anymore by the words that are coming out of the other person's mouth.

That's still, yes, the words are there. You listen to the words also, but there's more. There's the entire field, the spaciousness.

So you're looking through the conditioned person. And at first, again, this is a new way of being. And at first, you may feel a little awkward because you haven't prepared the next thing to say.

And the fear comes in that I've got nothing, what am I going to say? And then the other person may stop talking. Well, it occasionally happens that people stop talking.

Or ask you a question. And then you experience, at first, perhaps, suddenly an answer comes, unprepared, unrehearsed. And often it'll be just what that person needs to hear.

And you may be surprised what comes. Oh, that's good, I said that. That's good.

I must write that down. So that's the, because here you are interacting. There are these dimensions of interaction, especially here, anywhere, but there is the world of nature around, which includes plants, animals, river, sky.

And then you interact with humans, the world of humans. So how to be with those two dimensions? The human one, of course, is more challenging than the world of nature.

Humans are difficult. They are here to challenge you. You may find when you wake up in the morning, you open your eyes.

For many people, that is a natural no thought moment. When awareness is there, but thought hasn't come in yet. And there are other times when naturally that state arises in you, as it does in many people who don't even know it.

It arises naturally whenever you see beauty. There's a moment of no thought, and there's a deep inner response to the beauty. It arises naturally when there's a moment of danger.

And immediate action is needed. And there's no time to think, to work out mentally what you're going to do. And so there can be a sudden shift into awareness, from thought to awareness.

And right action happens immediately. And this is the reason why some people seek out danger. They don't know why.

In biological terms, they use this expression, they get an adrenaline high. That is a by-product, perhaps, of that life. But what really happens, they are in the state of thoughtless awareness, and they've never felt more alive before.

And so the only place where they can find that is through seeking out danger, where any mind movement would not be able to cope with that situation. So mind cannot work. It needs to subside, and presence takes over while you're climbing up the wall of a mountain.

And every movement, you're totally present in every movement. One movement of no presence, and you're gone. That's the hard way of learning presence.

But catch those times when presence arises naturally, as when you wake up in the morning and you open your eyes, and there's simply a field of awareness, and be aware of that awareness before the mind starts coming in. You can often see it in people. When they first wake up, and two minutes later, the mind has started up.

And then for the rest of the day, that is their state that I'm now expressing through this. They're not here. They're trying to get somewhere.

And of course, years and years of that wears out the body of that contraction. You may wake up in the middle of the night here, strange surroundings, not your comfortable bed, and thought may come up. And thought often wants you to be somewhere else.

And then you imagine being in the warm bed at home, so soft, why did I ever leave? I could be in my soft bed at home. And then that becomes a thought stream, and soon turns into unhappiness.

And so as you wake up in the middle of the night, immediately connect with the inner body, and you lie there, intense aliveness. And there you are in the state of thoughtless awareness, continuing to dwell in here. Whereas before, the mind was telling you your problems.

The favorite place and time for the mind to tell you what your problems are and to try and solve them is the middle of the night. And you step out of that into simple presence. And the longer you are sleepless, the better.

You welcome that because it's awareness is there. When you go to sleep here, you lie on your bed, sense the inner body, and just be there, present, alert, aware. And go to sleep from there, from that state.

Not only here, at home, that's helpful too. The worst place you can go to sleep from is TV. The second worst place is reading.

Unless it's a spiritual, a book that was written from presence, then any one statement can take you into presence, and then you put the book down. So what I'm saying now is there is enough presence in you. And so far we have, this afternoon, we are only addressing minor challenges.

We will also look at major challenges that come sooner or later in life. And sustaining presence there. But if you can't be present in your room, then how to be present when a big challenge comes?

Unless it's a life-threatening challenge, then sometimes it arises anyway. So what I am saying here is what some teachers would disagree with, but I'm saying it. That there is sufficient degree of presence in you now for you to choose to dwell in the state of presence rather than in the state of mind identification.

And so you only need to remember that you have that choice. Of being identified with mind or stepping out of mind. And I can hear one mind here asking the question, who is choosing?

And the answer is, of course, that it's not really you who is choosing. Presence is choosing to emerge through this form. And from the perspective of this form, it looks as if this form we're choosing.

But that is a helpful perspective. That is why I say you can choose presence. Don't try to work that out through the mind.

Very often, the truth can only, the deepest truth can only be expressed through paradox. Not through some neat, logical statement that says, this is how it is and that's how it is not. That's the fragmentary way of how thought happens.

And when you create thought systems, they may look spiritual, but they may be belief systems, then you have a very neat way of putting it, this is how it is, and there's no contradiction here. Everything is logically explained. Be suspicious when you encounter a teaching that is totally logically consistent that has no contradictions.

It's a mind structure. Here we are going beyond, there are only different pointers to take you beyond mind identification. And whatever pointer is helpful will be used.

The pointers are not there to contain the truth, to convey the truth and any absolute truth. They're only temporary means, that's all. So you can choose, the state of presence, that is a helpful perspective.

And all you need is remember that, that you have that choice and then you exercise that choice. At that moment, presence has chosen you, one could say. Okay, it doesn't matter.

So there come these philosophical questions when you listen to different teachings. There is a doer, there's no doer. And then people identify with one of these perspectives.

They go to one teacher who says there's no doer, and then they repeat that perspective mentally and start arguing with people who say, no, no, there is a doer. And the mind loves that, because then the egoic self has reincarnated into some new belief and has adopted a new mental position and says, this is me now. And I'm telling you that there is no doer.

And you're doing a lot while you're saying that. If questions arise, you're welcome to leave them here. And you can, if you like, write a question on a piece of paper.

And tomorrow or the next day, we will look at questions. I don't promise that there'll be an answer, but we'll look at the question. Avoid questions that are speculative, because they're not all that helpful.

Avoid questions that are too comparative, but you're comparing signposts. But vital questions concerning your own practice. Avoid questions that try to catch me out in some contradiction.

Contradiction. Contradiction, yeah. This morning, you said that, and in the afternoon, you said that.

Which one is true? I had a question not long ago. A very, very powerful mind, obviously, wrote a very elaborate question.

And he said, in your book, you say, you are here to enable the divine purpose of the universe to unfold. That is how important you are. And then on page so-and-so, I found that you say, no form is important.

Which one is true? They can't both be true. But they are.

So if you asked me, do you consider yourself important? I would have to say, not at all. Not at all, this form.

It's only, this teaching only happens because this form knows its own nothingness. It's complete unimportance. That's why the transparency is there, and the teaching can come through.

When you think you're special, the transparency isn't there, and it can't come through. It's completely unimportant. That's why this teaching is so important.

And just a suggestion, close your eyes for a moment, and just listen to the sound of the bell. Allow the sound to arise, and be aware of the field in which the sound arises, and the field into which the sound subsides. And then the sound subsides, and there's left the field of awareness.

The field of awareness is left. And even while you listen to the sound, you listen to the sound, and at the same time, you're aware of awareness, the underlying field, form and formless. One.

Close your eyes if you can.

[Speaker 1] (5:47:56 - 7:09:59)

Ha, ha, ha. Ha, ha, ha. Ha, ha, ha.

Ha, ha, ha. Ha, ha, ha. Potentially, that could be a very uncomfortable state.

If I don't know what to say and I'm looking for something to say, it becomes uncomfortable. When I don't know what to say and think I should know, that's uncomfortable. I don't know what to say and feel bad about not knowing what to say.

It's very stressful. But to be comfortable with not knowing is a state of creativity and depth. And then you have access to a deep knowing.

And that's not just the case with a spiritual teacher. It applies to you. You're also a teacher.

To become comfortable with not knowing. Then by itself, a deeper knowing arises out of that. When the not knowing is not resisted, you surrender into the state of not knowing.

And it is the most beautiful state. State of deep inner connectedness. Then whatever needs to be known at this moment truly needs to be known, not satisfy mental curiosity.

What truly needs to be known or done is known. Right now when it needs to be known. And there's a lot that does not need to be known.

But what is truly needed is always there out of that state in which you seem to disappear as an existing entity that's... I know. And then all you realize that all thought knowledge, all knowledge that's derived from thought is kind of pseudo knowledge.

Because in thought, when you call it something, you think you know. When you have a label for something, you think that's what it is. Not realizing that every label is an abstraction.

It's because it's not it. The state of not knowing, of course, is also the state, as we talked about yesterday, when you walk around or sit and perceive without interpretation, without labeling. And again, that's the state of not knowing and yet of a deep knowing that is beyond mind.

So as the awareness, the unconditioned consciousness arises, separative knowledge, which is of the mind, because every label separates you from that which you label, it becomes a barrier. That separative knowledge is replaced by a unitive, one could say, knowing, which does not separate you from that which is known. And you can see how that transforms your relationship with nature and how it transforms your relationship with other human beings.

Because so far, 90% or more of human interaction has been through separative, attaching labels onto people, interpreting, judging, not realizing that every interpretation and every judgment is no more than a very limited perspective. One standpoint, one small perspective. No more.

Once you know that, you no longer get deceived by the mind and you believe that one perspective contains the truth, that one thought that you express could ever contain the truth. It is a small perspective. No more.

So the recognition of the relativity of all thought, and we are moving towards a different kind of knowing in which the sense of separateness does not arise. That knowing is also loving. It's one.

Because love is obscured through the delusion of separateness. Love as the realization of your oneness with all that is, is obscured by the labeling, interpreting, the knowing mind. And then whatever you look upon in that state of not knowing from the point of view of mind is looked upon with love, compassion.

They are all aspects of that state of deep knowing that to the mind looks like not knowing at all. And you can imagine how that changes human relationships when you can be with another human being in the state of not knowing, which either means you're totally present, totally still, allowing this form, the form that this moment takes the form of this human being to be completely. Or it could mean that certain thoughts still arise about that human being, who they are, that they should be doing this, should not be doing that, should know better.

They are this, they are that. But thought is recognized as thought. You don't believe in it totally anymore.

And you recognize it's a fragment. It's only a thought. And you allow it to pass.

Then you reenter the state of not knowing. You don't get tricked anymore by the mind. And so there is continuously that dimension of aware presence that may be all there is, or it may be the undercurrent.

And on the surface of it, there are mind movements. That's fine. Sense perceptions, also all sense perceptions are surface phenomena.

Even if it's beautiful initially, you can come to an exotic place like this because for many people who've traveled here, this is very exotic. It's not exotic if you live here. And it's not exotic if you spend a few weeks here, then the exotic is no longer exotic.

It's just, oh, it's no longer satisfying. For a little while, the new forms satisfy. And then that's not enough.

I need some new experience, some new forms. You may already have reached the point where it isn't satisfying because it never is. You might have had a mental projection, an ashram in India, me in an ashram in India that would add something to the story of me and make it much more interesting.

And then whenever you encounter the reality, very soon when the novelty wears off, which could be after a day, it's not all that satisfying, the world of form. There's always something, oh, that wasn't supposed to be there. The asterisk was supposed to be...

Oh, and that wasn't supposed to be there. And the spider in my bed and whatever. Or worse.

Sooner or later, and usually sooner, you hit upon that the unsatisfactory nature, if all that you know is that. And the unsatisfactory nature of your own mind and with its knowledge. So neither the external world of form and experiences is ever enough, nor is your own mind with its accumulated knowledge ever enough.

So life becomes frustrating, a continuous search. In many people, it manifests as a continuous, almost continuous desire to be somewhere else. When you were at home, you wanted to be in the ashram.

Now you're in the ashram, you want to be home. Does that sound familiar? You may have counted the days to your trip to India, and now you're counting the days to your departure.

So just that seeking through form, either the external forms or through mental forms, it's never satisfying. And so the search continues. You could try another ashram, or maybe a retreat center in California would be so much more comfortable.

Or you say, I'm done with spiritual things. If that's spiritual, I don't want it. And so I very rarely use or refer to old pointers or maps, signposts.

But what very much applies here is a very powerful signpost. One of the Upanishads, ancient scriptures, they contain some very powerful signposts. And I'll just, this is very relevant to what we've just been looking at.

I'll just give you, quote to you the first few lines approximately. What it refers to is nothing that you see or hear or think is it. Nothing in the world of form is it, is satisfying ultimately.

If you look for satisfaction through that, which is ultimately yourself, because the only ultimate and true and satisfaction you can ever find is finding and being totally yourself. That's the true satisfaction that everybody's looking for through this or through that. So the Upanishad says, this Upanishad says, not that which the eye sees, but that whereby the eye can see.

Know that alone to be Brahman the eternal and not what people here adore. Not that which the ear hears, but that whereby the ear can hear. Know that alone to be Brahman the eternal and not what people here adore.

Not that which the mind thinks, but that whereby the mind can think. Know that alone to be Brahman the eternal and not what people here adore. It gives a few more examples, but it's all points to it.

It's not in the form, not that which people here adore. It could even be the idea of God. Think about it.

And again, that is not it. That which makes all perception possible, that which makes thought possible, that is the eternal. And why is that?

Already here as the essence, as the now, that's what it is. The eternal that never leaves you. The now.

You are one with it. So the ultimate secret about now is that you are that. You are the now.

Of course you are. It's the only thing that has never left you. Always was the same.

It's always been now. And people have that sense of something very precious and they think that gets mixed up in their mind with their story. And they call it their individuality, their individual sense of individual existence.

I don't want to lose that. There's something so precious that I feel inside me. I don't want to lose that.

That gets mixed up with identifications, mental identifications with stories and that story-based sense of self. But if you look deeply at your innermost sense of I, your innermost sense of who you are, then you realize it has nothing to do with the story of me. You could forget your story.

You could forget your name. And in fact, it would be there. You would sense that innermost sense of I-ness more strongly as the essence of your being.

And this is why sometimes people find it when everything collapses in their lives, their sense of identity had become mixed up with all kinds of identifications, mental identifications, that suddenly through great loss or death, things collapse in their lives. The structures, the forms collapse external and internal. External as physical structures, the seeming solidity of my life crumbles.

Internal, belief structures, the whole story of me falls to pieces. And then it can happen that that innermost I is suddenly can shine because it had been covered up by multiple and multiple layers of identifications. And suddenly when they break, then you realize what was shining through.

The only thing that gave life to the story of me, the only thing that illuminated it was the innermost I. And you mistook the formations, physical and mental formations for I, because the light of I was shining through those structures, but you didn't know the essence of that light. You only knew it was shining through these forms.

Then suddenly the forms collapse and what is there then in its fullness and purity is the innermost sense of I or I am. No longer this or that, simply beingness, presence, unconditioned, is suddenly there. It's all fallen away.

And so people in the midst of great disaster in their lives suddenly stood there and said, this is incredible. Where does this peace come from? Enormous peace.

They didn't understand it. The peace that is beyond understanding. And of course, this is why suddenly all that was obscuring, the forms that were obscuring that innermost I gave way.

And it can happen in the case of death. We pointed it out yesterday, a person slowly dying, everything melting. And it can happen as the result of being in the presence of presence in a spiritual gathering, the energy field of presence that also is being drawn out.

The unconditioned is shining through the conditioned and the conditioned is becoming trans, more and more loses its density, even as you sit here, becomes more and more transparent in a way, dies, one could say. The conditioned I, the sense in which people usually use the word I, the most frequently used word in the English language or any language, the word I, the way in which people usually use the word I, what they refer to is me and my story, the conditioned entity. Ultimately, the fiction that I identify with as me is I.

That's what people, when they say I, they refer to that. But there is a deeper meaning to I that is the delusion of I, that's the delusion of self. But I is a sacred word, ultimately.

I is on the level of normal human consciousness expresses delusion, which is what the Buddha recognized when he saw the delusion of self. He referred to that I and he saw through that. And so when that delusion is recognized, that recognition already originates from the unconditioned consciousness.

The delusional entity cannot recognize its own delusion. So the recognition of it already is the light shining through from underneath, so to speak. From there arises the recognition of the delusion of the story-based, form-based, mind-based, identification-based identity.

So, and this is what Jesus referred to when he said, before Abraham was, I am. Not before Abraham was, I was already. There is no was nor will be in I.

It is eternal presence, eternal nowness. And this is what the Upanishad refers to. It is the formless, the unconditioned.

It is known, never in a subject-object relationship. It cannot be known in such a way. So one could say it cannot be known at all.

You can only be it. Realize that you are it, but cannot know it as you know an object in consciousness. So people have been for thousands of years trying to make God into an object in consciousness.

The idea of God, the image of God, statements about an object in consciousness, and this is why the Upanishad says, not what people here adore, that is not God, not that which you see, not that which you hear, not that which you think, not that which you believe in, because it's thought, belief is thought. You believe in God. That also is not what people here adore.

It is a mental idol, ultimately. It is an ideology. You believe in God, and the person next to you believes in communism.

Two ideologies. So it's not what people here adore, not that which the mind thinks, not that which the mind believes, but that which makes all thinking, all believing, all sense perception possible. The formless, out of which all forms arise, and that is the innermost I, the essence of what gets mixed up in your life with forms, and it flows.

The self gets mixed up with forms, the deepest, the innermost self. And here, here, the blessing and the grace is it in this energy field. It is, one could almost say, being pulled out of you from underneath all the formations, all that.

That in you responds, because it recognizes itself in what seems to be the outside. And, oh, so that state of still alert presence emerges. In the absence of that, the only thing that could get you there is suffering and disaster.

The breakdown of forms, which had obscured the formless. And this is the grace of the spiritual teaching. It saves suffering.

It saves a lot of time too, because suffering implies time. Eventually, you would get there through more suffering, but the suffering that you have had has been enough to get you here. Without it, you wouldn't have come, so it's worked, it's worked.

Suffering works, no doubt. It's worked. But it can take time before it really works.

For a long time, suffering can lead to increasing egoic delusion, increasing contraction, increasing density. But the point is always reached when it becomes, when the auto-destruction happens, the density and the heaviness of it cannot sustain itself anymore. It goes, it's like layers and layers falling off.

And then sometimes those beings who realized that, they looked back on their suffering and said, what a nightmare. And then they talked about it and realized how strongly it resembles a dream, what they, all the suffering that they have been through, now that they are awake, they say, what a nightmare that was. And so when they start teaching, they sometimes speak of the delusion of suffering, the unreality of it.

From their position, from where they are, their realization, this is true. It may not be true when you are in the middle of it. Of course, you could make it into another belief.

You go to a teacher and they say, all suffering is an illusion. And you say, okay, I believe that. And then you carry on suffering and you say, it's an illusion, it's an illusion.

But it's a pointer. Suffering is an illusion, it's a pointer. And one day, the little pointer may hit something.

The planet is heavy with pain. Human pain. In the energy field of the planet.

A long time of creating pain out of that egoic delusion. Each human creating pain for themselves. A painful form identity.

Not knowing who you are is suffering. Not knowing who you are beyond form is suffering. And so they created a whole world out of that state of consciousness.

And they created a lot of pain out of that primary delusion. Because that delusion flows into whatever you do and think and experience. It's colored, distorted by that delusion.

And sooner or later, it always turns into pain. So humans have been this, in the collective energy field of the planet, there's an enormous heaviness, which is human pain. And every human carries part of that in addition to the pain they've experienced in this form as children.

Residues of pain that people carry inside. Pain body, I call it. Which is partly personal, so to speak.

Ultimately, nothing is personal. It's nothing to do with who you are, but only in the sense that it comes from your childhood, your past, the past of this form. Residues left by suffering that you've gone through in this form.

And another large part of it is the collective energy field, the collective pain that is in the human unconscious, the heaviness of that. And that, when I began to teach, I pointed out, that when I began to understand this inner transformation that had happened to this form, I began to see that it's intimately connected with surrendering. It's intimately connected with the surrendered state that is totally aligned with now.

And I began to teach that. And as, of course, that is the ultimate, the root cause of suffering is the state of non-surrender, which humans have been in for thousands and thousands of years. So I began to teach that there's no need to suffer anymore.

And gradually, I saw that even those who were able to totally surrender to now still experienced wave movements of pain in their lives, even though they were surrendering. And then I began to learn about the human pain body as I observed that and realized that every human carries his or her share of collective human pain. And that's ultimately what the pain body is.

It is the manifestation of human unconsciousness and humans carry it in here, in the body. It is an emotional, an energy field that is not flowing, life energy that is stagnant, trapped, and manifests either as anger or as great fear or as the heaviness of depression, of hmm. So it's an energy field of pain that humans carry.

And sometimes they don't even know it's there. It's dormant at times. And they, and it's life works beautifully.

You surrender to now. And you might even think that's it. I've come to the end of it.

And then suddenly a little trigger happens. A little thing goes wrong or even a little thought comes into your head that suddenly proliferates and becomes a trigger for an enormous influx of pain in whatever form, anger, fear, heavy heaviness of sadness. And suddenly it's completely overtaken by that.

And it flows into your mind. It energizes all the mind structures of the ego. It energizes and amplifies the story, all the identifications.

And so the me, the self, the mind made self becomes extremely empowered through that. The delusion becomes empowered through that pain, human pain. Human pain.

And you start thinking all thoughts reflecting the energy field of the pain body. So the pain body has moved into your mind and is governing, controlling your thought processes and actually feeding on each thought. You strengthen the pain body through those thought processes because each thought corresponds to the energy vibrational frequency of the pain body.

If it's anger, it will be thoughts of anger. And that's how the pain body renews itself. And so the pain body becomes a self.

It becomes, you identify with it as self. You think it's me. It is you, really.

It possesses you, so to speak, and it feeds on other people. If it could speak openly, it doesn't say that openly. It wants to make somebody unhappy.

And it wants somebody else to make me even more unhappy. And usually it succeeds because one active pain body during its active period, once it's fed on your mind and other people's reactions, it will subside, go back to the dormant period, the dormancy. But during the active period, it will feed on your mind and on people around you, and it will easily awaken other people's pain bodies if their pain body is at a stage of readiness to come out of the dormant state.

And so one pain body can easily awaken several pain bodies in its vicinity. You can notice it in families. It sometimes happens at work, in your workplace, anywhere where people gather, a committee meeting, one heavy pain body in a committee meeting can awaken every other pain body that has been dormant in that committee, and you get big drama.

So it's wonderful to watch how it works. Oh. And if you go outside, if your pain body is active, and it may be active for an hour, it may be active for a whole day in some people.

It could be active for several days. It varies a lot. For some people, it's only a few minutes, but those tend to be people who are already becoming more conscious, so it cannot linger.

It's recognized. Sometimes before it can really get hold of your mind. We'll come to that.

But if you go outside and your pain body is active, you also attract other active pain bodies because active pain bodies recognize each other. So any situation that you walk into with an active pain body, you may be hiding it at that moment. It will be in your mind, yes.

It's active, it's using your mind, but you're smiling. And suddenly, somebody attacks you verbally or in whatever way, and that was somebody whose pain body recognized yours and said, oh, here's food. And then you go away from that and then you go around the corner and it happens again.

Somebody else attacks you and the whole world seems to be hostile because every pain body, unless they are totally dormant in certain people, maybe they've just gone through the active period and they just don't want any more pain, they haven't digested the pain yet, but every other pain body recognizes you. And they like to meet each other and feed on each other. And for some people, the pain body is associated also with the opposite sex.

That's a strange thing that is not that uncommon. And that is often the case when, not necessarily always, you've had a painful relationship with a parent, then your relationship with a man or your relationship with a woman is associated with pain body. And it is not uncommon for people to choose their partner through their pain body, unconsciously, of course, to choose.

When you fall in love, quite often, the pain body has a part in that. And this strong attraction you feel is partly the attraction through your pain body to somebody else's pain body who perfectly complements yours. And so you feel drawn to that person very strongly.

And we all know people, perhaps even ourselves, who... who again and again are drawn to the same kind of person that creates the same kind of pain for them. And they're doing it again.

And then they say, this time I'm not choosing a partner with a pain body anymore. I want somebody conscious. And so you choose somebody who is...

who practices meditation, who is a vegetarian. And then, and surely, he or she must be conscious. And maybe you forgot that Hitler was a vegetarian too.

And then you start living together. And then you realize, oh, suddenly it's happening again. The same...

I've fallen into the same... I've married the same man again. That's because the attraction was there through the pain body.

So, many marriages are like that, made in... impression, made in heaven, something, marriage made in heaven. And this one is made in hell.

So, pain bodies recognize each other. Pain bodies do not want to be recognized in themselves for what they are. They don't want the light of your attention on them.

They want to flow into your mind, renew themselves through using your mind and using other people. They can only continue to renew themselves if you don't recognize them for what they are. If the recognition isn't there, each time you get overtaken totally and immediately it's become self, it's become the me, an unhappy me.

So to break that is simply to be alert enough, and of course you cannot make yourself be alert enough, that the alertness, the presence that is required to watch the pain body, you can't make, through effort, make yourself alert enough. It's either there or it isn't there. In your case, it's there because you're here.

That is a clear sign that enough presence is there for you to meet the pain body with alertness and watch it. If possible, the moment it arises as an enormous energy impulse, and to watch that. Maybe you can't stop it yet.

You don't need to stop it. Just watch as it... If possible, catch it before it becomes a thought.

Catch it on the energetic level just as it begins to move into your mind. Now that is easier to do with certain pain bodies than with others. If your pain body's frequency is predominantly heavy, of enormous heaviness and density, so when it takes you over, you go slow and heavy thought processes about how dreadful everything is just.

Completely pointless and dreadful. And the whole world is just Now those are easier to catch because they arise more slowly. Oh, there it is.

And then there are other pain bodies that contain a great deal of fire, anger, and they come and that's very hard to catch them because there's virtually no gap. They arise as an energy phenomenon. But before you know it's an energy phenomenon, it's already become a thought and you're shouting at somebody.

Or if nobody's around, you're shouting in your head. And so the pain body has already taken over your mind. And so the most difficult one to catch is if it's predominantly angry.

And you may not be able to catch because the gap between seeing the pain body as an energy phenomenon and it becoming a thought and thereby a me, a self, the gap is too short or almost non-existent. In that case, all you can hope for is that in the middle of that, somewhere an observing presence watches you in motion. Oh.

And so from underneath the pain body there is a witnessing presence. But it may not happen yet. It may be that you wait until it's subsided and then very quickly the awareness is there and you suddenly realized that was the pain body.

There it was. It just been feeding on my mind and on this situation. And the more consciousness there is, the sooner you wake up as the anger subsided.

You can wake up as the anger subsides. There is sometimes a gap when the energy field goes down. The pain body begins to leave your mind, begins to withdraw because it's been feeding enough.

It begins to withdraw from your mind and there at this point when it begins to withdraw you can sense it Okay. You haven't failed. You're there now.

At any time you're there as the presence. It's fine. Now other pain bodies you can catch as they arise as an energy phenomenon.

There it is. And you watch it. You allow it to be.

This is the key. You allow it to be. The key, you cannot fight it.

The key is even here, even here to bring in the yes because it is. It is. What can you do?

And so there is a witnessing presence. So you embrace it. You allow it to be.

And the amazing thing is when you begin to realize that there can be even in the case of the pain body there can be a spaciousness around it. Even in the case of an angry pain body which fumes and shouts and suddenly you know it and allow that to be there there's suddenly a little bit of space around it. Freedom arises when you see the non-personal nature of the pain body.

When you see the non-personal nature of the emotional pain ultimately, although anger doesn't recognize itself as pain, you see the non-personal nature of all those energy movements that we call pain body movements. They are recognized as human pain. They only become personal when they amplify and energize a story in my head that is my story and that is me and that is the fictitious self.

That is a delusion that it is a personal matter. And you suddenly, when you allow the pain body to be there as an energy phenomenon, it's no longer a personal matter. And you realize it's very similar in every other person.

It's basically the same. Anger is anger, human anger. Fear is fear, human fear.

And sadness, the heaviness of depression is the sadness and the heaviness of human sadness. There is no person there and so it's an enormous liberation to see that this is not who I am, it's not me, it's human pain flowing through me. It's the human condition and here it is.

And what can you do with the human condition which is the condition of the unsurrendered consciousness for a million years? You bring surrender to that. The human pain body is only there because of a million years of non-surrender, of egoic delusion.

And so you simply bring surrender into that. And with that act of yes, it's impersonal nature is revealed. And it's not feeding on your mind anymore because it can only feed on your mind by pretending to be you.

It's only when you believe when it becomes a self the pain body energizes the mind structures that we call the self, the mind made self amplifies those mind structures then it's feeding. If the pain body does not flow into that it cannot gain new energy. And the energy that is there through allowing it becomes dissipated.

You can't kill it. There's nothing there to kill. It's life energy but it's trapped, that's all.

It becomes the heaviness or the anger. Anger, all it means is enormous amount of life energy at a particular frequency trapped. And then you bring acceptance to it and suddenly that transmutation is, could be described as the pain, the energy, the vibrational frequency that was in the pain becoming transmuted into the much higher vibrational frequency of presence.

It becomes consumed and this is why many people with extremely heavy pain bodies have, more people with heavy pain bodies have become liberated than people with relatively weak pain bodies. It's that, and that's why it's often in people where you would say he hasn't got a chance not in this lifetime. Look at his pain body I mean it's, and you could be very wrong.

So my pain body was extremely heavy, the pain body of this form and it was only through it becoming unbearable, unbearably heavy that it dissolved all at once and it became consciousness. For most people the dissolving happens over a period of time. This does not mean that you cannot already be free of suffering, no, because when you no longer identify with pain body as a personal matter, as a me, as self, when you simply recognize it as an energy movement within yourself, you recognize that, you bring presence to it, you allow it to be, then it cannot renew itself.

The transmutation has already started with that. You don't need to do anything as such to become free of pain body. No doing can do it.

One could say to be free of pain body, the opposite of doing works and the opposite of doing is allowing, but allowing implies that you are there as the witnessing presence because if you are not there as the witnessing presence, you cannot allow it and the very essence of the pain body is that it doesn't allow anything. It is the essence of not allowing. So, no doing to become free, the key is allowing it to be there and this applies on the inner realm to the pain body.

It ultimately also applies to certain situations on an external level that you have been stuck in for a long time or repeatedly. Situations, you always find yourself in a similar situation and you've tried to get out new place, new country, new partner and you're back in the same. In those cases also, no further doing can get you out of that.

It is only through allowing this moment to be totally as it is, in other words, the surrendered state that change will happen and it'll happen quickly through surrender. So, there are certain situations where of course you need to take action to do something about it to remedy a certain situation but particularly situations where you find yourself in a stuckness and you find yourself experiencing the same again and again, it calls for surrender. You can't run for the rest of your life, run away from something, run away from your partner and another partner and run away from that partner.

Or wherever you live or whatever relationships you're engaged in. So, both on the inner level, the inner realm and the outer realm, they are one. The greatest power for transformation lies not in doing but in allowing and allowing then implies another perspective on this.

It is the ability to look, I'm using it metaphorically, not necessarily with the eyes, to look at your pain body, to bring attention to it. You have to allow it before you can give it full attention. Giving full attention is allowing it.

If you don't allow it, you cannot give full attention. So that is the power of presence and you give attention similar, this is why we talked yesterday as a preliminary to this, about the simple and relatively easy act of giving your full attention to a sense perception, a tree, a flower, people moving, giving pure attention, watching it allowing it totally, no needing to interpret it and now we bring attention to that and that's the unconditioned consciousness, vast intelligence is looking. Vast intelligence is at work.

In Chinese terminology the Tao is there and you are totally aligned with it and it's looking. That the one intelligence is there and the looking is enough to initiate the transformation of that situation. The looking is enough.

No analysis required through mind. How can I get rid of my pain body? How can I get rid of this problematic situation that I've been in for 15 years and I've been thinking about it for 15 years and I've been analyzing it and I've tried this and I've tried that but what you haven't tried is to look.

Simply to look in that field of alert presence and allow it to be and see what happens but the looking when I say see what happens that could be misunderstood there's no expectancy of some future result in the looking there's simply the looking the watching the giving attention the allowing it to be and there's enormous power in that. Far greater intelligence is now released than is in the limited human mind even the greatest human mind and again because everything is connected we started our gathering today with pointing out the power of not knowing and so when you look at something you don't feel that you know so this is another aspect when you look even at the pain body you don't there's nothing much that you need to know about it you just there's just the looking in the state of where no further knowing is necessary and whatever is needed now comes it can come in many forms a sudden transformation from within the situation it can also come in the form of a sudden thought and it suddenly that thought is a realization oh ok a sudden insight ah it can come as an external factor or event suddenly coming into a situation and changing it completely it can come as a spontaneous impulse from within you that and you do what is needed without any doubt whatsoever the right action happens so in those in many forms the transformation can manifest itself but the basis for it is not to bring the conditioned mind to it and try to solve it through the extremely limited knowledge even in the greatest mind limited knowledge of the conditioned mind and what we call the greatest minds on the planet those great people we see we put on pedestals they are the greatest minds they're not really the greatest minds they had some access to that they had some ability perhaps only in their field of endeavor to be in that state of pure attention of pure looking and that's where Einstein looked perhaps as a mathematical formula which all these scribbles on the blackboard which of course was mind stuff but there were certain breakthroughs there were insights that came to him that nobody could have worked out through the mind he had the ability and other creative great creative minds as they are called and to look and he has made statements that are deeply mystical so he had deep insights he had access to that dimension he even said once I want to know the mind of God the rest is details in other words I want to know God the rest is details in other words he said I want to know that which is beyond time and form the rest is the world of form details so that power is your own power the power of the universe in you so look at your pain body in that way and whatever you look upon in that way is embraced is alright look at the worst conflict situation the world is full of dreadful conflict situation and anyone that comes into your field of attention now people in conflict can't work it out look give it full attention bring that alertness there people discussing and arguing and you sit there and then suddenly something happens suddenly maybe they stop talking or you say something a decisive thing that nobody had thought of and that changes everything anything could happen you don't know beforehand how that intelligence deals with the situation but it deals with the situation powerfully any person in turmoil who comes to you this has happened that has happened and he did to me and then he said and I and then see what happens I've told this story before when I first time I realized not long after the inner transformation an extremely excited woman came to me with a very strong ego talking about her drama you must do something you must help me come talk to the lawyers do this and for 15 or 20 minutes I listened to that pain body very heavy pain body and she of course she as the pain body wanted me to confirm the reality of the story the reality of the situation the reality of the problem please confirm that this is real and for 15 or 20 minutes I gave her attention that was just allowing that and that was the first time subsequently it happened many times when I realized the power the transformative power of that when suddenly she stopped talking looked at all the attorneys papers around her hundreds of papers and lawsuits that she had been involved in for years and suddenly she looked at me and said and all the papers and said this isn't important at all is it and I said no it isn't and then she just sat there for a few minutes and said all right I'll go now thank you and the next morning I saw her and she said what did you do to me last night last night was the first night in 20 years that I slept well what did you do to me her ego was back a little bit and there was a suspicious look on her face you did something to me and from then on she believed that I had hidden powers but if you believed that that power was your power it would very quickly become obscured and blocked to realize there is no me in that whatsoever if you ever made a me out of it and the ego could come back through any back door the ego will come back in and claim some attainment I healed that what did you do to me a woman that night it's possible the ego could come back which means the portal is closing again the openness is gone the little egoic identity has come back and claimed some attainment I did that you did nothing it happened because you were not there it happened because you were transparent you were open you were an opening that's why it happened not because you were there because you were not there beware of this little thing in the head the little egoic entity trying to where's the back door it says I need to get back in somewhere and it's happened even with spiritual teachers enormous power came coming through them and then at some point there was the claim of specialness I am the one you are also the one but not quite as one as me so that's of course something to watch in oneself special claims of specialness because every ego every egoic entity is special very special my problems are very special much greater than yours so my knowledge greater than yours my misery much more than yours I'm much more ill than you you have a headache I've had a headache for years

I'm much more ill you have a headache I've had a headache I'm much more ill you have a headache for years than you you have a headache for years I'm much more ill I'm much more ill I'm much more ill you have a headache for years you have a headache for years I'm much more ill I'm much more ill you have a headache for years I'm much more ill Param Parasam

[Speaker 1] (7:17:15 - 8:32:53)

Bodhisattva Of course you have long given up waiting as a state of mind So you are not waiting for anything I talked about the impersonal nature of the pain body We looked at that And just as impersonal really is a stream of thinking It's thought Thought Nobody's personal problem Well, that's a relief It's not my problem, the fact that my mind won't stop isn't my problem It's the human mind And then it stops, because you've given it space Let's look at a few questions I'll start with the smallest piece of paper It's a short question, so that's good By dissolving the ego, won't I be dissolving my self-esteem? Do I not need self-esteem to love myself and others?

Yes, self-esteem Many people seem to have a problem with that Lack of self-esteem, I read a while ago that When the Dalai Lama was younger He was meeting with a group of westerners And they were talking about the lack of self-esteem And he just couldn't understand that What that was, and they tried to explain it And then he went around the group and asked everybody Do you have that? And most people said yes It's very strange, self-esteem Now the human species It's the only species on the planet, of course That has a relationship with itself Where you have a relationship with yourself That's normal But the cat doesn't have a relationship with itself Or the bird doesn't have a relationship with itself Or the tree doesn't So birds, cats, trees, monkeys Trees, flowers None of them have a problem with self-esteem And even the most ugly looking cat Wouldn't have a problem with self-esteem It hasn't created a secondary, an image self Mind created And once, of course, that's created It walks with you, like next to you, behind you Or wherever it is You always walk with a mental image of me And you have a relationship with that And often you don't like what you see The image self That's poor self-esteem And then you may be in conflict with it With the self You may be talking to yourself in the head And telling yourself something about yourself Some people talk to themselves in the first person But many more people talk to themselves in the second person As you, you see You failed again You see, you are not as good as You see, you...

Why can't you... And then at times, perhaps The self feels suddenly great about itself Some people predominantly have low self-esteem In other words, feel bad about the mind-made image me Feel bad about that And then realize that Some realization comes in When they realize that it is mind created And they realize, and usually in the West It's connected with new age teachings And they realize that they can do something About their bad self-esteem, the image You can actually change your thinking about yourself First you discover that the thinking about yourself Is predominantly, or to a large extent, negative And then, you see A little bit of presence is arising It must be, because you are able to stand back a little bit And watch and see what you are creating with your thoughts And then the possibility comes of changing your thoughts Your self-esteem Through workshops Affirmations Visualization And all those practices And then after a while That image looks a little bit more comfortable And you feel more comfortable with that thing walking alongside you But since everything in form All mind creations, thoughts, are subject to polarities You can't walk with a high, continuously With high self-esteem And feel great about yourself There's always a polarity to it And it's usually bound up with what happens or not happens in your life What feedback you are getting from others And it is usually comparative The self-esteem is comparative How do I rate myself in relation to others? And that gives you the indication of where you are On one to ten, or whatever it may be So self-esteem is Mind is connected with the mind made me Lack of it Or in a good self-esteem But it exists within polarities Even if you spend a whole year Affirming continuously That I love myself I love myself And maybe until now you hated yourself And your house is full of little stickers And wherever you look You see I love myself And you look in the mirror And look into your eyes And repeat that I love myself To some extent it works To some extent You have a better relationship with yourself But there's always a downside It's hard to sustain that Because the other polarity will manifest also In your life And you go through life In order to know How you feel about yourself You need to compare yourself with others And then you say Oh, I'm actually better looking than this person So I actually feel quite good about myself I'm actually much more educated than that person I feel good about Or whatever you can get Well, this person is ill and I'm healthy So that's good So you need for self-esteem If you look You need relativity And you need comparison And ego is always comparing itself Is it possible to live Without having a relationship with yourself?

Neither good nor bad Is it possible to be So completely yourself That the mind-made image of me Dissolves Yes, this is why we're here This is the essence of our gathering The mind-made image Is connected to thought To continuous thinking It's fueled by Perpetuated by Upheld by The continuous thought processes Many of which are about me And myself And so I have through thought I have a relationship with a thought-made entity Which sometimes feels quite comfortable And sometimes feels not pleasant Don't want to live with that person And of course it's true Many people live with a self That is very unpleasant That creates a lot of trouble A lot of problems A lot of suffering That continuously criticizes them That continuously blames them That continuously tells them they're not enough And they live with that entity Mind-made, conditioned Mind-movements, conditioned in such a way That they attack you continuously And that's the self that they have a relationship with They would never live with a person like that You would run out of the room You couldn't live with a person for more than a day If your partner, somebody you live with Did that to you What your self-image is doing to you through thought You would have filed for divorce long ago But you can't do that With that, because it's on the mind It walks with you And there you have this complaining And whining and accusing And, oh, get away!

And a large part of that Is because you're identified with thought There isn't the ability to step back from thought And watch thought Watch that And here, the mind-made entity

Because that self that you have a relationship with Is part of the story-based self The me That was the self that I had a very unpleasant relationship with For many years I had a very, extremely painful relationship with myself I couldn't live with myself anymore And so I somehow said, that's it I can't live with it anymore That's it But that was so total That I no longer sustained, fueled the self through thought I didn't know anything about it It just happened So the mind-made image dissolved The self that I couldn't live with That was so heavy Dissolved And what was left was simply I So the I shifted from Whereas before when I said I I was referring to myself The unhappy, dense I The story-based I That dissolved And then the true I emerged Had always been there Presence I am Nothing in particular anymore A simple sense of presence or beingness And for the first time I could walk And be without having a relationship with myself And that, there is something So precious in that I or presence So It's beyond words You could say it's like a diamond Something extremely, very, very precious That's why perhaps Buddhism sometimes has the image of a diamond But this is not comparative It's not a sense of That deepest self Not the mind-made self Is so precious that it has It knows itself to be that In a non-dualistic way Without needing to compare itself to others It has nothing to do with a form Or any mind-form So as presence arises You don't need self-esteem anymore You don't depend on that anymore Because what dissolves is The mind-made entity with which you have a relationship And so self-esteem is an intermediate thing That for a little while makes your life more pleasant It's fine And then after a while you see the unsatisfactory nature Even of that Because you cannot uphold continuous self-esteem It's hard work All these affirmations And then things come into your life that tell you the opposite Inevitably, sooner or later So then suddenly you don't love yourself anymore Nor do you hate yourself Because there's no self to love There's simply the state of this Which is love It emanates But you don't create a fiction That now you have a good relationship and love So that is moving beyond self-esteem And now we see why the Dalai Lama couldn't understand He only learnt about that concept when he met Westerners Who have a highly developed mind and ego Others also have ego But even more developed in the West perhaps But he was surrounded perhaps by monks And not quite as highly developed mental image And perhaps he himself maybe never had it I don't know But anyway it was new to him, self-esteem How strange And I write about it in the book, there's a little paragraph on that The end of having a relationship with yourself You don't need to arrange certain thoughts in your head That you feel good about it So self-esteem is replaced by something deeper and more real I have found that I am able to surrender to many things But there are some things that I still struggle with In particular, my pain body still reacts vigorously to injustice of all kinds Particularly abuse of power and cruelty to animals And people who still insist on saving seats here at the front of the hall With their books or clothing despite being requested not to do so And it's always the same people OK I won't talk about the last part of the question It's enough that I read it But the first part OK Reacting to injustice of all kinds Particularly abuse of power, cruelty to animals Well, wherever you look on this planet You will find it In one form or another You will find violence and cruelty and injustice and abuse of power And corruption Perpetrated by humans Against other humans Against children, animals Against nature, against the planet itself You would be overwhelmed if you knew what is happening on the planet Even at this moment What humans are doing to other humans Even at this moment And it's been going on ever since anybody can remember Recorded history and beyond And of course there are certain pockets where that is particularly pronounced or marked So wherever you look you see that Unconsciousness, humans So identified with their form That they are totally trapped in it So identified with the mental form of me That other forms are dead They have deadened their sensitivity through identification with mind-made images So they don't know what they are doing to other humans Because they have reduced other humans to mere labels, mental labels They have attached judgments, images and labels onto other humans And now anything is possible Any act of violence Through conceptualizing other human beings And what you do to others you do to yourself So in the case of certain, let's say This is only one example Terrorists is one example But respectable scientists working on chemical weapons There is no end to it But let's just, how can a terrorist commit an act, kill thousands of people?

Well before he can do it He has to reduce those human beings to a mental concept He has to attach a label to them And that's what he does In the case of Muslim terrorists And it's not confined to that religion Christians did many similar things A few hundred years ago They would kill anybody they could label as heretic Or whatever label they had But didn't quite believe what we believe Kill him And the terrorists just to put the label of unbeliever Onto a group of people For some who are so identified with mind That just that simple label already deadens And they have reduced these human beings to a mental concept And they are now called unbelievers Once you have reduced human beings to a concept You can do anything to them And won't sense and feel it anymore It's a tiny example And so you are so identified with a form Totally identified with a form That all other forms are alien to you And you can do anything to them To use them Or in fear try to kill them Because they might do something to you So really it's a total identification With conceptual identity Which you manufacture for yourself and for others And so you don't know the aliveness that is there You don't know that anymore Because you inhabit a conceptual reality And that conceptual reality is amplified The madness of that is amplified By the pain that you carry inside That's been there for so long The pain body That energizes and amplifies The already mad conceptual reality So all the pain flows into those mental concepts And then any act of violence is possible Or exploitation What you are doing to the planet They don't know When they see a forest Totally identified with mind It's immediately labeled As they see only timber perhaps And how much it costs They look at it through their mental conditioning Wherever you look on the planet Humans are manifesting That degree of unconsciousness That's what it is Now of course you could feel angry about it You could feel sad about it You can feel upset about it It's only normal, isn't it? But you look through it And see also here The impersonal nature Of what is being done Not to manufacture an identity For those people Or groups of people Or tribes Or religions Doesn't matter Not to make an identity Out of the manifestation of unconsciousness And say that's who they are They are evil That is their nature It may look like that When you look at it on the surface But ultimately all evil reveals itself As total identification with form Which implies total identification with mind Complete absence of an observing presence Witness Not the slightest gap You're totally in mind And so of course it is tempting To make that into an identity You can do it for yourself too Because you can look back on your life At a time when you were less conscious than you are now And you may have done certain things in your life When you were younger To other people You may have failed to do something That you should have done Perhaps in relation to your children Whatever it may be So you may have done something Or failed to do something That now you see as bad It is very tempting To incorporate this Which after all was only The manifestation of human unconsciousness Through this form It's very tempting to make an identity For yourself out of that And say I did that That was me Then it's going to incorporate it Into the unpleasant story of me It becomes part of the mind created image Of who I am And the ego will hang on even to that Anything that gives food To strengthen your identity Your mind made identity The ego which is the mind made self Will grasp that And it will happily grasp at guilt Because guilt is To identify yourself With the movement of unconsciousness That happened through this form And say that was my identity Me I did that Me So it gives you It strengthens enormously Your mind made sense of self And this is why it's hard When you are You do not look through that mechanism People find it hard to get rid of guilt The feeling that I am bad because I did that And so they don't see They make an identity for themselves Out of something That was the expression Of human unconsciousness And the same thing for others You can do it to others Say that is who they are And then you may begin to Want to fight those people Because you must fight evil And so you get drawn into Having enemies You create enemies And it looks so just It is a just cause But you are attacking And without knowing it You get very subtly drawn into Unconsciousness Through attacking unconsciousness Manifestations of unconsciousness Very subtly you get drawn Into that yourself It does not mean that you cannot take action In order to remedy certain manifestations Of unconsciousness But all that is secondary to Getting to the root of human unconsciousness Which of course is in each one Getting to the root of it In yourself as mind identification Becoming free of that Then you can also Of course you can at the same time Also do good Where you see it is needed Help people, yes But being careful that you don't create Enemies to fight This will draw you into unconsciousness And before you know it You do the same things That those people that you are fighting against So to see also here The non-personal nature of human dysfunction Of human madness They are simply through those forms What is being expressed is the human condition In its present evolutionary stage Which is coming to an end This stage fortunately But you see it still everywhere So don't make it into an identity Nor an identity for yourself About something that you did once Nor something that you observe in others And that's called forgiveness Forgiveness means not to mistake Human unconsciousness For who that human being is The opposite of forgiveness Is to make that mistake So forgiveness is simply to see through that And see the true meaning of forgiveness That there is nothing to forgive That is the true meaning of forgiveness It's all contained in Because we have this beautiful That image of the cross and Jesus That contains so much wisdom That you could All contained in that image And it's all contained in the last words of Jesus Which were, forgive them For they know not what they do He did not make an identity For those people Out of what they did to him Now they know not what they do Means in modern terminology They are unconscious So if he had lived now He probably would have said They are completely unconscious It's okay They don't know So forgiveness arises As you stop manufacturing Mind created identities For people And then you become A manifestation of a different consciousness In this world And your presence Is then enough to change the world Because that transformation of consciousness Has already happened within you Very tempting That non-forgiveness Is very tempting And it's mind and it's ego Similarly your parents You might find You may still have some resentment Some of you They expressed Human unconsciousness They didn't have a choice It looks as if they had a choice But that comes only in with presence And that's the choice to be free of mind When you talked about the new consciousness arising Even as the old is getting louder in the world Can that also be on an individual basis?

I find the stronger presence gets in this room Form The more dramatic the pain body gets when it arises Could you talk a little about this? Yes, I've encountered this quite often That as presence arises You experience your pain body more acutely More Almost it feels sometimes As if it came up all at once And of course the pain body is trying to sabotage presence We are not making the pain body into an enemy But this is what the pain body tries to do So you simply see that this is what it tries to do So it will create It can be so much so That I'm tempted to say almost That it can be to such an extreme That it looks as if you were being faced With your entire karma all at once But ultimately it comes up to sabotage But the fact that it comes up is the opportunity for it To rise up into the light of consciousness And be transmuted there So it is right and good that it should come up Because there is sufficient presence Although it tries to sabotage presence There is enough presence in you To meet it In that state of attention and allowing And that's an accelerated transmutation That many people now experience Especially those people In whom presence is arising very quickly Who come into contact with this or other teachings That in slightly different ways point to the same So as presence arises The transmutation of all that accumulated pain Also accelerates So you are right, there is an equivalent movement You see in the outer world The old and the new The old becoming more mad Even as the new arises To the extent that You know how usually television expresses only The old consciousness With relatively rare that it Anything new comes through That is a manifestation of the liberation The liberation from mind To the extent that this teaching Was on national television in Canada In the evening news for three minutes All the other news were of course about The violence in the Middle East And this and that And the killings there And the uprisings there And suddenly there was Oh and then there is this teacher here How did this get into the news? And then I hadn't realized How closely the two go together This would have been inconceivable Even a couple of years ago To have something this isn't news I've always been saying This is underground This is happening underground It's not news and yet It's appearing even in the media That it filters through here and there Yes of course they had to have a little Thing to make it appear as if it were newsworthy And they said who is this teacher Who stills the minds of the rich and famous Oh that's news But the producer actually knew what he was doing And he knew that he needed that little thing To get it in there Otherwise his boss wouldn't have allowed it in So he had to get this in And it got in So it's there It's no longer totally underground And then the equivalent thing within human beings The madness is still there Even as the new arises And at times the wave of madness Which is both mind identification And the amplified mind through the pain body Can come in very powerful waves And you can feel And yet there is a reason why this is happening The transmutation is accelerating It has to come up into the light of presence The pain body cannot be transmuted If it doesn't come up into the light of presence Now the pain body wants I talk about the pain body as if it were an entity And it's a perspective on it The pain body really wants to sabotage it To get food back from your mind It wants to take your mind over again So it comes up very strongly But it doesn't know that There is a greater, larger reason why it's coming up And that is because it needs to become transmuted And perhaps deep down it wants to become transmuted Trying to sabotage really is wanting to dissolve Wanting to become dissolved into consciousness So you're faced sometimes with waves of pain or madness in your life And just, well, what can you do?

Just be there if you can And watch that And occasionally you will get lost in it That's part of it too And then you wake up out of it again And perhaps next time A witnessing presence remains even as the wave sweeps through you And if there is a witnessing presence Even if only in the background The wave will move through more quickly If there's no witnessing presence It gets lodged in here And it can hang on Through witnessing presence the pain body comes up Perhaps very strongly And you will experience it as an energy movement through you Which you may even shake with anger or fear As that happens The body may shake as this energy comes up And you meet it in the state of acceptance and surrender There's the fear And you allow it to happen Allow it to be Even as the body shakes One could say You are suffering If you can even call that suffering Because if there's an observing presence It's just pain So you're getting through the end of suffering Are you still suffering? A little bit And you suffer consciously By allowing that pain movement to be there You suffer It's okay That's enormously powerful To bring that acceptance into the suffering And then it's not suffering anymore It's simply pain Suffering requires an entity A me With a story With mind activity around it And a story around it A suffering entity But now you realize the pain body is simply energy movement Non-personal Nobody's It's not you So that's the So when it comes In those of you in whom it comes strongly Welcome it As it comes If you lose yourself in it It takes you over Okay That was it And next time See if you can be there as it arises And accept it Is it beneficial To the practice of being present To live in an ashram or monastery? If so, are there any you recommend?

Well I visited quite a few And everywhere they seem to be struggling With the same things Whether it's in the monastery Or in the outside world They're having the same conflicts And the same struggles In the utopian communities And you look underneath the surface And you find It's the same as the board meeting in the corporation When they get together So you can go To a monastery or ashram Realizing It's fine, you can surrender there Or you can surrender In everyday life as a householder Surrender there It doesn't really matter where you surrender Of course there are Certain monasteries or groups Where people come together In order to be present With varying degrees of success It helps to be with people Who are also Going through this transformation Entering presence Sangha To have a community It doesn't necessarily have to be A place where you live But to get together Occasionally In the state of presence Either in stillness Or listen to a talk That comes out of presence And then go into stillness That can be helpful Often people ask me When are you going to have your center? And I said, well It may be happening It hasn't happened yet Who knows In any kind of organization Ashram Whatever it may be You will find Unless the people are already free They will bring in Their mind structures Even if their reason for being there Is freedom They still carry with them The mind structures And there have been many examples Of utopian communities Who degenerated Very quickly Into the same madness That you see in the outside world Their intentions were good But The whole of communism The intentions were good Behind it Equality, justice No ownership Wonderful But they hadn't They thought the answers were in Some organizational structure Changed that Not realizing Whatever you create Out of your state of consciousness Is a reflection of that state of consciousness And they hadn't looked at that So communism In order to achieve a better world A future projection First they had to kill About 10 million people In their own countries In order to get There There Future Salvation was in the future And the moment, the now Was a means to getting there And if the now is a means To getting to a mental projection of future The now becomes hell And you can do that to yourself On a personal level Or you can do it collectively If you as a group need to get To a future projection So I would recommend That you visit some monasteries And see How it goes Visit See how you feel there Buddhist, whatever it may be Hindu, Buddhist, Christian Am I ever going to have a center? I don't know What's it going to be like? Is it going to generate into egoic madness?

Who knows Surrender wherever you are Wherever you are Now is the right place For your practice of surrender That is the primordial Truth Not seek a situation that is More conducive to surrender Seek a situation that is more conducive It may change Your external situation Is more likely to change If you surrender now If presence arises now Then it's more likely to change But to say The external change is a prerequisite For my practice That is a fallacy Wherever you are Whatever condition Whatever state Surrender to that No demand That this moment should be different That this place should be different A total alignment With what is And then who knows Perhaps suddenly an ashram grows around you Before you know it Especially in India This is easier to happen in India You just need to sit under a tree And if you are If you are Present and surrendered Of course there are many Who pretend also I know that There are many who pretend Because it's a living They couldn't do that in the west Because whether you are real or not real They won't recognize you Sorry But here if you sit under a tree Or in a cave Somebody will find you And somebody will know Be drawn to you To the state of consciousness That you embody And they'll come with some food And then Two years later Somebody else will come And then two more And then some more people sitting under trees Around you And then before you know it There's a little ashram All that doesn't happen in the west It's beautiful It's unstructured There's nobody saying Okay, let's have a planning committee You are in charge of that You are in charge of that Now let's go and do it Whereas here organically It suddenly comes into being And that's beautiful Less egoic intervention Not that some egos will get in there too Of course they will And then if you are unlucky A western person will come And write a book about you And then they'll transport you to the west And then the problems start I'm joking a little It is wonderful that So much of The essence of the spirituality Of this country Has spread now Throughout the world Beautiful phenomenon India has been like a seed One of these seeds You blow And all the seeds go And that's happened Fairly recently Very quickly And that's part of the transformation That ancient wisdom That was there, been there for thousands of years Now it's flowing there And it's still the same And yet there's Enormous intensity to it now Because of the evolutionary Stage that we are at On the planet One could almost say all those thousands of years Were preparation Getting ready for this evolutionary Transformation on the planet But we have come a long way In just half a century I read recently, I picked up Paul Brunton's book In Search of Secret India Through which Ramana Maharshi Became known in the west And in the introduction He's trying very hard to convince the reader That India has something To offer to the west Which was maybe 1930 Or whenever it was written Trying to convince that There is something valuable And now you don't need convincing anymore Nobody needs convincing anymore And then we have This strange phenomenon Which is very recent Western spiritual teachers Unheard of They haven't existed since The Middle Ages The last spiritual teachers Were the Christian mystics In Europe And after that all you had Was institutionalized religion Mind stuff Of course maybe a few Accidental realizations here and there But they were quickly Killed or shut away And now it's Appearing everywhere Western spiritual teachers In the west Spiritual teacher to many Is a meaningless term What do you do for a living Spiritual What's that And yet It's growing For many of them The seed was Here They were seeded here This teacher This form It happened accidentally But after that I was drawn to Certain Expressions of Indian Spirituality through Ramana Maharshi and Krishnamurti And I realized Through them what had happened To me And there was a strong Immediate sense of Connected, deep connectedness If not to say Oneness So Then people ask me often Have you been to India And then they were surprised And I said no I've never been to India What? You haven't been to India? And you are a spiritual teacher And I said I carry India in here Because India Represents the inner dimension And the west represents The outer one could say And so I always felt Drawn to that I never felt Really Not After the transformation That feel like a Westerner India is the The inner Not that it does not manifest Also human madness That is universal on the planet Of course you have manifestations Of human madness In different forms here But that is universal And yet It's the cradle Of the transformation Of consciousness Attention to the resistance Of the present If powerful enough Will dissolve that resistance And a state of presence will emerge What will dissolve The central core of the self So that it doesn't create Endless waves of resistance Can we explore The nature of the realization That is necessary What will dissolve The central core of self So that it doesn't create Endless waves of resistance Central So what is The central core of self The mind structures The mind movements That are The mental image of me With its accumulated content Plus the pain body The two in cooperation Form the central core Of the central core of self So What will dissolve That Of course that's easy Surrender Only now Surrender It's too easy isn't it It's too simple Surrender To whatever form This moment takes Then The self cannot Survive In the state of surrender To what is It's as simple as that The pain body cannot renew itself When you surrender to the fact That there is a pain body And so surrender I'm not telling you From now on You need to be In continuous surrender For 24 hours a day Oh no It's not that difficult It's only this moment That you need to surrender to Not Just this Whatever form this takes It's always this That you meet In and through surrender That you can do You can't surrender for 24 hours a day That's a problem But just this It's only now And so The egoic self Nor the pain body Can survive In surrender And so And then the question may arise Well, how long is it going to take Before The central core Of self And my pain body Have dissolved And that question implies That surrender is not yet complete Is this moment that bad That you need to get To a future one Where You achieve a certain state To realize The goodness and depth That is already here And only through surrender You realize that Who you are already You are greater Than in your wildest Egoic dreams You could ever be You are already Greater Than you could ever be Even if the wildest Egoic dreams of achievement Became realized Now Already You are that And you are not going to be Closer to God At some future point than you are now And God is yourself The deepest level Of your being You are not going to get closer Than you are now You are already so close That you are not even two Nor is anybody Closer than you are To God And If you want to be in silence For the rest of the day Feel free To do so Tomorrow You will do your own thing Or do nothing We may have a complete Day of silence on Thursday In the meantime Every moment Is now And no matter Where you go Or what you do Whether you stay here tomorrow In silence Or go out and experience This or that See this or that Don't walk around As a heavy person Just A field of presence And perceive Through that beautiful stillness That is there in you If you go somewhere Perceive the multiplicity of forms The beauty of it Be as much free of mental labeling As possible Surrender To this moment

[Speaker 2] (8:36:03 - 8:39:28)

Be as much free as possible Surrender To this moment Be as much free as possible To this moment Be as much free as possible Surrender To this moment Be as much free as possible Surrender To this moment Be as much free as possible Surrender To this moment Be as much free as possible To this moment Be as much free as possible Surrender Gati, Gati.

to Japanese shakuhachi, the essence of that music is of course not in the sounds, but in the spaces between the sounds. So when you listen to music like that, it's helpful to, one could say, almost pay more attention to the spaces than to the sounds. So the sounds point to that, and that is similar in some paintings, Japanese, Chinese, where you see a little rock in one corner, a branch somewhere in some other corner, and it's mostly empty space, nothing much there.

And so the contemplation of that can, if you pay attention to empty space instead of paying attention to the little that's there in the empty space and talk about that, but acknowledge, be aware of the empty space, which you can only do through the empty space within yourself, to be aware of the empty space, either the space in the music or the space in the painting, the emptiness there, to acknowledge it, to be aware of it, is through that within yourself, not never through thought, because the empty space is the formless, thought is form. And the formless is your essence identity. And then of course you have a temporary form identity, physical and psychological form.

But only knowing yourself as the form identity is bondage, is ignorance, is delusion, no matter how clever the form identity is, no matter how much knowledge the form identity has, no matter how many experiences the form identity has accumulated and identifies with as me, it is ignorance only to know yourself as the form, physical body, mental form, psychological form of me, the mind made image me.

And then in the truest sense of the word, you don't know who you are. And who you think you are is an illusory entity. And because it's illusory, it's never at ease.

You can never be yourself through the illusory entity. And then the illusory entity seeks because it knows its own incompleteness and lack. And then it seeks to strengthen the illusion.

It seeks to add more to the illusion, believing by adding more to the illusion, finally you arrive at something substantial and true and permanent and lasting beyond decay and can never find it because you don't know yourself as the formless. So we are here to know ourselves as the formless. And in any situation, as you move about this world, which is the world of form, the world will exert its pull upon you in any interaction with another human being.

The question is, is there space in the world in the interaction? Or is the interaction entirely through form, mind? And I'm often sometimes surprised, sometimes people who are already able to allow that stillness that is intrinsically one with the formless to arise, when they get challenged by the world, they get totally drawn into whatever form the challenge takes and the reaction takes.

They get immediately lost and believe that something out here, or in their minds, which is also out here, they believe that something out here matters, is vitally important. And so the world seduces you, that includes of course the mind, but the world seduces you into believing that this matters absolutely and you must give me your total attention. And so you get lost in your reaction, which is also a form, a conditioned form, and you're totally in it.

And then you're talking to someone. And it's very serious, very serious. You must listen to me.

This is what happened. And now, what are we going to do about it? Or there's fear, oh, what's going to, this dread, it's all.

Your whole self is drawn into the, space is lost and all you have is form. So that means you get lost completely in the form. And this is when you, the whole civilization is lost in that.

When you listen to the news, there's no sense of space. The newsreader is very serious and reads out all these things that matter so much and everything is very problematic because if it's not problematic, it doesn't reach the news. It doesn't need to be deep or meaningful or whatever.

No, it needs to be problematic. There must be something here that is news. So those people who are themselves lost in form, they select the news for you and then it's presented as it matters.

This is, these problems are so important. And the potentially redeeming dimension, redemptive, redeeming, whatever, they don't know it. There's no space around it whatsoever.

So you get seduced by the world into believing that that's all there is. And then the world becomes more important to you than God, to use theistic language. You might say, no, all I want is God's realization, whatever, liberation, self-realization.

All I really want is that. And five minutes later, what you really want is this situation matters absolutely. You get drawn into that.

And then, so the question is when you say, I want God, self-realization, it's true when you say it, it's true. But five minutes later, you don't want it anymore. You want the world.

Because to say, I want God, it means I'm willing to enter the surrendered state of consciousness. No, I'm willing to enter surrender and nothing else matters. It's also saying, I want peace.

And that is my main, the only true thing that I want is peace. And a little later, the world comes in and then you want something else. In the text called the Course in Miracles, which was a channeled teaching, there are the beautiful lines.

I want the peace of God. To say these words means nothing, is nothing, but to mean these words is everything. Nobody can mean these words and not be healed, which means, of course, not be whole, not be yourself, to truly want it.

So we have the two, when you are not in the state of surrender, are you, people say, I just, I can't, I can't surrender, I can't. Is it that you can't or that you're not willing? You have to look, there are two perspectives on the same thing.

I'm not able, or perhaps if you look closely, there's something in you that doesn't want to surrender, that wants the non-peace, and to see that, that there is a movement in you that is very deep, that is true, that wants realization, wants peace, there's another movement in you that does not want it, and that can very easily obscure the deeper, essence within yourself that wants peace. It's important to realize that there is a conditioned movement in you that wants problems and conflict rather than peace. Once you know it, it's fine, and once you can see it, even as it comes up and operates, and that may include, of course, the pain body, but it is a conditioned mind movement that is one with the egoic sense of self, which periodically and very frequently needs to enter the state of conflict to sustain itself.

The mind made egoic self cannot live for very long without entering conflict, and inhabiting a world of problems. It needs to create that to sustain itself. If you don't know that, you get lost in that compulsive need, which could also be called in humans the addiction to suffering in humans, and you need to see it within yourself that that is there, and it's not personal.

If you think it's a personal problem of mine, then you get trapped even more deeply. The addiction to suffering, the need for conflict is unconscious, and it is how that separate identity that is mine, the egoic identity, keeps its boundaries intact. The boundaries between me and all those others, all those out there, other people, my enemies in the form of people or situations or places, or this moment.

Occasionally you get a relief, and then for a little while you're, ah. And then the need, the addiction to suffering comes back, and when you don't know it, you believe that the world around you is making you suffer, is doing it to you. And that is the essence of unconsciousness.

You then believe that the world is basically out to put obstacles in your path. This is how most people experience life and the universe. It seems like I can never be at peace for long, and suddenly the world putting obstacles in my, it's happening again.

God, why does it always have to happen to me? And then you react. And so it looks as if the world were doing it to you, and you don't realize that you, that need comes from within.

That's already dysfunctional, it's normal and it's not personal. Then you take the dysfunction a little bit further, and then we can see that it's actually insane. The belief that the world is doing something to me becomes then paranoia or paranoid schizophrenia.

And when you take it just a little bit further, then you can see, oh, it's actually quite mad. But even before it's diagnosed as paranoia, it's already mad. And so if you're diagnosed with paranoia, then you can tell yourself, just because you have paranoia doesn't mean they are not out to get you.

But. So the, it is liberation already. It is liberating to see in oneself that movement that we could call the addiction to suffering, the need for conflict, to see it.

That's already, you're becoming free in seeing it in yourself, because the seeing, what you are seeing is the conditioned. That which sees the conditioned is the unconditioned that just looks. Oh.

And so you can see in your life how periodically, maybe once or twice or three times a day, or who knows what frequency, that comes in. And then any situation will do, and certain situations bring it up even more, that need. Many people coming here to a strange environment.

India is challenging. And so it is, you can watch what comes up, all the reactivity, the reactive patterns that come up, that bring a heaviness to something that is just a situation out there. And the reactivity flows in and becomes very heavy.

The condition that is simply a condition becomes heavy through the reactivity. So that's important to know. And so all that implies there's no space when that happens.

You get drawn totally into form, because when you react against something, you react against some form which strengthens your own form identity. That's the form identity loves its reactivity. So in any interaction, in any situation, the question is, are you lost in that situation?

Which means lost in the mind formations, the reaction, the mind stream, the words that are coming out of your mouth, the thoughts that are going through your head, and you're completely in it, no space. Where's the space? There's no space, it's just that.

And then you talk to someone and just said, it could be any kind of talking. It could be gossip, it could be fearful, it could be angry, it could be, we must get something done, we can't allow this to happen. Well, whatever it is, it could be sad, but you're completely lost in that.

And where's no space? Sometimes when people come to me and they talk to me and I can see they're totally lost in the mind interaction, I just wait until they come to an end, and that could take a while. And when they finally stop, then I just wait and look at them.

And it sometimes happens that at that moment, some space comes back in them and then they wake up. And then the strange thing is you can see that no situation is really that heavy when there is space around it. It's only a situation.

It's only different forms, limitations of forms appearing in some way. It's only one more situation expressing some form of limitation. Of course, it's the world of form, no more than that.

And that no situation truly has that density and heaviness to it unless you give it to it. The world, actually the world of form isn't that heavy and bad. It's the, what you add to it makes it dense and heavy.

And incredibly magnifies what is there as the simplicity of some kind of situation. But through that, which you carry inside, which is the need for suffering and for conflict, then magnifies, blows up that situation into something very big. And it's all ultimately constructs.

It's all ultimately illusory entities being created. But it can look very big, so big that it might reach the evening news on TV. And then you know it's really heavy.

If people knew that in certain places where this unconsciousness is particularly pronounced, there are certain parts in the world where there's enormous heaviness of conflict. They're just very simple situations which could be resolved by sitting together for a few minutes around a table with space around it. They would sit.

Could be resolved in a few minutes with just some space around it. Whatever situation, Middle East, Northern Ireland, all these where human unconsciousness is particularly heavy, dense. Of course, it's everywhere.

But it's not the outer situation. The outer situation is simple. It's always simple.

It's what people, and that is the essence of karma. What flows into it, the situation is used as an excuse. And that's not confined to Northern Ireland or the Middle East in everybody's life.

It's the same. It's simple. It's always so simple.

It's always just the now. And then you, through that conditioned reaction with its need for conflict, why is this need for conflict? To strengthen my sense of self.

That is the illusion. Why are the Middle East and Northern Ireland, they're in conflict because they are defending and attempting to strengthen their sense of identity, collective sense of identity. In Ireland, they have several times a year, certain one faction has to march through the other religion's district.

They go, they've been doing it for 300, 400 years because there was a battle 400 years ago and where they killed more than the others. And so they have to assert themselves by marching through whatever Protestant, Catholic. And they ask, why are they doing this?

What is the point? Well, this is, it gives them their sense of self. They don't have no other.

And the conflict sustains it. So to see that whatever life situation you may be in, it's simple. It is always simple.

It does not have the heaviness. The heaviness comes through the projection, which is the need to enhance yourself through problems and conflict. It is the addiction to suffering.

Which is connected to having no identity beyond the little me. So it uses the world and makes it into a very heavy place. And the limitations that are inherent in the world of form become a very problematic life situation and a very problematic me.

And slowly the world turns into hell. And so it's the little, just a little, is there space. Now, all that people are, when they are lost, they are lost in form, mind form, physical form.

Reaction, conditioned reaction. They're all conscious of all these things, the forms. Now, what we could call, one could say, I'm just offering you one more pointer.

If one doesn't work, the other one might. One could say space consciousness rather than object consciousness. The whole, almost everybody goes through this world totally occupied, totally dominated, totally identified with object consciousness.

It's all this. And every object matters because you have nothing beyond it. Every object, including every mind object, which is every thought, including every emotion that comes with a thought, is object consciousness and you're in it with your sense of self, each one.

And space consciousness is absent in most people. The one thing that could redeem you, they don't know it and it's so simple. It's all that is the essence of this teaching is to teach space consciousness, not to get lost in form, not to get lost in mind.

And what ultimately that is, I cannot explain. I'm doing the best perhaps that anybody can through language. It's a miracle that one can even talk about it because of course it eludes language because language is form.

It eludes thought. You cannot fully understand it. You can only get approximations of it through thought.

It also would not be helpful to continue to elaborate and differentiate more and more the concepts and vocabulary that I use to describe that consciousness. That would take you, give you the illusion of understanding it if I differentiate it more and more, created new words to get another instance, another instance, and it would become a mental construct again. So I'm going only so far as to give you enough pointers and that's it.

The rest is, one could say, a direct transmission. Not that I am doing anything, it just happens. It's a direct transmission of presence or space consciousness, whatever you want to call it.

And that is why I pointed out at the beginning of our retreat to be conscious of that dimension here that is beyond the words. So all that the words do, they point to that, but the essence is that dimension. Now, whether you call that space consciousness, whether you call that presence or you call it stillness or you call it the unconditioned consciousness or you call it pure awareness, it doesn't matter, these are just little pointers.

Or you call it consciousness without thought or you call it pure intelligence, just another pointer. The pointer is not it. It's beyond the words, it's beyond the world and yet it's here, it's beyond form, yet it's here.

How does it come into this world? Who knows? It's here.

So to be open to that dimension as we sit here which perhaps you can't say much about it and yet it arises as the ability to just sit here in that alert stillness, that sense of spaciousness and know for yourself at first hand what it is to be conscious without thought. Even if thought happens as occasional movement within that, it's fine, there's space around it. Space.

And that is the only absolute. Everything else is relative in your life. Everything in your life matters relatively whether you succeed in the world, in the eyes of the world, whatever that means, which means the world is telling you that you've made it.

Does that matter? Well, it matters relatively if you need the mad world to tell you that you've made it, okay. Whether you are poor or rich, it matters relatively whether you live in a tiny little hut or a huge mansion, it's relative.

Yes, it matters relatively. All the outer circumstances of your life, even whether your health is good or not, yes. But not absolutely.

There's only one thing that matters absolutely and that is whether you know yourself. Whether you know yourself beyond form. If you don't know yourself, none of those things that matter relatively can save you.

To be important in the eyes of the world can't save you, doesn't give you peace, doesn't give you anything ultimately. To be wealthy doesn't save you. To live in a mansion doesn't save you.

Mansions are full of unhappy people. Looking, still looking for themselves. They thought through the mansion, they would find themselves because the self suddenly expanded into this huge mansion.

And oh, they didn't find themselves in it. But only one thing matters absolutely and that is this. Then the rest becomes very much secondary.

It changes anyway. You can't rely on anything out here. You can't trust the world.

We can't trust any form because it's going to leave you or you leave it, it dissolves. True trust is something else. Not to trust in anything that is form, but the state of absolute trust is the state of presence where no form is needed to complete you.

And no form can threaten you. So we are learning here what space consciousness is, but we're not really learning it. We are unlearning all those conditioned habits.

We are relinquishing, looking through all those conditioned habits that obscure space consciousness, obscure presence, which is already here. It's strange this, there are some places where particularly spiritual seekers are drawn and this is one of them for thousands of years they've been drawn here. And many of them remain seekers.

They're looking for themselves in some, perhaps some experience or perhaps a vision or something to be added and don't know that the very seeking obscures what's already here. So remember what I said before, space consciousness, you can bring it into any interaction and it is your job to do that because that's how the world changes. The world consists of human interaction.

You can bring it into any interaction through being in the state of attentive listening. That is the space. And then the problem may come when you start speaking.

Then the tendency is as the mind stream arises, it has a pull. And to get pulled soon after the mind stream starts to be completely pulled into it and be completely dragged along by the mind stream as you speak, words compulsively coming out of your mouth. And it'll be some kind of problem or whatever, some kind of criticism, some kind of complaint, something that is matters.

And you are so identified with comes out that you believe it to be the truth. A thought being the truth, a fragment relative perspective, one of innumerable possible perspectives on a situation, on a person, and you take it to be the truth. Yes.

So the mind stream, and this is not your personal problem again, it's the collective human mind. We talked about the pain body not being a personal matter, nor is the whole stream of thinking a personal matter. It's the human mind.

And there was a philosopher in the first half of the 20th century who made a strange statement, we don't speak, language speaks through us. Perhaps to take it a step deeper, what he meant was we don't think, thought thinks us. He's actually said, sorry, language speaks us.

So we could say thought thinks us. It is a movement, an energy movement, an energy formation, collective human. And the momentum of it is enormous.

And so the moment you might be in a state of listening, you're just, you're listening to another person's space, and then you start to speak. At first, it may be fine, there's still space around it. And then it can happen that very before you know it, you get drawn into complete identification with that mind stream, and it pulls you along.

And then, of course, you completely believe in what you say, there's no perspective anymore, you're lost in the one little perspective. This could even be, even if you don't speak, it can happen, thoughts going through your head, and you're totally lost in that, in whatever they say you totally believe in, about yourself, perhaps, about somebody else. So you're lost in the mind stream.

And it could be a while before it comes to an end, because it will proliferate into another one, into another one. And it might need somebody to hit you on the head before you suddenly go, huh! As presence arises, there's the ability in you even when the mind stream comes in, in the middle of being dragged along the mind stream, still to know that this is what's happening.

And that's all that's needed, to know that you're being dragged along by a mind stream. That means consciousness is beginning to free itself from being totally trapped in thought. Just a little knowledge that you're being dragged along by a mind stream, a tiny witness in the background.

That, mm, oh, ah. The moment that arises, there is the arising of space. It might be very small at first.

You might, and, but that's all that's needed. So you don't need to fix yourself, change yourself in knowing, oh, I must get rid of my mind. No, know it when it's there.

That's all that's needed. If you had to fix yourself, it could take a long time. Just to see the conditioning as it operates, oh, oh.

And then it cannot sustain itself for that much longer if the witnessing presence remains. The unconscious mind stream will soon come to an end because when consciousness comes in, it's hard for an unconscious movement to sustain itself. So instead of trying to rewire yourself through this or through that, and there are many people who promise to fix you.

I don't. Instead of that, allow the awareness, the aware presence to be there. And that, of course, is not something you can make happen.

It's either there or it isn't there. But the fact that you are here means it's there because it's only that that made you come here. If you came here by mistake or because of some illusion that this was about something else, as it happened, occasionally people came when I, for a little while, I called this, when I gave some talks, I had the title, Freedom from Time.

And once or twice, people came by mistake because they thought it was a seminar about time management. That happened twice. One person who came for the seminar on time management walked out and told the organizer, I'm sorry, this is meaningless to me.

I've come for time management and I'm sorry. It was a big mistake. And the other one who came was a doctor who needed to sort out his time problems.

And he sat there in astonishment for three hours. And he said, I've never heard anything like this before. And I had come for time management and thought this is so much better.

So presence, you cannot, this is something you can't make happen whether the witnessing presence is there or not. I'm speaking to you and saying that you, because I know that it is arising in you. If you should have come here by mistake, believing it was about something else or believing that this was here so that you could acquire more spiritual knowledge or more beliefs or expecting something else, emotional experiences, jumping up and down, who knows?

And then you've probably already left. Or you're sitting here in a state of bitterness and resentment and loving every minute of it. And that certainly gives you a strong sense of self.

And when you are in that state, of course, it also implies that the entire world is wrong and you are right. And you have a right to be in that state because they are all wrong. No, no, that's, well, now you know who you are.

So you cannot make, presence is not something you can make happen through anything. It is perhaps grace. And if it is grace, it's happened to you.

And it may, perhaps your mind doesn't even know it. It says, has it happened to you? I'm not quite sure if it's happened to me.

Or the mind might say, no, you're wrong. It's not happening to me at all. And yet presence can happen without you knowing it through the mind.

It's happening to certain people in the world who have never read a single spiritual book and it can happen in them. And they can't say anything about it. When it happened to me, I knew nothing about it.

If somebody had said, presence has emerged in you, I said, what's that? I knew there was peace, yes. So that's a helpful, there's some peace there.

It's emerging already. And this is why I'm saying to you, and I can't say this to everybody, that in the middle of the mind stream, there's now the possibility that space consciousness or presence is there as the witness, because there's enough presence in you for this to be possible. Oh, and that's all you need.

Now, once it has began to emerge, it is perhaps in Ramana Maharshi's terms, maybe it's a current of unconditioned consciousness, a current of awareness. That has nothing to do with thought structures. It's just arises.

Once it has arisen, that's, it's not going to stop. It can again become obscured temporarily, and then it's there again. And if it became obscured for a longer period of time through some heavy identification in your life, it would break through.

It would make room to crack the shell of ego, but it's already cracked. But if the ego does a self-repair job, which it can do, the crack could disappear again for a little while, but then presence emerges more. And so if you need a disaster for the final crack, you'll get it.

And that is also grace. Very often, people don't realize that the disaster in their lives is the greatest grace possible. So grace sometimes is, as there's a book, a new book by Ram Dass, the spiritual teacher who suffered a stroke, and his new book is called, Fierce Grace.

So it's already there. You don't have to really, for once, I agree with those teachers who say you don't have to do anything. Allow it.

It's not really a doing. Allow it to emerge. That's the opening.

Rather than feel I have to make it happen, you can't. You allow it. And so you surrender until there's no further need to surrender, until surrender disappears.

Surrender is detecting non-surrender, watching non-surrender dissolve and entering surrender. Surrender is the bridge between resistance and non-resistance to life. Resistance and non-resistance to the present moment, to the form that this moment takes.

So this is why it is our practice. It's the bridge. And use that bridge.

No other bridge is needed to find yourself. The egoic structures cannot sustain themselves in surrender. That's the beauty of it and the simplicity of it.

So people ask, how do I get rid of ego? How do I get rid of self? Just this.

Everything happens then. Thought compulsive thinking subsides. And with that, the egoic structures weaken because they are thought.

Everything happens. As the compulsive thinking subsides, the mind becomes less noisy. You sense a stillness that arises.

In this now, and it's, is it within? Is it without? It is space consciousness and it arises.

And then the miracle is it can act upon even the situation that you have surrendered to, the form of this moment. That's presence, which is the unconditioned consciousness is the intelligence that then begins to operate outwardly. And that's a miracle.

And that is only a by-product of that. That's not why you do it. And it's beautiful when suddenly the forms change and become more harmonious, change very quickly.

Helpful factors come into your life. You don't know how, where from. Coincidences happen because the totality, you're connected with it now.

It's moving through you. But all that is only icing on the cake. There's a question I didn't bring.

We'll look this afternoon at more questions. One question that was asked was if consciousness moved through those human beings who became liberated, created the circumstances that are right for liberation to happen, why isn't consciousness doing it to everybody right now? What's the delay?

That's a, I'm paraphrasing the question. Why can't consciousness do it now if it did it for Jesus, or if it happened to this form or whoever? Of course, the answer is it is happening right now.

You are in the midst of an evolutionary transformation on this planet, not only in the midst, you're an essential part, a cell within the totality of the human organism because humanity one could consider as one organism with billions of cells. And this collective organism, which goes beyond the physical, is going through a transmutation as that organism. And part of the organism is still untransformed and it's beginning its transformation.

And what you perceive as your person is a cell in that organism that is going through that transformation. So from the limited point of view of the person, that is the greatest gift, the greatest adventure, the greatest purpose in your life. That greatest purpose is not in the future, but it's already being fulfilled at this moment.

People occasionally still come and say, what is my true life purpose? This.

[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 16:49)

...future, but is already being fulfilled at this moment. People occasionally still come and say, what is my true life purpose? This!

The outer form is secondary. Am I destined to live here or there? Am I destined to move in this way or that way?

Or what words are destined to come out of my mouth? All that is the world of form, and that will look after itself. But what is the true purpose is the transformation of consciousness, which is now.

And there are people who are already in the midst of it, and their little mind still says, I'm looking for my life purpose. And then the outer will reflect the inner. You will teach.

In one form or another, you may be teaching already. Your very presence then becomes a teaching, because the good news is that just as unconsciousness can be contagious, unless you're very present, one unconscious person can create drama in an entire room full of people, can pull everybody just by starting to fume and shout, can pull everybody into reactivity until the whole room is totally unconscious and they're all shouting. And just like that, presence is also contagious.

Presence spreads, transmits itself beyond whether you speak or not. Your mere presence is the transmission of presence, space consciousness, and it will transmit itself to those who are ready. And so it means you're teaching.

Additionally, certain words may come out of your mouth, you may have some formal teaching function in this world, it's secondary what form it takes, it may be no form at all. The beautiful thing with many Indian teachers was there was almost no form to the teaching, no structure. They just sat under a tree or in a cave and it happened.

There was no time, they didn't say, we will meet from such and such. Of course the drawback is they might not be there when you get there. Or they've just run away somewhere and you have to find them.

That's a drawback, but we live in the world of polarities, so here you have the beauty, you know I'm going to be here, unless the universe has other plans. You know I'm going to be here at a certain time, but then we have almost too much structure and then there's the totally unstructured way of teaching and that has its great beauty, in a way it's nicer than this, and yet on the other hand, he may not be there, or he or she may have gone away. Or you have to hang around for hours and hours for him or her to make some appearance.

Finally at four o'clock in the morning he comes. So it doesn't really matter what the outer form of the teaching is. You will be teaching and you are teaching already.

As the course in miracles puts it, you are a teacher of God, not through pointing to the Bible and the beauty with teaching is that you don't have to do it. It does it. Your responsibility is to remain open, surrendered to it, so that what was a dense personal self becomes more and more transparent and then it can move through you.

And that is the purpose of your life and you are becoming transparent even as you sit here, less heavy as the self structures dissolve, the heaviness of me goes. Spiritual weight loss program. I spoke of the ability that comes with presence to look at a situation, to look without analytical interference through the mind and that that brings in the intelligence that will deal with the situation, whatever form that will take.

It will deal with it through an external factor or it will deal with it through this form. And prerequisite for this looking, and I'm using the word metaphorically in a wider sense, of course prerequisite for that is you must have surrendered to this moment before you can fully look at this moment, fully give it your complete attention. Your attention cannot be complete if you have not completely surrendered to the form that this now takes.

Then that intelligence can operate. But even the slightest resistance to what is will obscure, impair the ability to simply give attention to a situation, a person, a thing. The greatest transformative agent there is, but you need to have opened the doors first.

The portal of surrender must be open and the looking. That the greatest miracle is that. I suggest that we spend today in silence alone with your mind.

Allow the thoughts to be there if they come. Don't take them too seriously. Remember that they want to be taken seriously.

They pretend that they matter absolutely and no thought matters absolutely and no thought contains the absolute truth. So there is a compassionate relationship that you now have with your mind. You just see its limitations, which in themselves are not a problem.

They are the limitations of form. So you allow those limitations to be there. And there is the space around thought, in between thoughts.

Compassion and allowing go together. So when we speak of compassion, it's intrinsically linked to allowing what is to be. That is compassion.

And that has great power. Even your pain body. We looked at it yesterday.

What can you do? You allow it to be. There is space around it.

At first it seems very little space. And then a bit more. And so your relationship with your pain body is also one of compassion.

Allowing other people's minds. There is no really other people's minds. It's the human mind coming through this form.

Allowing that. Not demanding that they shouldn't manifest the human mind. Not demanding that they should be enlightened by now.

Why aren't you? You shouldn't behave like that anymore. You should be enlightened.

Compassion with human unconsciousness. What's unconsciousness? Complete identification with the conditioned mind.

That is unconsciousness. Wherever you go, you'll find it. Wherever you meet humans, you'll find it.

If you demand that it should be otherwise, you're in for big problems. Because wherever you go, you'll meet all those people who are unconscious. And you'll start complaining about it.

Saying they should be more conscious. And in that, become unconscious yourself. So you bring in consciousness through allowing, which is also compassion, that transforms.

So compassionate through allowing with the human condition, which is in yourself and in others. Not making, we looked at it yesterday, I put slightly different perspective on it, not making the human condition, which is unconsciousness, which is the human condition in its evolutionary, present evolutionary stage, which is coming to an end, but is still the predominant human condition, identification with mind, unconsciousness, pain body, identification with pain body, not making that into an identity for people. That's the opposite of compassion.

That is called judgment. Now judgment means to mistake unconsciousness for someone, to mistake the manifestation of human unconsciousness for a person. There is no person, there is simply the movement of human unconsciousness.

So judgment, you confuse the being, the identity, the true identity of that being, with the behavior that they manifest through manifesting human unconsciousness. And of course, there can be no compassion there. It is judgment.

You can do it to yourself too. You look back on what you did yesterday, and it was unconscious, and then you say, that was me. I'm bad.

Useless. Nothing to do with who you are. So wherever you meet unconsciousness, allow it.

Nobody there. Not a person. That is the transmission of presence, that allowing.

So you don't have to do anything to change them. The change happens. More questions.

This afternoon we may look at some. So we keep noble silence for the rest of the day, at least until after dinner, or beyond.

You may look at some questions, later today or tomorrow, if anybody wants to ask verbal questions, you're also welcome, either do it today or tomorrow. You will find the answers to most questions, if they are vital questions, within yourself, or the solution to any problem, in the stillness. Take it into the stillness.

And even when you're engaged in thought, trying to solve something, a problem or a situation, step back from thought periodically. Thought has its place, but it is more important to step back from thought and to look. After a while, thought comes back, perhaps with an insight or a solution, or the problem itself dissolves, or other factors come in and you don't know how they got there.

This question I referred to this morning, I mentioned it briefly, we'll just have a quick look at it again. Question since childhood, if God consciousness was able to realize itself through you, Jesus, Buddha, et cetera, why doesn't it save itself all the time it takes for the rest of us, and just do the deed, whatever set of circumstances it took to create it, Jesus, Eckhart, whoever, just create those same circumstances in the rest of us. Boo hoo.

Many answers are possible depending on what perspective. The very thing that's being asked is actually happening. This is the best possible circumstance, and the best possible moment, as far as liberation is concerned, it's already happening.

Or you can change the question slightly. The question starts with, if God consciousness was able to realize itself through you, Jesus, Buddha, why doesn't it save itself all the time? You could put I instead.

If I realized myself through that form, why am I taking all this time to realize myself through this form? Why am I giving myself, if I am consciousness, why am I giving myself all that time? Why not now?

And be done with it. If you want it completely, it's here now. But that's not wanting to do with willpower, wanting nothing else.

Now, at the moment, perhaps you might say, yes, I don't want nothing else, but in 10 minutes time, you may want something else. You may want to be identified with a mind stream. Surrender now.

So a lot of time is saved in that way because surrender, which is the doorway, takes no time and requires no particular circumstances even, except what's here. What's here is already ideal. Within the totality, what's here, the totality has brought that which is here into manifestation.

It is connected with everything. This moment, the form that this moment takes, is connected to everything. It couldn't even be otherwise.

The totality has brought it about, and so you recognize the perfection of it, not through some mental concept that says, it really is perfect. I'm trying to convince myself. It really is perfect.

But through surrender to this. So all you ever need to do is get this moment right in your whole spiritual practice. Get this moment right, not the rest of your life, just this moment.

You get it right by recognizing the rightness of this moment. Why are so many seekers women and so many teachers are men? It is true that in many gatherings, there is a higher percentage of women than men.

I don't know about here. It's maybe equal here. But in many gatherings, sometimes you had 70% women.

And I speak about this in the book, that consciousness now moves more quickly through the female form. And what the questioner says was true until very recently. But it's no longer the case.

Even within the last year or year and a half, I've met more women teachers than men teachers. They are arising. Yesterday I met a woman teacher who has an ashram nearby, Shanti Mai.

And I met, even within a year, I met Catherine Ingram in the United States. I met Byron Katie. I met Gangaji.

There are many. It's always wonderful to meet them. And everywhere now, the female form is becoming more and more of a vehicle for that.

Until recently that was not the case. Not that women didn't become liberated, but it wasn't recognized in what was mostly patriarchal societies. Even those women, they were not readily recognized by the established patriarchal structures of whatever their religion was.

And we may come to a time soon when there are actually more female teachers than male teachers. There are some Indian female teachers also. And many of those women are destined also to become teachers.

We all teach in some way. Teacher in a more conventional sense, actual spiritual teachers. Perhaps quite a few of those present here will become teachers if you are not already doing it in one form or another.

And even in Tibetan Buddhism there are now some women teaching through a form that before had only allowed the male. Three questions which I may all read before any answer. All concerning sexuality and presence.

I'm a man stuck in a man's body and would like to understand more about sexual addiction, which seems to come as part of the package of this form. Is it just a primal instinct and can I ever truly evolve beyond it? Is celibacy required?

Helpful? I oftentimes hear people speak of Krishnamurti's sexual life. I don't think there was very much of that.

There may have been some. And so people say, I was a student of his until I heard about his sexual life. I feel he had to be writing from that place of presence to write what he did.

And it touched me deeply. Can you comment or is this too hypothetical? Do we have too many judgments around sexuality?

Why is a great teacher so judged and negated when it appears he falls out of the parameters? I have some confusion because I want to defend him and yet... Is celibacy required or helpful?

These questions are kind of connected. Yesterday evening I stepped out onto the lawn outside and I saw two monkeys engaged in procreative activities. It lasted for a few seconds.

And then it was over and the male monkey was eating. And I thought to myself, oh my God. And the thought came into my mind, this monkey has no problem with sex.

It's just... Is celibacy required or helpful? That depends.

It can be helpful or it can be a hindrance. It depends on the one who practices celibacy. Let's talk about the hindrance first.

If celibacy is the result of adopting a certain mental position, a thought, a perspective on what sexuality is, and it is this thought that touches something to sexuality, from that perspective it is called perhaps impure or unspiritual. That is one of many possible perspectives. It's a thought, it's a fragment.

It may contain a little bit of truth. The opposite thought may also be true. It is divine.

But if you are a practitioner and the basis for your practice is identifying with a mental position, a perspective, a concept in the head, if that is the motivating power, because you want to make your life conform to the mental concept that you identify with, the position that you adopt and identify with. And then you attempt to make your life conform to that mental position. And so, then celibacy becomes your practice and whenever sexual feelings arise, they will immediately, of course, be judged from that mental position.

As impure or as not spiritual. And then a time may come when you need to even deny to yourself that you have those feelings, if you are very extremely identified with those mental positions, because they clash with the mental image that you have of yourself as pure and spiritual. And so you have the reality, a sexual feeling arises, or a sexual thought arises, and it clashes with the mind-made image of me.

And it may go so far as to require you to deny completely that you even have it. Or if you don't deny it completely to yourself, feel guilty about it, because you are not living up to the high standards that you have set yourself, mental concepts. So you are not living up to your mental concepts.

And so the feelings that arise are not happy ones. And that further creates a problematic self-image as the struggling me who is still impure and hasn't made it yet. Guilt arises, perhaps self-doubt arises, self-hatred may arise.

All strengthening your false sense of self. The ego doesn't mind. It loves feelings of guilt.

And not good enough, because it strengthens your sense of self. It doesn't mind whether the sense of self is the master of the universe or not good enough. If I can't be the master of the universe, at least I can't be not good enough.

Mental concepts. Or you may deny altogether that you have sexual feelings, because they would shatter the image that you have of yourself as an advanced spiritual practitioner, having reached level 7 already. And at level 6 you go beyond sex.

And so if you deny to yourself even, and this has happened in Christianity in the past, happened often, you can't even admit it to yourself, because it would clash with that image, then it is totally suppressed. And if that is totally suppressed, which is a vital force, somehow, somewhere, it will come up again. And then it will overpower you completely.

If you're lucky, only in wild dreams while you're asleep, and then you wake up, oh, dreadful, and then you may have some interpretation that the devil put some dreams into your head. Or they may come as suddenly a sexual obsession, or some obsession to do with sex that you can't get rid of, and it becomes totally overpowering. And so you become extremely unhappy.

So here we have then somebody who practices celibacy and is making it into a hindrance. Through it, he, she is strengthening their false sense of self, is strengthening their identification with a mental position and a perspective and a judgment. Believing completely in the absolute truth of that particular thought or judgment.

And that person can practice celibacy for a lifetime, and all it will do is strengthen the false sense of self. At some point, maybe sexual feelings may not arise anymore, and then that person may continue to build a mental image on top of that and say, I finally made it, I am pure and spiritual, but it may only be old age. My father called me up three years ago.

He is now 85. So at 82, he called me up and said, I have finally transcended sex. And said, I don't know why people are interested in such things, it's so ridiculous.

I need to add that all his life he was very interested. And I said, that's good, congratulations. And last year he called me and said, I was wrong.

And he was very happy to tell me that he had not transcended yet. So I said, congratulations. And then there could be celibacy that arises naturally in your life situation.

And that enables you to observe, to bring presence to what is usually an enormous force that pulls you into great unconsciousness, an enormous life instinct. And celibacy could be helpful. A period of celibacy is good in anybody's life.

But not artificially created. Be open to see whether it naturally arises out of your life situation. And then you can observe, make it into spiritual practice.

You can observe the relationship, which can be a very powerful one, between your thought processes and sexuality. And it is often the case that even in people who are letting go of identification with mind, as a last resort, the mind will link into sexuality. And that can give renewed energy to mind activity.

And the mind knows that. So there is a very strong link in many people between the incessant mind stream and for a great number of people, a considerable part of the mind stream is connected with sexuality. Fantasies, images.

And that link between sexuality and thought processes can keep thought processes going for a long time. So you can bring presence to the feeling, a sexual feeling, without it identifying with it, and allowing it to rise up into the mind, and again becoming part of the psychological form of me. So that you have then sexual feelings that are not denied, because you do not adopt a particular mental position towards them.

Neither good nor bad. There it is. And you can watch how beautiful it is when a sexual feeling does not even turn anymore into sexual desire, that wants more than what is here now.

You can bring presence into the feeling, so that the feeling doesn't become a desire. There's simply, there's beauty, it's a manifestation of aliveness, to simply acknowledge a sexual feeling directly, feel it, sense it. It is part of, yes, being in this form which is limited.

The form, the physical form in which you come has certain limitations, and it's male or female, it's one half, it's another whole. So that half always has a longing for completion and completeness. And that's the sexual longing.

Now you cannot, of course, achieve that completeness through the sexual act. It gives you a momentary sense of completeness, but it's very short-lived. But the enormous desire behind is at the root, we could say, of sexual desire, which is to do with the incompleteness of this form, of being a half of the whole, either this or that, wanting union with the opposite polarity, that is a primordial spiritual impulse.

I would go so far as to say that everything is ultimately a primordial spiritual impulse. Even when an animal devours another animal, it is the most primeval expression of love, merging with, becoming one with. And it looks dreadful from our perspective.

So, not adopting a particular mental position towards what is. Use sexuality, whether you practice celibacy for a period of time or not, as long as celibacy arises out of the right motivation, it can be helpful. It can easily become a hindrance.

So you need to be very careful with that. Can one ever transcend sexual addiction is the question here. That's a purely human thing, of course.

Addiction means the mind has come in. And the mind wants to build a psychological me on top of your sexual exploits. The mind wants to repeat a past pleasurable experience when the body may not even want it.

And then anything can turn into an addiction, whether it be food or sex or any activity. Watch and see how the mind tries to link in with the sex center and how it uses that device to keep itself going. So, and if you practice sexuality, bring consciousness to it.

That's the essence of Tantra. So that it becomes not a means to an end, but you are totally present with the feeling as it arises. You can do that whether you have a partner or not, you can simply allow the feeling to be there.

And watch it and it doesn't turn into thought anymore. So you bring presence to that, you are not denying it. You cannot transcend anything by denying it.

And transcending does not mean that it is not there anymore, it means to go beyond. You transcend thought. Thought still operates, but you have gone beyond it.

You transcend sexuality. Sexuality, as long as there is a physical form, has its place. And it's embraced, accepted.

You are not creating a mental image around it. Allow Krishnamurti the little that he had. If you allow Krishna, and he was so liberated sexually, wasn't he?

If you allow Krishna to be so free, why not Krishnamurti? Beware of mental judgments and mental positions. That is the greatest hindrance.

Anything connected with thought and sexuality creates problem out of sexuality. The monkey had no thought around it. That's why I was so impressed.

That it is no longer addictive when the link between sexuality and thought is not there anymore. And then it's simply to be enjoyed, whether you practice it or not, if it arises. It is a manifestation of this physical form, and that's what it is.

It is completely non-problematic. Only through mind does it become problematic. The belief that there is something in me that I need to change, that is not right yet, that I need to transcend, keeps you stuck immediately in that very position that you seek to transcend.

It's bringing acceptance into what is, including the limitations of this form. Then you truly transcend, you go beyond. Whether or not celibacy is then your way of life is a secondary question.

It doesn't matter. Yesterday, on the bus tour of hell... Some of you must have been on this bus.

Yesterday, on the bus tour of hell, I was confronted with the fear of my death. This is not uncommon in Indian traffic. I realized that I do not fear my death for myself, but for the great suffering it would bring upon my children.

Last night, that suffering came back. As I tried to embrace it, it got bigger. The suffering wasn't only mine, but the suffering of all the mothers on earth.

It got bigger and bigger. I could not embrace such suffering. A thousand mothers could not embrace such pain.

What is there to do? How can a mother be a mother without the pain that goes with it? First, of course, the thing to realize is that you didn't die.

You just thought you might. And the thought was just as bad as if it had happened. The thought itself, the possibility of loss create the mind, says this is the real possibility of me dying before we get to this destination.

And the possibility of loss, that is a mental projection, often creates corresponding reactions that are just as painful, more painful in many cases, than if it had happened. So nothing actually happened on this bus, except that it was unpleasant, I assume. So we can see how the mind already creates a situation that might happen, and then the entire body reacts as if it had happened.

And this is a typical example of how the pain body gets triggered, by something relatively small or only a thought of a loss that might occur. And then the mind projects itself into that and sees your children as destitute already. I'm dead and now my children.

And then it's already basically happened in the mind. And then you experience the emotions that would go with that and worse. And it triggers the pain body.

So you experience not just the pain that is connected with that projected non-existing event, but in addition an enormous amount of pain that is totally non-personal, that is part of humanity's pain. Perhaps part of female pain connected with child loss, part of the female pain body. So the first thing, of course, sitting on this bus, to realize a mental projection is being created.

The reaction happens as if that event had already happened. So that you don't get drawn into further mental projections. But it happened and the pain body was there.

Far more pain than would be warranted by that situation in which nothing really happened. You didn't lose your life. So that's, there it is.

The mechanism of it you can see retrospectively. How the mind, through fear, projected loss, which is fear, created that and then you had far more pain than your own personal pain and far beyond that. And you couldn't embrace it.

But you survived. So somehow you must have embraced it. And perhaps you were not totally identified with it.

But there was a witnessing presence. You realized perhaps that it was far more than your own pain or your own, the personal part of the pain body. Many children lose their parents.

And quite often parents lose their children, which is worse. Both look dreadful. And yet each human being, sooner or later, will be confronted with death.

And to some children it happens that they become confronted with death at an early age. And they survive. And that becomes a very early spiritual teaching.

And those to whom life gives that insight, they are ready for it. It may not look like that on the surface. But to experience loss at an early age is very painful.

But potentially that is already the beginning of spiritual realization. That no form lasts. Perhaps even more painful than that is for parents to lose their children.

And if that is your lesson, and there may be some of you who had to go through that. And that may be one of the reasons why you are here. The suffering that you went through at that time.

When the fabric of your existence suddenly no longer was solid. But watch your mind to see whether it is creating future loss, possible loss. This is the essence of anxious thought.

The essence of worry. The essence of projections. In a dangerous situation, see if you can relinquish past and future.

Sometimes it happens naturally. Relinquish past and future. Renounce past and future.

Use the dangerous situation to push you into presence. When we arrived in India, we got picked up at the airport. And for the first time we experienced the traffic.

And all you can do is go... Any thought movement will tell you I will be dead in one minute from now. And there is so much grace here that so many people survive.

So...

After any trip, you say, by the grace of God, I survived. So it's certainly a great teaching. This is one of the many teachings here where you can practice total surrender.

And if you don't, you'll be very miserable. I talked to my mother last night. She said, you take a train, isn't that dangerous to go back to Delhi?

Isn't it better to go by car? And I said, you cannot imagine in your wildest dreams what traffic here is like. Has being itself different aspects or qualities?

It seems that even humans who are supposed to have no ego or personality, newborns and so-called enlightened masters have different energies or vibrations. That is true. When the unmanifested, even though the form through which it filters is quite transparent, otherwise it wouldn't shine through, it's still shining through some form and there is a slight influence of the form.

So when it finally reaches the outermost layers, which can be simply in the form of a silent emanation, it can reach the outermost layers as spiritual teaching through words, it can reach the outermost layers through actions done by a teacher, this is where it differs according to certain configurations of that form. So it's slightly or considerably changed by the lampshade through which it shines. And the lampshades are slightly different.

So it comes through some as very extremely gentle and soft and yet powerful. And it comes through others as fierce, you might almost be afraid of it. And in some teachers it may come predominantly in one way with occasional the opposite also expressing itself.

So the fierce teacher can suddenly be extremely gentle. And you don't know what's happening anymore. And the gentle teacher can occasionally be very fierce.

So you have, on the one hand, the Zen master, who may attack you or attack your unconsciousness to crack it, may insult you or hit you, shout at you. But the other aspect of being is always there underneath. If the fierce teacher expresses fierceness, there is a softness underneath the fierceness.

And if the soft teacher expresses softness, there is a fierceness underneath the softness, the gentleness of being, which is as challenging, you might think, oh I'd rather go to a gentle teacher, well this is perhaps why you're here. There are other teachers who are known for being extremely uncomfortable to be with. And that's the Zen tradition.

And yet Ramana Maharshi had a gentle, silent emanation of being, very different from Zen. And yet that is equally challenging when you ask a question, and all you get is silence. It can be very challenging.

As challenging as somebody who attacks the ego that perhaps was behind the question. So these qualities exist, and usually you would be drawn to a teacher that is right for you. And some people are drawn to aggressive teachers, and that is right for them.

They love it. They love being hit over the head. Now, there are certain teachers who are aggressive without realization underneath it.

And so they will attack your ego in order to strengthen theirs. And they may not even know it. But any teacher that you come to is right for you, even the false teacher.

That's the beauty of it. Because the false teacher means there's ego, and perhaps draws your ego. And you'll be learning something about ego.

Suffering will arise, sooner or later, and you will be learning exactly what you need to learn. So it would be futile to say to somebody, don't go to that teacher if that person feels drawn. Learn what you have to learn there.

And the same when spiritual teaching comes out in the form of language and thought, there's a great difference between the ways in which it's being expressed verbally. And again, there's a difference even astrologically. It might have an influence.

The Pisces may teach in a different way from a Leo. Basically, it's the same underneath that. But the form that the teaching takes.

When one is enlightened, awake as you are, does the pain body still exist? Do you have one? Do you have one?

I don't seem to have one in here. But I can feel the human pain body. And sometimes I feel it so much, the collective pain body, that I cry.

I can feel the pain that is in the collective field. The collective unconscious of humanity. And so it happens sometimes that I cry, and then if somebody sees me, they might think, oh, you must have a pain body.

In a way, I do, because there's still this physical form. The physical form is linked to the planet and to all humans. I have read your first book, The Power of Now, six times.

That's not uncommon. Each time I go deeper with it, the book seems to vibrate with energy. Even when I first saw it in a bookstore a year ago and knew nothing about you, period.

Your second book, a condensed version of your first book, seems to lack energy. Will you write another book that vibrates, a book that reflects your teaching as it evolves? It's true that it contains, as all spiritual writings do, that come straight from presence, they contain an energy field that goes far beyond the words or the informational value of the words.

The value of the words as information may be valuable, but the function of a truly spiritual text, as well as the function of spiritual discourse, verbal discourse, always goes far beyond the information that the words convey, because the words arise out of presence. They carry the energy frequency of presence. So they reach you, of course, they go into your ears, then they go through the filter of the brain where the meaning is extracted from the words, it's decoded because it's only sounds that go into your ear, then they're translated into nerve impulses, then they reach your brain, then the brain decodes the nerve impulses, and then, usually, that is the end of you hear something, you've decoded it, and that's it. With spiritual discourse, the same thing happens, it is being decoded, and then it continues to work inside you, even after the meaning has been decoded, the energy moves in and awakens presence within you.

It touches that which is beyond the conditioned mind, and that is the true power of spiritual teaching, which goes far beyond what the words mean, and that applies both in verbal teachings as in written teachings. In verbal teachings, it can be even more powerful, and I must admit, I have no idea how it gets into the written word. I didn't do it as such, it just happens.

How it happens is a mystery. How does it get, how is it possible? It's only words on a page, it's only symbols, and yet the text contains an energy field, and that is wonderful, and this is why people can read it many times, and that's the power of spiritual teaching.

Everything else is only information. Now most books you read, you buy in bookshops, even spiritual books, probably 90% are information based, and then there's 10% of books that contain power. If you read the words of Ramana Maharshi, you can see that they also contain power, spiritual power, and you can read them many times, and they're always fresh and new.

And there are other books, ancient ones too, certain ancient texts. Now it can happen in people who are totally identified with mind, they pay so much attention to the meaning of the words, that the words reach the decoder in the brain and never go beyond it. The net is there of thought that holds them is so strong, all they get is the information that the words convey, and it doesn't reach them.

This doesn't apply to you, any one of you, it applies to people who have very dense mind structures. They would come and only listen intellectually, or read from the point of view of the intellect, and then they might say, that was quite an interesting talk, he had quite a few ideas, I liked his ideas, not bad. Now what's the next thing, where's the next book?

So it's beautiful when it works for you, and this is how it should. It is also helpful because once you can sense that, all you need to do is pick up a book, open, read half a page or one page, or a few lines, and you will know whether this text carries power or not. And increasingly you may not want to read, especially spiritual, other things, information is useful, but spiritual books, you may not want to read any more spiritual books that simply give you more facts, stuff, even more signposts perhaps, but didn't come out of presence.

And you can save a lot of money that way. Just go into a bookshop and then you put it back. Okay, I don't need this book.

So, am I going to write? I don't know about the other selections from the book, some people say it works well for them, other people say it doesn't carry the same energy, because it's not a unified whole that varies from person to person. So if it works for you, fine, if it doesn't work for you, fine.

Are you going to write another book that vibrates? A book that reflects your teaching as it evolves? It is true that the teaching evolves.

It's already gone beyond what is in the book and continues to evolve. It is possible that after this long trip, I may sit down and focus on writing again. And some people are preparing edited transcripts of talks and retreat talks, and so I'm going to look at that.

And that may become the basis for a new book, which, if it works, is also going to vibrate. Let me know if it vibrates. I have heard many stories of how people found the book, how the book came to them.

Quite amazing. One could write a book about these different stories. And it is an energy field of its own, multiplied many, many times.

And it gets into the strangest places all over the planet. Amazing. How can I free myself from my enormous desire and longing for a spiritual love relationship with a man?

Although I do understand my desire for such a relationship after 25 lonely and painful years of marriage, during which I could not give myself nor my ex-husband the love and acceptance that we were both longing for, I feel at the same time that this desire is the biggest trigger of my pain body. Even during this beautiful retreat, my pain body is sometimes active for this reason. I'm aware of that.

Since a long, long time, I feel a huge attraction towards a man. I hardly talked with him. I feel a strong attraction towards a man.

I hardly talked with him because this attraction freezes me and makes me feel uncomfortable. Because it feels almost unspiritual to have this earthly longing. Anyhow, these are the moments which keep me away from the now.

Help needed. In brackets, ha-ha. I'm very grateful to be with you.

Thank you. That longing is in everyone. And as I mentioned earlier, it's to do with being this incomplete form.

And this form wants to unite with the other half to complete itself. So you, as this physical form, may never be quite free of that longing. But as you go beyond identification with the physical form and the psychological form of me, that longing becomes an almost peripheral manifestation in your life.

No longer makes you unhappy if it is not fulfilled. The psychological me uses that longing as a substitute for surrender. The belief that through some relationship I can complete myself.

That the psychological sense of self, which also is not complete, the physical is not complete because the physical is one half of the whole. The psychological is not complete because it can never be. In its essence, it exists in a state of lack, of not enough, of insufficiency, of needing to add more.

And the one thing that the psychological self believes often will make me complete is the relationship with the partner, the ideal, the one. And that can keep you going, that search can keep you going for a long time for the one human being who is going to complete me. On the physical, that pull remains.

On the psychological, that longing for completeness is transcended, is gone beyond as you no longer identify with the mental image of me. As you step out of identification with the mind-made self, which is always incomplete and will project its incompleteness in many cases onto that one thing that says, if I only had a partner I would feel saved, totally myself, complete myself through him or through her. And if you should find a partner for a while, that may work.

And then you find you cannot complete yourself through any form whatsoever. So what leaves you through surrender to what is, and which in your case might mean, the feeling of great lack, the feeling of aloneness, the longing for him, you may not know who. And there's this great lack at the center of your being.

And what do you do with that? That feeling of loneliness? If you're not vigilant, it becomes mind movements.

It adds more to the story of the incomplete me who needs, and you can think about it, project, imagine, and that only strengthens that. But if you allow what you feel to be there, let's say it's called loneliness, feel it, don't resist it, that you may not even label it anymore. Simply be attentive, look at it, no analysis, just bringing presence to it, that feeling that you never wanted, that you want to get away from, that otherwise would continuously turn into thinking.

Now you're saying, there it is, and it has a certain feeling quality to it, and you can give it so much attention that you're not even labeling it anymore as loneliness. Your attention that you give that feeling is just complete, and your acceptance of that feeling is complete, because it is now, it is the form that this moment takes. So you surrender into that, say, all right, embrace it, and see if it kills you, it won't.

It's not going to kill you, it's not going to consume you, but it might consume the ego if you surrender into it. And then, suddenly, you will see it has turned into something else. I don't want to put any ideas into your head and say, this is what it's going to turn into.

You surrender into that, the longing becomes intense aliveness itself. The longing, if totally accepted, and that is even the longing for God, which says, I want God so much, on the other side of the longing, God is already hiding. It is already, it's a misinterpretation through the mind, which says, you don't have it, it's not here.

And the beloved is on the other side of the loneliness. You then go, you suddenly experience a sense of completeness, because you've surrendered totally into that feeling. And then, you've gone beyond the need, the psychological need for a relationship to complete you.

There may still be a physical need on the level of physical body, on the level of sexuality or emotion, that if you're a man wanting close to you, the female energy field, if you're a woman wanting the male energy field, this form may have that. But that is relatively minor, it's a very small movement. But deep down, there's already such completion and completeness, that that's a very minor surface movement of the form, doesn't make you unhappy anymore.

And then it is quite possible that you meet someone, because you don't need him anymore. And then it is more likely that the relationship may work quite well, because the need for this person to make you complete, which no human being could ever fulfill, it's an impossible task and an impossible demand. Every human being will fail, will not make you complete.

So the need and the demand that this human being should provide that completion for you isn't there anymore. And that is why it is likely that the relationship may work quite well, when the need, the psychological, deep seated psychological need is gone. Then, if it happens, you welcome the relationship.

If it doesn't happen, that's fine too, it's beautiful too. It's not everybody's destiny. And that's beautiful too, to be alone.

Solitude is beautiful. Loneliness is not. Solitude is to be alone and to be surrendered into that aloneness.

Solitude, beautiful, even sacred. Loneliness is to be alone and hated and not wanting this. When you surrender into aloneness, it becomes solitude.

And solitude even becomes more than that. It becomes a deep sense of connectedness with being itself, because you had really been looking for God through somebody else. And it's only through surrender that you can find God.

So this is your spiritual practice, to work with that. Not to find him, that's not your spiritual practice. These are the moments which keep me away from the now.

Because that sense of incompleteness and lack still tends to become mind movements. So it keeps you away from now. But it doesn't have to be like that.

The very feeling that you experience, let it bring you into the now. Give it attention. Embrace it.

No need to run away from it. You welcome loneliness and then it turns into something else. Beautiful.

We may have some more questions next time we meet. Maybe also one or two verbal questions, if people prefer that. Gradually questions accumulate.

I keep them all. I have a huge collection of questions. Enough for a few more books.

Each question is valuable. And I like the funny ones too. A few questions may be a little bit abstract, but if we have time we'll even get to those.

It's helpful to look upon this week here and realize that everything that happens during this week is part of the retreat and is helpful, even if it doesn't look like that on the surface. Include everything and realize that it's all part of the teaching. That includes the bus trip from hell.

It includes discomforts, strange food that you are not used to, bugs that you may encounter here or there, or other animals. And your physical body. Some of you are experiencing limitations of that here.

And whatever condition arises inside or outside, it's part of your practice. One can live like that. At the moment I'm just saying make it part of your retreat here, where nothing is denied or resisted, including physical weakness, physical pain, or physical discomfort.

Just relax into that. Only the condition of this moment. Otherwise, you may go home frustrated and say, I went to this retreat expecting to encounter spiritual liberation, the limitless, the transcendent and eternal, and all I encountered was sickness, strange food, bus trips from hell, bugs.

That wasn't supposed to happen. Of course, you also encountered other things, but it's easy for the mind to focus only on that. In other words, limitations all around.

And when you get home, you encounter the normal limitations of everyday life again. So here we, there's no, it would be pointless to try and eliminate the limitations. We looked at it before.

Use the limitations as the doorway. It's easy to forget there's a little spider on its journey somewhere. So every limitation becomes a doorway when you don't turn away from it, criticize it, blame it, judge it, good, bad, usually bad.

So whatever it is, I put it like that in the book. Whatever this moment presents to you, accept it as if you had chosen it. That is a totally new way of living and totally contrary to the old conditioned consciousness.

Accept this moment, no matter what it brings, as if you had chosen it. I'm not saying that you did choose it. Maybe you did.

If I say you chose it, that would require belief on your part. You can believe it or not believe it. And some of you would say, I definitely did not choose this.

I know that for sure. So although in some New Age teachings you hear, whenever you come to a person who has read these books and been to workshops, and you come and say, this is what's happening to me, or that's happening to me, they will ask, why did you manifest that? And then you already begin to feel a little bit guilty.

I must have made some mistake somewhere. I manifested this. Not good enough yet.

So I don't say you chose it. It's enough to say, as if. Accept as if you had chosen it.

And immediately the limitation becomes a doorway into peace. That's the miracle. No matter what condition you surrender to, accept fully, that very condition takes you into deep peace.

But if the condition is on the surface, appears on the surface, totally unacceptable, then the surrender would have to be correspondingly deep. The depth of surrender reflects the condition. So a little condition may be a discomfort in your stomach.

In larger conditions you're confined to bed, can't come to the talks anymore, you're missing out on the whole thing. And yet, here the surrender would have to be a little deeper. And then you can encounter conditions that seem dreadful on the surface.

Nobody could accept that. An illness that immobilizes you forever, perhaps, as defies what the doctors say. Death of loved ones all around you.

Loss of everything. Prison. And then the surrender, the yes to this moment, will be very deep.

And so the peace that then comes, if you find that deep yes in the face of seemingly unacceptable conditions, and to some people the threshold of unacceptable isn't very high. They very quickly reach the unacceptable. Some of you may have a few times during this week reached the threshold of the unacceptable, and yet it wasn't that much, but the reaction was as if it were huge.

Perhaps it was huge if you had used to an extremely comfortable existence. And this is why it has happened. Certain people who were faced with the unacceptable, even when they'd never heard any spiritual teaching before, they entered the surrendered state of consciousness, and the yes arose in the face of the unacceptable.

And the yes had to be so deep that that peace, all the reactive structures of the egoic self collapsed in that one deep yes. And the peace then never left them. They dwelled in that eternal peace.

Those were the first, thousands of years ago, the first spiritual teachers that arose. They didn't have teachers because they must have started somewhere. The first spiritual teachers that arose were those people who were faced with the unacceptable, great suffering, and then a deep yes.

The depth of that yes reflected the depth of the suffering and of the limitations that they encountered. And that was the shift. And then they, after a while, people came and said, there's something strange about you.

I don't know what it is. I feel drawn. What is it that you have something that I don't have?

I want that. And they said, well, I don't know. And then gradually some teaching started coming out of their mouth, a few pointers gradually.

And later on, perhaps they had an insight into what had happened to them. And then the teaching says, you don't need to go to the depths of despair, to an extreme form of limitation or suffering. Surrender can happen as a voluntary yes.

You don't have to be pushed into it by life, although eventually life would push you into it. Time. All that spiritual teachings do is they save time, by the grace of God.

Otherwise it gets drawn out, goes on and on. All the old patterns playing themselves out again and renewing themselves, including the pain body. So if you bring in continuous little acts of surrender in the face of relatively small limitations, then gradually you enter the surrendered state.

With every yes, there's a deepening. With every yes, there's a weakening of the egoic mind structures. So everything is included, whatever arises now is part of this retreat.

No, give me something else to surrender to. This one, no, I don't want. I need a more secure life situation so that I can start my surrender practice.

And the mind saying, and this is also a subtle thing, I need to understand more before I can surrender. Please explain more about surrender. I haven't accumulated enough knowledge about it.

Okay, just one more question now about surrender. Oh, well, the answer comes, hmm. But then on the other hand, what about, ah, hmm.

Of course there's no end. Now surrender is the doorway into presence. May I also suggest not only that you work with whatever happens, apply the yes.

Remember the beautiful statement by the Roman Emperor Marcus Aurelius that I quote in the book. Marcus Aurelius was this very strange case of a wise man who had also worldly power. It's very rare that these two go together, extremely rare.

So he said in his beautiful little book that is now called Meditations, written 2,000 years ago, accept all that comes to you woven in the pattern of your destiny for what could more aptly fit your needs. Whatever comes to you is woven in the pattern of your destiny with the pattern of the totality of the cosmos. It appears as the form that this moment takes.

What could be better? What could more aptly fit your needs than that which comes to you woven in this pattern of the totality which appears as now? And so whatever it is here, and if you cannot come to a talk, that will be greater for you than the talk if you surrender into that condition.

But then you can observe the complainer. I'm missing out. Here I am, spend all this money on this long trip, and here I'm in bed.

It's not even comfortable. And the self-talk continues. It's even happened last year we had a retreat in Costa Rica, and one person who had come from the other side of the planet to come to this retreat, halfway between where he lives and where Costa Rica is, he got arrested.

And they put him in prison for two months. Later all the charges were waived, but he didn't know that then. That was his retreat.

And it was better than the retreat in Costa Rica would have been. Far greater deepening happened. First, much more suffering than could ever have been generated even by the most uncomfortable retreat.

And then in the face of the suffering, surrender happened. And then he realized later, not immediately, that that was the best that could ever have happened to him. So that's this enormous power that is released through welcoming now.

And then it becomes uncompromising. An uncompromising welcoming. It has both a feminine and masculine aspect to it, that welcoming.

The feminine aspect of welcoming whatever arises is what you sometimes see in statues of the Virgin Mary, Quan Yin perhaps also, the arms like that, which is the feminine principle of embracing all. So that is one aspect of welcoming what is, is you have to become the one that embraces all. You realize yourself as the field that allows this to be the space.

And then welcoming also has a fierce, another one could say more masculine aspect, which is like that. It has a certain fierceness to it also. It is uncompromising, the yes to what is.

The two combined, it seems impossible, but they merge into one. And with that you meet whatever arises in your life. With that gentle fierceness, you meet and face whatever arises in your life.

And of course it can only arise now. That's all there ever is. Whatever arises in this field, with that gentle fierceness, is embraced, received, met.

And then enormous transformation happens. First the entire state of consciousness shifts from resistance, ego, to complete openness, where the self, the one self, not the limited little mind-made self. That one consciousness then becomes free-flowing, so to speak.

And it acts for you, speaks for you. Life unfolds. Life suddenly seems to carry you, where before you struggled against it, now you're floating.

It comes always as a surprise to somebody who learns to swim, that at first it's a great struggle to keep yourself above water. This is the egoic condition, so to speak. You're always struggling to keep your head above water.

When is it ever going to end? I can't take anymore. And then suddenly you realize that the water is actually quite friendly.

It can carry you, and you can just breathe in, lie on your back, and you float. Just a few movements, and you become one with the water. You're no longer struggling against the water.

The water becomes friendly. And this is how life can become, when the shift happens from the resistant state to the surrendered state, suddenly the universe is no longer experienced as hostile. In the egoic state, mostly, the universe is a place to be feared, and a place that you also hope someday is going to deliver to you what you need.

Of course it won't. So it's the uncompromising, yes. And so you don't need to be worried about thoughts, how do I get rid of mental noise, there's so much going on in my head.

The uncompromising, yes, does it. Mental noise subsides. It has a certain momentum for a little while, it's still there, and then less.

And the noise that's still there is no longer a problem. Just a little bit of mental noise occasionally, okay. But watch the deep-seated pattern of the mental noise, the deep-seated pattern associated with the egoic mind structures.

They have enormous momentum behind them. Patterns of resistance. Watch particularly the two very important ones, and you will notice them very easily, as now that there's so much presence in you, you can notice how your mind operates unconsciously.

Two very important aspects of the pattern, the resistance, the continuous resistance patterns of the egoic mind. And this is what usually creates so much suffering in relationships, so much friction and conflict, continuous source of conflict in relationships. Two of the main, two main aspects of the resistance pattern is identification with mental positions and defensiveness.

And you can watch that as you interact with people, how the arguments in your relationship, how many of them are to do with unconscious identification with positions of the mind that you identify with. Maybe opinions, viewpoints, beliefs, ideas, perspectives, and this identification with this mind position as me. And then your partner has another position that conflicts with yours and identifies with that.

Both totally have their sense of self in their mental position. So the two things in relationships that usually bring about conflict in relationships is identification with the pain body and identification with mental positions. And often the two go together.

The mental positions can become amplified by the pain body. Hell, it's called. So watch it even in a simple discussion, a simple conversation.

Before you know it, you've put forward some position or belief or opinion or idea, and then the other person says, no, no, that's not how it is. And then you're beginning to defend yourself. This is the beginning of unconsciousness.

It's nothing to do with you, but you believe it's you because you have identified with mind. And the moment you identify with a belief, an idea, any mental position, a perspective on something, now you have to defend, you have to fight for your very life. And it's unconscious.

And you can see it everywhere. So to know, especially as you interact with people, it's simply a position. It's a mental position.

There's no self in it. It's just a perspective. And then comes defensiveness.

It's totally automatic. Defensiveness comes in whenever your sense of self, which is mind-made, is threatened by something, something somebody says. You did that.

You didn't do that. You failed to do that. And you can see how automatically the self goes into protection and defense, and the enormous emotion that comes with that.

And you go, if you feel the body, you feel it's totally contracted. I never said that. I never did that.

You did. You are the one who's unconscious. What are you telling me?

All you need to do is watch it in yourself. If the unconscious movement still operates, how quickly and automatic the process of defensiveness is. So you're defending yourself, but an illusory self.

Part of that is the need to be right. Very closely associated with needing to keep your sense of self intact, because your sense of self is identified with a position of rightness. And so the spiritual practice is, on the one hand, to observe this as it arises, if you can, or you observe it just after it's happened, the whole episode is over.

And then you say, oh, there it was again. Okay. And then perhaps next time, in the middle of it, you can suddenly see it.

That you are trapped in defending an illusion, put beautifully in the Course in Miracles, which says, whenever you become defensive about anything, know that you have identified yourself with an illusion. Whenever you become defensive about anything, you have identified yourself with an illusion. And that means your sense of self has become associated with thought movements, which is the illusion.

And then a time comes, and I suggest it is now, it's not for everybody yet, but for you, it's now, when you can relinquish a position, or allow it to be there without a self in it. See, that's the position. And that's your position.

Oh, okay. When you can relinquish defensiveness and realize you're still alive, even if you don't defend yourself. You are still alive, even if you're not right.

And if you say, oh, yes, you're right. I was wrong. You are enormously liberating to suddenly say, oh, yes, that's how it is.

And then already a great freedom arises when you give up the automatic self-repair programs of the ego. And there's so much in this world that could damage the mind-made self. As you move through every day, you have to watch out continuously.

Even the slightest remark from somebody can damage the mind-made self. And even when you're driving along, the driver shouting something at you doesn't feel good. You idiot, where did you get your license?

The driver shouts something. And usually, and this is a very simple example of how one's self-image, mind-made, immediately jumps into repair, because that shouting, you idiot, has injured your mind-made sense of self. Because you fear, you don't want to, you're not an idiot, I'm not an idiot.

And so immediately the self-repair thing is you shout something back, even louder, perhaps. And on its own level, it works, because you feel a little bit better. The damage has been repaired.

You've shouted back, and it's been patched up. Okay. The self is intact again, and so you drive on.

And this is a little example. And how often do things like that happen, through criticism, somebody telling you this or that, you're not, and then you get, occasionally you get the opposite, you lap it up, you say you are so good, you're so great. The world may tell you that, for a little while, until it changes its mind.

But to observe the automatic self-repair mechanism that immediately comes into place, and that, of course, can even degenerate in very unconscious people, in other words, people who have a very much complete absence of a witnessing presence. That need to be right, in very unconscious people, and there are many on this planet still, can degenerate into physical violence. Physical violence, even between nations, is the need to be right, and the other to be wrong.

Or when you're driving, you can see it as a phenomenon, I don't know if it happens in India, probably not, but in the West, road rage, where it's not confined to a physical shouting match, they actually get out of their cars and start physical violence. But it's simply a continuation of the self-repair mechanism. And so the final triumph in a very, very unconscious person, and there are many, is you have killed the other person.

The self is now, the fiction, the illusion of self is now totally repaired, and then they put you in prison. But at least you've triumphed as the self. And at that moment, when you're engaged in automatic and unconscious self-repair, you would go to prison for the rest of your life just to triumph in that moment.

It's all worth it, says the self. But then, life is very generous. It then allows you 50 years of spiritual practice in the prison cell.

So when you're talking to people, watch that, whether there's identification with mental positions, defensiveness in yourself. And then the enormous freedom comes when you don't need to defend anymore. The otherwise unconscious need to defend your sense of self is relinquished.

And then, to go back to the simple example, somebody shouts, you idiot, when you are driving, and you just, you look, and you drive on. There's nothing to repair. And then he'll shout again because he thinks you're deaf.

And that's an enormous liberation because it's the liberation from thought. It's the liberation from ego. Or the need to be right.

Or just saying, I don't know. Some people can't say, I don't know. They must know.

So you can play with that. There's enough presence in you, you can play with it. You can watch those movements when they are still there.

And you can play with, hmm, relinquishing that. They just fall away. It comes with the arising presence.

And of course, that's the arising of spaciousness. You did that and that, but you have to... Oh, maybe they're right, maybe they're wrong.

But there's space. I did. And then you look into it.

Did I do that? And you say, no, I don't think I did that. That's how you see it.

But it's a misinterpretation because that's what... Or you say, you're right. I did that.

And you're free. All reactions, all reactivity in yourself is egoic. And all reaction is always some opposition.

Then you go from reaction to response. You respond out of presence to the situation. Jesus used extreme examples to teach this, which is the state of non-reactivity.

And he used the extreme example in his parable of turning the other cheek. Somebody hits you on the cheek. Now, the normal reactive pattern is to immediately hit that person back.

That's normal. Of course, it's a parable. It's used as a metaphor.

And so he says, when somebody hits you on the cheek, you offer the other cheek. It's a very extreme example of non-defensiveness and non-reaction. Not necessarily to be taken literally, or perhaps...

But it's a parable. Another beautiful parable, which I've told some of you know it, from Zen Buddhism. The Zen master, with a high reputation, who lived in a town in Japan, was accused by a 16-year-old girl, who was a monk, who was pregnant, of being the father.

So this girl was pregnant and told her parents that the Zen master, whom she had visited some months ago, was the father of her child. The child she was carrying. She told this to her parents.

The parents ran to the Zen master, accusing him of having seduced their daughter, of being a false teacher, of being a fraud. And he listened. He said, you fathered this child, she just told us.

And he listened, and they kept talking, and all he would say was, is that so? Yes, you are the father of this child. Is that so?

Yes. And then the child was born, and the parents didn't want the child, so they brought the baby to the Zen master and said, here's the baby, you look after him, we don't want it, it's your child. And the Zen master said, is that so?

And so the parents went back home, and the Zen master, nobody would come to see him anymore, because he lost his reputation. All he had to do was look after the baby. And he did that, because it was there.

And he welcomed the form that this moment took. He didn't live through a mind-made self, so a lost reputation didn't become a mental story in his head that he derived his continued sense of identity from. The only fact was, here's the baby.

Nobody's coming to see me anymore. There's nobody here, and that's fine. Nobody is not a problem.

There's no mind-derived identity which says, all that I've built up, my reputation is gone, my life is in ruins, what did they do to me? They did that to me. Nobody did anything.

He just non-reacted, welcomed this moment. A year later, the daughter became more mature and confessed to her parents that the Zen master was not the father, but to the boy next door. So the parents ran back to the Zen master and said, can you please forgive us?

We just realized that you're not the father. And the Zen master said, is that so? And then they said, yes, and we'll have the baby back now, please.

And he said, oh, is that so? All right, here's the baby. Nothing happened.

It's an extreme example of a life lived in the state of non-reactivity and the complete absence of drama, which is egoic, in such a life. The others may be playing their drama, but in the surrendered consciousness, there is no drama. It cannot arise.

And this is the amazing thing. His life remained clear, simple, totally unproblematic, because his sense of self was not derived from mind-created identifications and stories. His sense of self was derived from presence, the presence of now, the spaciousness of now, the field of now, the unconditioned consciousness.

What problem could there be in that? So, through non-reactivity, one could say, to use an old expression, the buck stops here. Otherwise, and this is the end of karma, when there's non-reactivity, karma immediately evaporates.

It's only through reactivity, because karma is action, reaction, action, reaction. Through non-reactivity, which is surrender, karma dissolves. It may come at you, human karma.

And this is the only way karma can dissolve. It doesn't dissolve through more and more time. It renews itself through time.

It's only through the timeless that it becomes dissolved. So, that's the power of all the teachings. Show that, Jesus in Buddhism, the enormous power that comes with non-reactivity, which is surrender.

The end of all drama in your life. How could there be? All right, that's how it is.

It's just this. It remains clear, unencumbered by problems, the field of now. And it doesn't, don't let the little mind tell you that then you become a doormat.

I will become a doormat. I don't want to be a doormat. It's not that there is enormous strength and power in that non-reactive state.

Totally non-defensive, but enormous strength and power go through you. There is also a story about the Buddha traveling from town to town and village to village. And occasionally he encountered people who abused him because they had certain mental positions.

And they would shout at him. He would always, people would ask him, why doesn't this bother you that people are shouting at you and abusing you? And he said, there's nobody here to abuse.

They think they're abusing somebody, but there's nobody here. So it just passed through him. There was no mind-made entity where this abuse was received and held.

It passed through in the absence of a mind-made sense of self. Somebody shouting, you idiot. There's nobody there to hold on to that.

And it passes through. Idiot? Where?

Who? So nothing can prevail against the power of presence. Yes, don't underestimate the momentum that is there in the collective human mind and its patterns.

But it's nothing compared to the power of presence. Yes, don't underestimate the madness of the ego. But it is nothing compared to the power of presence.

The Course in Miracles says, the ego is insane and do not underestimate the extent of its insanity. And this is very true. It is very insane.

Look at human history. Watch the news. I don't want to become more personal, but it's in everyone still, unless it's already dissolved.

But they are operating less in you now. These structures, those structures are becoming more, less solid. Beginning to, as presence arises, they begin to fade.

They still operate, but with less momentum. The same old patterns you will often observe have their momentum and they still arise in your life, but as the witness is there more and more, the witnessing presence, these patterns have less force to them. So gradually they fade, become transmuted.

But just taste, all that is required is just get a taste of the surrendered state and see the beauty and power that lies in that. So people ask sometimes, how do I get rid of thousands and thousands of years of conditioning, of all the accumulations, all the collective conditioning that you carry inside. And it's so simple.

Surrender. Surrender. And as this transformation happens in you, people around you, you will find, are being affected by that.

And others will leave you, who are not yet ready. You are no longer interesting to them. You don't participate in the drama anymore.

They can't use you anymore. What's the point? They leave you.

He's not playing anymore. If you have a partner, then as the shift happens in you, the shift in consciousness, it will frustrate, if it's not yet happened in your partner, it will frustrate those patterns, the conditioned mind patterns, including the pain body in your partner, that need your cooperation to keep themselves going. The reactivity needs something to react against.

The pain body needs another pain body to feed on. It needs your reactions. So in the absence of that, there's frustration.

And then there could be a shift in your partner. It's happened, it's enough for one partner to enter the surrendered state. And then there's disorientation in the other partner for a while.

And then either the openness is there and the shift will happen, or you will separate. But it will be loving. You would separate in love.

And it's sometimes the most unlikely people that are suddenly open. And all it requires is to come into your presence. You might say a word or two, and their lives from then on, that's the trigger, that awakens that which was already underneath all the mind structures.

As somebody wrote to me, whom I met a long time ago at university, he said, I wish I had never met you. My life would be simple, I would be conventional and normal. Of course, he doesn't know that it's not true.

He would be very unhappy, like everybody else. One more thing about physical conditions, because some of you, I'm told, are having certain physical limitations here.

Limitations of the physical body.

For some people, have been their only teacher. And some needed no other teacher, but some continuous pain or continuous disability in the body. And it drove them to the point of surrender.

The very same condition in other people drove them into more and more egoic contraction and misery and unhappiness. So you can see, and I have, you can see one person in a wheelchair, who is filled with anger, resentment and bitterness. And you can see another person in a wheelchair, and I have met people.

And there is a light shining through their eyes and complete openness and no unhappiness and no misery. And even occasionally you might encounter people in India where many people who in the west would be shut away, they are actually visible in the street. So people who may have only one limb or lost several limbs.

And occasionally you find that complete, there is peace in them. It happens. And they smile at you.

So the physical limitation then drove them into the state of surrender. If you surrender, otherwise it will drive you into more contraction. I met my brother again after three years, my half-brother, at Christmas.

And he is now only 32 or 33 years old. And I had observed, I would see him occasionally, how his ego was growing and growing and becoming more and more rigid over the years during his twenties. The roles, complete identification with the roles he was playing, with mental positions and rigidity setting in.

And well, that's how the ego grows. And then he encountered a serious illness in his late twenties. And he had a very major operation.

And then as a result of that operation, he would, for even now, almost every night he wakes up in acute pain, abdominal pain. And so his sleep is interrupted almost every night by acute pain for one, two, three hours. And that is almost, to some people that would be called unacceptable.

Never getting enough sleep, always this pain. And then I met him after three years at Christmas, and I could see his ego had diminished greatly. And there was enormous sweetness, openness, softness, gentleness coming through.

And only then he told me, I said, I said, wonderful. I didn't say it, I thought, this is beautiful. The rigidity is gone, there is a light coming through him now.

Which means the conditioned somehow is no longer totally dominating him. And the unconditioned is filtering now through the conditioned. Somehow it must have happened.

And then he told me that every night he wakes up in pain. And then I realized that was his teacher, and that still is his teacher. It is that that drove him into surrender.

And the moment surrender happened, all the conditioned structures begin to weaken. Now the beauty of this is, you don't have to be pushed into surrender now by life. It's the voluntary embracing of surrender.

That's the beauty of the spiritual teaching. You can choose the yes voluntarily. You choose the kingdom of heaven.

You don't have to be dragged into it, kicking and screaming, no, no, I don't want this. Perhaps you were pushed up to this point. Through some suffering or some condition pushed you here.

And from now on, it's a voluntary embracing of what is now, that's all. And that is an acceleration of the emergence of presence. You don't need more suffering.

Because this could be misunderstood, because I've been talking about the beauty of suffering. That it can become a teacher and push you into surrender. Suffering, the very thing that's generated by non-surrender, eventually brings about the transformation of consciousness.

You see how it's all connected? Even the suffering that is generated through ego, its very purpose is the transformation of consciousness. Even that is one with the liberation.

But I'm not saying that you need more suffering now. You don't need any more suffering now. Suffering has been your teacher until now or recently.

And now, that doesn't need to be your teacher anymore. Your teacher is whatever form this moment takes. And it's easy.

It's always easy. This moment is always easy. When you bring the yes to it.

Remember the Zen master. Whatever comes into now, he goes, Oh, so that's it? Oh, alright.

That's it? Is that what it is? Okay.

Oh.

Oh. And this is the goodness of now. So deep that it has no opposite.

Good and bad on the surface of things. The future cannot hold a greater good than now. And then you can renounce the future easily.

For practical matters it still works. That's okay. But you renounce it as a psychological need.

And that's a very easy renunciation when you realize the depth and goodness of now. And so you renounce the future before the future is taken away from you. That will happen anyway.

Satsang with Mooji Video extract from the Satsang DVD Satsang with Mooji God is love. God is... Gathe Gathe Paramate Parasamoriswa Gathe Gathe Param Parasam Oriswa Somebody just told me that some people bought a little photo of this form.

[Speaker 1] (3:11:26 - 3:49:05)

And if you did, it needs to be used with great care and rightly. It's not to be used as the photo of somebody. It only works if, when looking at it, you sense a deeper connectedness and presence with yourself.

So you need to know that you are looking at yourself. The light that shines through the form is yourself. The form is completely unimportant.

And you recognize it when, as you contemplate the photo, peace arises within. And then it's good to close your eyes or remove the photo. So you don't get attached to the form, because it's a reflection of yourself.

And somehow, when the unconditioned comes through a form, even on a photo, you can see it. It's still there, for some reason. It took me a while before I said yes to that, that people could have a photo, because it can so easily be misleading, can be misunderstood.

So that is always the case with a teacher. You are drawn to a teacher and the power of the teaching, which is the emanation, which is more important than the words. And you recognize that.

That in you that recognizes it is the same as that which is recognized. Presence, whatever you want to call it. If it were not in you, you wouldn't recognize it.

So that there's no attachment to the form. The form serves its purpose when it takes you to the formless, because the formless shines through the form. And then the form has served its purpose.

And that's the case also with your body, the person. It doesn't necessarily mean that your life comes to an end as this form, when the formless shines through. But the fulfillment is already there.

Then the fulfillment that is already there can manifest further in this world of form. There are two or three questions here that ask, is that really all entering the now and then nothing else happens after that? Is there no further advancement or progression?

Is there no further development? Is that the end of all spiritual practice? Is that the end of ever having a spiritual teacher?

Well, most likely, yes, it is the end of having a spiritual teacher. Because you're connected with the one teacher, you are that, the self. But it doesn't mean on the level of form, the formless cannot express itself and even flow into the forms that then you create or are being created through you.

And that evolves through time because the world of form is connected with time. So it took years for this teaching to evolve out of the initial realization, many years. The initial realization and the state of peace, that's the same state 25 years ago already.

It was there, the state of peace, but nothing had manifested. There was no teaching that hadn't manifested out of that. That took time.

And during those 25 years, there were periods of time when I also sat there and said, is that all that I'm meant to do in this world? There's deep peace, occasionally a person comes to see me, occasionally in little groups, once a month, twice a month. And that was good, but is that all?

So for years I was sitting there in seclusion, relative isolation, which I had chosen to live in the country. That would have been fine too, but the totality had other plans. And one morning I woke up with a realization.

And the realization was I need to move to the west coast of North America. Didn't know why. And so I moved.

And then later, much later, I realized that I needed to be in that energy field for the book and the teaching to come out of me. And then it unfolded from there. So it's not that everything stops on the phenomenal plane.

One could say it all begins. Your true life begins when the illusion of the self dissolves. The mind made little me self.

Then the true life begins. And then it unfolds from within. It's not so much me living my life, but life living me, through me, through this form.

And the goal of spiritual practice is not the now. The now is the portal. The goal of spiritual practice is the end of the false self.

The fading away of the egoic structures. And that is the flowering. And then it flowers and flowers and flowers.

So the fading away of the false self, the dissolving of the false self, I talked about it this morning. Just to encapsulate what I said this morning could be encapsulated by saying that what you can practice as you go through life and even here is not to resist the diminishment of your sense of self in whatever form it comes. Whether somebody insults you or somebody disagrees with you and doubts that your position is the right one.

Whatever it may be. Any time when your sense of self feels injured and normally the automatic repair mechanism would come into operation. To be so aware that you simply step back and not resist it.

That is contained in many teachings. The diminishment of self is not resisted. And then the need to be right is relinquished, for example, in an argument.

You're quite happy not to be right. And then immediately you can sense peace comes up. You haven't died, only the false has now given way.

There's an opening and you can sense immediately an influx of peace. So it's the opposite of death. But I wouldn't tell that to a child.

But it is the destiny of humans to have to go through the growth of self and then go beyond that. To go through. So a child needs to go through the stage, and it takes years, where the child begins by saying, my daddy has a bigger car than yours.

And, or, this is mine. My toy is nicer than yours. Look at me, I can do it.

Look, me, look, me. So it would be futile to say to a child, don't say that. Forget about me.

You mustn't talk about yourself. It won't work. So that the child wants attention.

That stage is there. And at other times doesn't want attention. But that's already, there's a self-image arising.

Self-consciousness. And gradually the mind's companion begins to walk next to him. The child begins to have a relationship with itself.

He's maturing. She's maturing, becoming an adult. And then the suffering begins.

Because you're trapped now in that. Your sense of self is trapped in that. And then through the suffering, you go beyond.

So it seems that humans so far, at least now, they need to go through that stage. The self-ego structures and then the suffering. But perhaps now humans can go through this more quickly.

So perhaps that the egoic structures can dissolve at a much earlier age. It sometimes happens that self-realization or the unconditioned emerges. There's another question concerning that here.

I may come to it or we talk about it anyway. It can sometimes happen that the unconditioned emerges through a form that is not yet, where the structures of the self are not yet fully there. Like a very young person.

And then sometimes that works also. There's no general rule which says you always need to go through this. In the case of Ramana Maharshi, he was extremely young, hardly developed a self.

There was a self and that died, but not a very strongly established one. And he was only 16 or whatever it was, 15 maybe. But it can happen also that the unconditioned emerges and the form through which it emerges doesn't know what to do with it.

It becomes totally dysfunctional. Even to the point of appearing mad. And so there are people in India that have been called, when they wander around, I suppose naked, and they look a bit mad, and sometimes they are called God-intoxicated.

And it is possible that that has emerged but through a form that isn't ready for it, one could say. In the West they would be in a mental home. And here they are God-intoxicated and they are free, preferable.

Strange things are possible. It can also emerge before the egoic structures have dissolved. So they just give way but they are still there.

And then mistakes happen that you identify with the enormous power of presence and realization and say, that's me. The mind comes back in and claims some achievement. And this has happened even to teachers.

And you can see it, they claim, I am he, the one. None other but me. And the teacher then, and this is a very strong pull to the ego in the follower, the claim of a teacher that I am the avatar of all ages.

That is an enormous, what is being pulled, the ego responds to that very strongly because by being close to the, you grow in your sense of self also. So always references to specialness, to me as the one. And also be careful when a teacher makes you special.

And there is a question here about that. I seem to be answering the questions without looking at them. It says here, aren't you making people special by saying it's happening through you, this transformation of consciousness?

Isn't the ego going to come back in and it could happen? Yes. The ego can come back in and claim something.

An improved image of yourself. One of those who have been chosen to be here. Then that feels better than the previous image.

It replaces a more defective self-image. Very subtle, can come in. But I don't, it can, I don't see a lot of that happening here.

I'm not looking into everybody's eyes. Really what happens as you sit here, I'm never telling you that you are special. And this form is certainly is not special.

It's only because of that, that the teaching can happen. If this form thought of itself as special, there would be no true spiritual teaching. So, you've been sitting here during these days, feeling less and less special.

A diminished sense of self, mind-made self. The possibility that in one or two of you, the ego comes back through the back door, of course that's possible. But it's likely that you will notice it after a while.

A sense of knowing it all, of little superiority, of just ask me. And you can witness that if it happens. Whenever you witness ego operating in yourself, that's great.

You're witnessing it. And it operates in hundreds and hundreds of subtle ways. Simply each little one designed to add a little bit to your sense of identity.

And it operates even in the tiniest things like telling somebody what has happened. Do you know what's happened in the latest news? Do you know what he did?

And the other person says for a moment, no. And at that moment, you are superior. It's very subtle.

You feel a little bit bigger than the other person. And that is the great thing about gossip. Because the other person doesn't know yet.

But you know. And you are telling. It's a very subtle movement.

And when you can criticize somebody, again, a very subtle sense of... You are, of course, higher than the one who is being criticized. Or made fun of.

Or gossiped about. Of course the implication is that you are... And all that underlies ego.

Even to the absurd things like silly jokes that say what is green and climbs up the wall. And then the person you're talking to says, I don't know. Ah, now let me tell you.

I don't know. I can't tell you. So in hundreds of subtle ways, the ego tries to add something to itself.

And when you are vigilant and present, you can watch that. We all know things like name dropping and all. But this is just...

One could have a list. Maybe in the next book I'll make a list of ego strategies. Minor and major.

Even things like somebody has just died in your vicinity. And you get the news. And you say, oh, that's dreadful.

And if you look very deep inside, there's a little exhilaration. Very subtle. Which says, I am still alive.

I haven't died yet. I'm still alive. And you feel good for a moment because it wasn't you.

It's very interesting to watch. Any kind of complaint in your head or verbal, unless it's something you're telling a person, something to change, a person who can do something about a situation. You're saying, please don't put this there.

Put that there. That's not complaint. But complaint, just for the sake of complaint, which is part of everybody's normal egoic mind functioning, which goes on in people's self-talk, and verbally in many people also, in addition to the self-talk in the head, complaining about whatever is going on now.

A person, a place, a situation, a thing. Fault finding, looking for the one fault to complain about. And then focus on that, and then the ego gets strong in that.

There's a beautiful carpet, but you're looking for the tiniest stain there, and say, oh, look at that. I've told that before. I don't know if you've heard.

Last year I talked to my publisher, and he said he often gets letters, people writing in, about how books that they've published have changed their lives. So he got one letter, and he read it. This book really changed my life, and it was great.

And it went on and on, and on page two of the letter, and then he suddenly said, but then there was a serious spelling with typo, spelling error, misprint on page so-and-so, and that spoiled the whole pleasure of reading my book, that book. And really, if you show so little respect for the books you published, you shouldn't be in the business of publishing books. And you can see how the ego, how good it felt to the ego.

Whatever is bad to you feels good to the ego. How good it felt to the ego to be writing this, and how it got stronger and stronger, the self, in criticizing that. Now I know who I am.

So subtle. And obvious at other times. So I've already answered a few questions.

They just came in. Here's a big one. Your words are like my own heart talking to itself.

Yes, there is this thread of eternity that is always present. This substratum of being out of which all states arise, waking, sleeping, and dreaming, in India this is called Turiya, Turiya, the fourth. In your experience, how and why does Turiya arise out of the absolute unmanifest?

So that question refers to the arising of, because I use different signposts from those, although of course it's all the same, the arising of the state of presence out of the unmanifested, which is connected with the whole reason why we are here and the universe is here. So this question is so big, what it's really asking is about the whole purpose of the universe. Why and how?

Now language consists of five vowels, a, e, i, o, u, these are sounds, plus the other ones, what are they called? I can't remember, consonants, and they are produced not through vocal chords, but through his air being under pressure and being let out of, now a combination of these five sounds produced by vocal chords, a, i, e, o, u, plus a few hissing sounds, how could I explain through that the entire purpose of the universe? One could give little stories to very distant approximations of it, or you could have a philosophical system and think now you know it, but it would only be a combination of those sounds, vowels and diphthongs, in a certain sequence, hoping to capture the vastness of that in those little sounds.

This is, you cannot understand through the mind the vastness of that, you can only be part of it as you are, knowing it directly, but not knowing it as a subject knows an object, it is impossible to know it through the mind in that way. How does it happen and why does it happen? One can give distant approximations, the world of the unmanifested God-Spirit moving into matter, the whole universe becoming transformed into Spirit, perhaps that's a distant approximation, but that would reduce it to something, a fragment, that's not it either.

It's the illusion of knowledge that arises the moment you speak and formulate words and concepts, and they are helpful as pointers, but so the vastness you cannot understand, you can't understand presence, I've said it before, don't try to understand, you can understand a little bit about it through the mind, through formulating concepts, and I'd never talk about presence for you to understand what presence is, but simply using words to point to the state of presence, and then as presence arises, you know what presence is, but can you talk about it? It's very difficult, and whatever you say about it is limited and reduced.

So very wisely the Tao Te Ching says the Tao that can be named or spoken of is not the true Tao, and the rest is simply little pointers. In that one statement he has said that nothing that I say is the truth in itself, it only points, so it cannot really be spoken of, but self-realization is not that means, doesn't mean you know more about yourself, or know more about anything, it's being one with that, and understand it through being one with it, but then there may not be much that you can say about it, there is a knowing in that, but it goes beyond words, there is a deep knowing, but it cannot filter through the mind, it's totally inadequate for that. So one could say you cannot know yourself at the deepest level, you can only be yourself. In being it, you know it, but not as a subject knows an object, and with that comes also there's a humility, and part of this is, you may remember, and it's vital, entering the state of not knowing.

In which a deeper knowing resides, but it is the state of not knowing. I'm always happy when people come to me and say, I don't know who I am anymore. Oh, that's great, because for a long time they thought they knew exactly who they were, they were not quite happy with it, but they knew who they were, and now they don't, and now the only step to take is to become comfortable with that, not knowing, and not feeling I should know, and of course with that comes a deep humility also, not I know, I don't know, when you say I don't know, you disappear, and the strange thing is that all these words come out of the not knowing state, and remember that is the state that you are in when you walk along here, and watch sense perceptions, listen, see all the different sense perceptions, and you don't interpret, you relinquish interpretation, and yet you know what you're looking at, and yet you don't know what you're looking at, it is not, no labels arise anymore, or if they do, they are recognized as mere labels, and then they subside, and there's again a space of not knowing.

All a label is, is the illusion of knowing. Please.

It's very nice to see you, I heard about you many years ago, about six years ago, and it's very nice to be in your presence, and you are this. A number of years ago in Bihar there was a prince, 2,546 years ago, and in his awakening he knew how the whole of manifestation arose, and he said, Mara, I have seen how you build this house of samsara, I have broken your rich pole, never will you build this house again. In the words of the great sage Ramana Maharishi, he said, there is a final truth, nothing has ever existed, nothing does exist, nothing will ever exist, this is the ultimate finality.

In awakening there is an inherent wisdom that is beyond mind, as you say, there is a knowingness that is beingness, that is beyond doubt, beyond any deceit. All these great masters say the same thing, this is all illusion, it does not exist now, and it never did exist, and it will never exist. Is this your experience?

Yes, I'm not telling you that in those words, because they only become true for you as you realize that for yourself. If I told you that, half of you would go home. I only tell you what works as a pointer into that state.

Certain realizations come out of that state by themselves that are deeply true, but do not work as pointers into that state so well. So some sages have uttered those words, and for a few isolated individuals they may work as pointers, and perhaps they were talking to certain people when they realized they could see the truth of those words, so they worked as pointers. But for most, in the teaching that comes through this form, certain pointers are used, and others are not used.

There may be very deep truths that you will realize only through that inner knowing, and then it becomes true for you. So, yes, this is the truth, but I've never said it like that. And I may not say it again unless you ask me directly, in which case I would say yes.

Yes, that's right. Now, it may well be that one day I may find myself with one person, and those words will come out of my mouth, because there's never any prior intention before a word comes out of my mouth. And then that will work as perhaps the final pointer for that being.

And those words suddenly will be true. Otherwise, if I said it, those words could easily be used by the mind and become a concept. And so, this is why the Buddha also said certain things and refrained from saying other things, because he realized how easily words are grasped by the mind and made into conceptual knowledge.

So, that is the beauty of teachings. They come in slightly different forms, and some statements you may find in some teachings and not in others. Buddha, as we all know, didn't speak of God wisely, because that is the greatest concept that the mind can grasp at and add to itself and create images out of and identify with.

And of course, it's been misunderstood, because Western intellectuals started studying Buddhism, professors at universities, and immediately, because they only saw those pointers, and they completely misunderstood and said, this is an atheistic religion and it is totally nihilistic, it is life-denying, they said. So, they wrote PhDs about Buddhism. You could become a professor on Buddhism without knowing anything really about Buddhism.

That's how easily the mind can misinterpret. So, this is the truth. Whether in this form it will come out of my mouth again, I don't know.

How to deal with the unconscious of your own people, especially your own children? That is hard for many people to accept, that your children need to make mistakes, do what they do, create suffering for themselves. And you can watch it, how they're doing it.

In front of your eyes, they're creating suffering for themselves, making mistakes, as you call it. And then you want to save them from the suffering. You want to save them from making mistakes.

In other words, you want to stop them from evolving and learning. You want to stop them from suffering. And no human being can go through this life without, it's an essential part of being human and then going beyond.

And so to realize, if you had your way, you would create, if you were omnipotent, of course, you would create an ideal situation for your children, an ideal environment, everything right. They're good at school, they do well there, isn't that great? And they go on to university, and they're brilliant minds, and they meet this beautiful partner, and they have beautiful children, and a nice house, and everything is working so well, they're making no mistakes, they're not suffering.

What would the end result be? It would be a very superficial family, to say the least. That arises, they would be happy doing their shopping.

No suffering has ever crossed their path. They haven't made any mistakes. And yet, it's every human being's destiny to make mistakes, and there are no mistakes.

Only from a limited perspective, there are mistakes. You never made a mistake in your life. You're here.

Whatever you ever did, brought you here. Where you hear the message of liberation. So there are no mistakes, only if you adopt a particular perspective, then it's called a mistake.

It's limited, it's a fragment of the truth, it's a thought. So of course you would want to spare them their suffering, their self-inflicted suffering. And some suffer more deeply than others.

I've had parents come to me with extremely tragic stories of what their children did to themselves or others. Dreadful. To the point of saying, no human being, no parent could live with that.

And yet, they do. And there's the learning. And if your child creates suffering for others and ends up in prison, there's the learning.

So it's the acceptance of that, allow them to make mistakes, allow them to be unconscious, allow them to create their own suffering. But you can be there, not being drawn into it, making it, giving more fuel to that. Allow it.

Some children are addicted to drugs. It can be very hard for a parent to have a child. And great suffering can be there until finally, and you've tried it all, you've tried everything.

Many times, and it happened again and again. And finally, you surrender. And then great love is there, but you allow that movement of unconscious.

You've done everything on the external level. And then finally, you surrender and you allow them to be unconscious. You still help, but there's an inner allowing.

So if people close to you are creating great suffering for themselves, are in states of great resistance, inner resistance, it may be that they cannot surrender. Even the word surrender or acceptance, when you say that, they say, what? Are you mad?

You're insane, acceptance, they don't hear, it doesn't go in. And so, in those cases, you surrender for them, so to speak. It could also be to do with a parent.

It's not always children. Often it's the parents who are in great suffering. And so, what do you do?

Your mother, your father, you surrender for them. You don't demand anymore that they should be more conscious. You don't demand anymore that they shouldn't be doing what they're doing.

You don't demand anymore that they should understand you. You surrender. And then you visit them for Christmas or Thanksgiving.

And for the first time, it's not a source of great conflict having to be there for a whole day or two or three days. Oh my God, not another Christmas with the family. In the surrendered state, no demands are made.

Your father, your mother, they display whatever behavior they display and have been displaying for 50, 60, 70 years. Maybe they have the same conversations they had 50 years ago, 20 years ago. It's fine, it's the human mind, nothing personal.

And you're simply there as a surrendered entity. So, this is already the beginning of, to come back to your question, which I don't talk about usually. This is already the beginning of the end of the world.

Because when you identify with form, all the forms are extremely heavy. There's the heaviness, the solidity of the world of form. And as you surrender, the world of form loses its seeming solidity.

It's not solid at all, but it feels and looks very solid. And it loses, and I'm telling you that because that is already something that you can know for yourself. How all the structures lose their heaviness, including the human beings.

So there is a, the forms become less substantial. And that includes the form of my father, my mother, my child, which before was heavy in its egoic density. Very much there.

And then in surrender, something happens. It's not, it's lighter. And that's the beginning of the end of illusion.

That's as far as I'll go. So it's allowing, even people close to you, allow them to be who they are in their present. It's not who they are, but to manifest whatever they manifest.

And often the change will happen then, suddenly. How did that happen? I didn't demand anymore that he or she should understand me.

And suddenly, at Christmas dinner, he asked me, So tell me a little bit about these strange retreats that you go to. And he always said before that, Why are you involved in these weird cults? You should go into business for yourself.

Do something real. Do something with your life. He's been repeating that for 20 years.

And you felt angry about that. Why doesn't he or she, he understands nothing about me. And then surrender happened.

And suddenly, oh. Or not.

[Speaker 2] (4:05:20 - 4:05:21)

Doesn't matter.

[Speaker 1] (4:05:35 - 4:36:31)

I have given up many addictions in my life, and the last addiction, it seems, is the addiction to food. Last night, I sat with the craving I felt, the energy in my body, without attaching a story to it. What happened was I experienced an incredible amount of fear as I glimpsed the power of being free.

Please talk more about this. Yes. Yes, fear can arise.

And that is the egoic fear. It fears its own death. And it's not real.

And what do you do with fear? As you enter the surrendered state, you may encounter the region of fear. Because the ego fears surrender, because it knows it to be its own end.

So as you surrender to a certain condition, inner or outer, and then suddenly, there's a pulling back. Don't go there. Don't go there.

And then you do surrender again. And then you don't allow the fear to push you out, but you can then allow the fear also to be. And it won't kill you.

And so that also. So then you've dropped into that. And when you accept it completely, the very fear turns into aliveness.

And you drop down. So whatever arises, there's that. There are many addictions, yes.

It's an external manifestation of the mind needing to add something to me. Now it does it on a psychological level a lot, but that's not enough for the mind. It will use the body to add to the incomplete sense of self.

That's the unconscious impulse behind addiction. And you can see addiction operates in the tiniest things that are not recognized as addiction. You can't stop eating the potato chips.

And if you watch the movement, they don't do much. And it goes. It's an adding.

Not a lot of nutritional value, or it could be other kinds of junk food. Smoking. So food is a big one for many people.

You don't only reincarnate into thought streams. You can reincarnate into food. And for a moment it seems to work.

You feel a little bit more complete after eating a box of chocolates. I spoke to one person who has a big problem with weight. And he said the mind, he began to observe his own mind.

And it always, he came up with one thought that always, the main thought that would justify his going to the fridge and eating, was, you've had a rough time, you deserve a break. And of course every day he was having a rough time. And then he observed that mind movement.

And next time it came, he allowed that mind movement to be there and he just sat there with it. Without moving to the fridge. Because he recognized that.

Kindly throw light on the following two points. One. Why one form loves the other form, even when the other form does not love the first form.

I know what you mean. We know what you mean. Why is love not reciprocated?

Why does one way love traffic situation arise? I'm placing my aching heart before you. Please operate.

Operate. Thank you, thank you. All right, I will begin the operation.

Now, one form loves and the other form doesn't reciprocate. Why is that? And the pain that comes with that, great pain for many people, it's enormous pain.

Now, you know that the basic condition of the self or the egoic self is one of a very deep-seated sense of lack, of not enough, of not complete. And then it tries to fill through strategies. The mind-made self tries to fill that lack that it knows and feels almost continuously except for brief moments when something has been put in there.

And then for a moment the lack is not felt. It never lasts long. So it looks for the next thing and it looks to the future, it looks to add to me to fill that hole that is always there where I'm not myself, I'm not complete, I'm not home, I haven't arrived.

And so all kinds of strategies are there. And one of the main areas where it looks to fulfill that lack is in the area of relationship, the other person, he or she. And then when that happens, the entire focus of the self becomes focused on one other person who is perceived unconsciously as the one who is going to complete me, make me whole.

He or she is the one. And so almost an obsessive attachment forms to that image, that form of that person. And that is called falling in love.

And sometimes if you're lucky, the other person feels the same about you, that you are going to complete him or her also. And of course that is great. You both feel that you are going to complete each other.

And then probably you will want to get married, sign a contract, just to make sure that for the rest of your life you are going to complete me and you are not going to leave me. Because that would have dire consequences if you broke that contract and left me. Don't you even think about that.

And then you marry, this is where the films end, the director says cut here, but life goes on. And you marry and after, perhaps even during the honeymoon, the first doubt comes into your mind whether this actually works. Whether the other is going to live up to that enormous task of fulfilling and completing you.

And then you start an ordinary existence, jobs, family, and gradually it doesn't seem to be working anymore. The completion, the sense of lack comes back. He or she isn't behaving in the way that he or she should to make me feel complete, make me happy.

You read it in ads, I don't know if you read it in India, looking for man or woman to make me happy. Oh, wow. Who could live up to that?

And nobody can. And then the lack that was covered up by the temporary delusion that this person was fulfilling you, this person who has a pain body, but you didn't know that, the temporary delusion that this person should be fulfilling you, that suddenly the sense of incompleteness, aloneness, fear, not being as re-emerges. But now through your mind you attach that to the other person and say he or she is the cause for what I feel.

You're feeling again the basic egoic condition. You're feeling it more strongly now because for a little while it was covered up by the love relationship. And so gradually the love then periodically turns into hate.

And every time the person is not fulfilling his obligations or her, the love turns into aggression, hostility. Withdrawal, complete withdrawal. What's wrong with you?

Or throwing something, whatever they do. And then the relationship fluctuates. For a while it works again, and then it doesn't work.

It works again, it doesn't work. And then it becomes, the periods when it doesn't work become longer. And you feel, it feels bad.

The happiness of marriage turns into the unhappiness of just co-existence. The happiness of the honeymoon becomes the divorce. And they're all one really.

So it was an attempt to fulfill you through some form, some outer form. And then all that happens in the end, you sense the unfulfillment more strongly. And then you blame that form for causing you that pain.

It's egoic pain. This is the pain that arises out of love-hate relationships. Now, the questioner, of course, is not at that stage, because it is one-way traffic, as he puts it.

That great love is felt for this form, but it's not reciprocated. What do you do then? Then you feel that lack even more strongly.

And it's painful. And there's a tendency for the mind to weave all kinds of fantasies around it, all kinds of stories. And the self gets in there and becomes a very painful self-image of me.

And it can then, if it goes on, it can happen that that attraction turns into hate. It can happen. I'm not saying it will happen in your case.

And then you see it never was love in the first place. So what is called love is the deep-seated need of the ego. It focuses on one form.

So your opportunity now is to feel what you feel as much as possible. Get out of the mind weaving stories about it, fantasies, images. Be more interested in that unpleasant, painful feeling.

And here is where you surrender. What you're really feeling is the egoic state, the egoic condition. And then the image will come up occasionally of that person.

But focus on the feeling. Surrender into that. Accept that suffering.

And any suffering that you accept in that way will work for you. It transmutes ego. Any suffering that is accepted completely transmutes ego, resolves ego, and also transmutes the suffering itself.

So it's an opportunity. If not now, you would have to practice it. If your love were reciprocated, you would have to practice in a couple of years.

You would have a year or two of illusion. That's nice. Second question.

This form realizes that some actions are wrong. Still the form does these actions knowing that they are not right. Why?

That's the movement of human unconsciousness. Conditioned, egoic mind structures operate. And they have such momentum that they still operate.

The question is, is there a witnessing presence as they operate and those actions are being performed? Or does the witnessing presence come in after the action has been performed? And initially, as presence arises, it will come in after it's happened.

You've gone through an unconscious movement. You've said something to someone. You have done something and it was totally egoic, totally conditioned.

Perhaps done it many times before. And millions of other human beings are doing or saying the same thing that you are at this very moment on the planet. Performing the same action that you are performing because it's basically the same human conditioning.

In other words, there's nothing personal in it whatsoever. There's no you who did something bad. You is the arising presence.

And you watch the movement of unconsciousness, the conditioned. At first, you can only watch it after it's happened. And then you can fall into the trap of feeling guilty about it and calling yourself bad.

The ego loves that. If you can't call yourself good, we said it before, it'll be very happy calling yourself bad. Because at least you know who you are.

I'm no good. Oh, okay, now I know who I am. Better than not knowing anything, says the ego.

So you can watch that and know it is human unconsciousness. And then as presence arises, you will wake up in the middle of it. And that may happen next time.

The same action, the same speech coming out of your mouth. And in the middle of it coming out of your mouth, there's a witnessing presence. And you can see it's like a script, an actor who has been conditioned to perform, to act out that script.

And many times before, the same strategy, the same, and now there's a witnessing presence there. And that is the beginning, this is now when those structures weaken, become less heavy. Suddenly, the moment the witness arises, those otherwise very heavy structures that you could never hope to get rid of, unless you enter a different consciousness, a deeper, non-conditioned, suddenly they could weaken.

And then it happens again, it may not be the last time, because there's a momentum to that. And all those other things that you know are there to enhance your sense of self and diminish somebody else's sense of self. Very favorable, one of the favorite ego strategies, delusions, through diminishing somebody else's sense of self by criticizing, accusing, saying something to hurt.

You know it's wrong, it happens. And then in that moment, the self feels bigger because it has diminished somebody else's self. A lot of suffering in human interactions is caused by that.

And it's a form of delusion, of course, because you've only strengthened the delusion in yourself through that. And then suddenly, first you see it after the event, and then you see it as it happens. And you look through it, you see the madness of it, that you have only strengthened an illusion.

And all those things that are connected with ego structures, envy. Envy means you feel diminished in that illusory self because somebody else has, or is able to do, more than you. Has more of this, is better at that, has a nicer looking that, more knowledge, better appearance.

You compare, and then you feel diminished, and then you feel hostility towards that entity that seemed to diminish you. It's all total madness, total illusion. But it operates as motivating factors in people's lives.

And then you try to add something to you to make somebody else feel envious, and then feel the self has grown. Are they looking at me? Is she seeing it?

Is he seeing it? Or more subtle as knowledge, spiritual knowledge, even that can be used. Quoting scriptures, you little worm, you know nothing, let me tell you.

So all this, always the attempts through mad strategies to enhance one's sense of self. And all those things, I assume you're among those, so you hurt other people without knowing it. Create suffering for others in the service of self.

And it always seems to work for a little while, and then you feel even worse, and you have to do it again. So the only way to get out of that, and I believe that's the question. So I've just explained why you do these things, that was the question.

And that's really all you need to know, and just be there when it happens. You can't be there when it happens, be there just after it happens. And don't create an additional identity out of that, just watch.

It has nothing to do with who you are, you're watching unconsciousness in motion, the human condition. And so more presence arises, even in the midst of it, you'll be present. And that is the fading out of all those movements and structures.

That's the beauty of it. One more question. The Enneagram is an old Sufi model of the different aspects, qualities of soul, spirit, being, and their relation to different personality types.

Have you studied it? I haven't studied it, but I've looked at it. Somebody gave me a book about it.

And there are certain models, certain frameworks, there's another word, it's not coming to me, grids through which you look. Astrology is another one, and there are others, many others. And you can look, and if they work, and some of them are quite helpful, they highlight those areas in which this particular form is particularly, where the concentrations of unconsciousness are greatest.

And although I only looked briefly, I spent maybe an hour with that book, and I found it very interesting. So it can be helpful, because it highlights areas where unconsciousness is particularly, this is the impression I got without really having studied it, the areas where there's particularly strong blockages, unconsciousness, particularly concentrated here, there, there, in those areas. So by applying that, it can be helpful, you can perhaps see in yourself where you need to look most.

So it is not, there's not one of these that you cannot do without. As presence arises, you will see those things anyway, but it can be a helpful additional tool. And eventually, you have to, you let go of that.

There's always the danger with any tool that people use, that they become attached to the tool and believe a way of looking to be some kind of ultimate truth, to mistake a particular, perhaps a temporarily helpful perspective for the truth. Particularly if it seems to work for you, then you get very much attached to it. But any system through which you interpret reality could be temporarily helpful, and then let go.

If this evening we are receiving a visit from Shanti Mai, who has an ashram. She's an American-born spiritual teacher and lives here now, has an ashram nearby. And she's coming with some of her people to perform songs for us, devotional songs, that may be quite beautiful.

That reminds me, there were some questions about devotion, but we may come to them tomorrow. Devotion, what's true devotion? All these, there are these words, but they really, they're all aspects of one state.

I have a strong feeling of devotion, continuously there's devotion. Not to any one particular thing or form, but when you know your own nothingness, you're in a state of devotion. It's hard to explain.

Satsang with Mooji Satsang with Mooji Satsang with Mooji Satsang with Mooji Satsang with Mooji Satsang with Mooji Satsang with Mooji Can you be aware of the two dimensions here?

[Speaker 1] (4:46:37 - 5:07:55)

You're listening to the sounds. And one could say the sounds, they're dancing on the surface of the silence, the stillness. And simultaneously be aware of both dimensions, manifested, unmanifested.

And that stillness, that is the unmanifested, is presence, divine presence. Sometimes the stillness, as it is now, is there also externally as silence. But if there were no silence externally in this world, often you may not find that externally.

But internally, there's the stillness within the aware presence. And whatever phenomena happen to be happening. So the awareness of the stillness that underlies all sense perception and all thought, is freedom from thought, consciousness without thought.

It's the essence of who you are. The awareness of stillness is not two, it's one. It is self-aware awareness.

Only through language does it appear to be two. Stay alert. You immediately, whatever arises, you allow the condition to be.

Now there's the sound. Some of the external stillness is lost, it seems, and yet, there's the stillness through which you listen to the sound. So the stillness cannot really ever be lost.

Silence can become obscured. Stillness can also become obscured within, never lost. In the busiest and most insane mind, underneath all that noise and turbulence, the realm of stillness is there.

Unconditioned. And there's a relaxed alertness in this state of awareness. That's the essence of our retreat here, the only teaching.

All the words really pointed to that state. And that's the one thing that doesn't come to an end when you leave here. The experience as the external form of all this comes to an end, as all experiences do, sooner or later, mostly sooner, fleeting.

It evaporates as an experience, the form of it. And when you wake up the first morning when you're back home, and then you wake up in your own bed again, and you open your eyes, and maybe for a moment, you don't know whether this India retreat was a dream, or did it happen. What a strange dream that was.

I was on this bus. Facing death every moment. And many other strange things.

Monkeys were climbing up buildings. Chanting going on at all hours. It must have been a dream.

So there isn't very much difference between a passing experience and a dream. In that sense, this as an experience evaporates as all experiences do. And on level of form, all you have then to prove to you that it actually happened, is maybe some photos or videos, and then the form of that was captured there.

And you see, oh, there it is. That's where I was. And in 150 years, one of your descendants will be looking at this and can't make out anymore what these figures are on the photo.

It's all fading. It must have been one of my ancestors, perhaps, but I can't recognize the face anymore. It's quickly fading.

And then that's gone too. The only thing that doesn't leave you is the essence of this gathering. It's now.

And you won't need to hang on to the form of this. Feel nostalgic. Or if I may predict, at first you might feel a relief that you're back in your comfortable place.

And a little bit later you feel nostalgic about being here. That's the human mind. And all these are states of mind that may come, and that's fine.

And they happen within the spaciousness, which doesn't change. So you are simply a field of aware presence. Not a person.

Although you still pretend to be a person. The world wants you to be a person. You don't have a new concept in your head that says, I am now a field of aware presence.

That means you are a person again. With a new concept about who you are. The field of aware presence has no concepts about who you are.

Or who anybody is. Or who anything is. And there's no need to announce to your friends and relatives that now that you've been on a retreat, you're a field of aware presence.

There's no need to announce through emails that I am now liberated. It could be misunderstood. And resented.

And what's that need to say it? Where does that come from? What did you learn on the retreat?

Maybe they'll ask you when you come home. And you say, nothing. Maybe you could say I got rid of some accumulated ignorance.

But I didn't learn anything. Anything that there's self-identification with is ultimately ignorance. It might look very clever from a human viewpoint.

Because the deepest meaning of ignorance, the true meaning of ignorance is not uneducated. It has nothing to do with that. There are many highly educated people who are ignorant.

And this is not a judgment. It's simply seeing that this is not the essential nature of being ignorant. They are trapped in the delusion.

And they don't know who they are. Not knowing who you are beyond form is ignorance. The one basic ignorance.

Ignorance means not knowing who you are, the one essential thing. But then to seek it as an object of knowledge is further ignorance. To seek for your true self as if it could ever become an object of knowledge takes you into more ignorance.

So any identification is ignorance. Oh, they'll give you a microphone.

I know I am beyond this form. I can feel it. But as this form right now, I am a mother.

And I do identify to that. But I know that if I do identify to that, there will be some suffering. I am willing to accept that suffering.

Is that ignorance?

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (5:08:29 - 5:37:51)

So, the form as which you are here is also honored. It's not rejected. The form is honored.

Even the limitations, we saw that. The limitations that you encounter. Because you are a form, being a mother also imposes limitations on you.

That's all connected with assuming this temporary role. And it is honored, allowed to be. You can't get rid of form as long as you move here.

All that's needed is the spaciousness around the form. Then the form moves within the spaciousness and does what it has to do as that form. Better than any form could do that is self-identified with a form and there is complete lack of spaciousness.

And you are totally and only the mother. Then there comes in delusion. The form will act.

All those essential things that people want and are looking for can only come in if there is not complete identification with form. But you surrender to the form and there is a spaciousness. And then truly love flows in.

Love does not come through identification with the form. It comes through the realization of yourself as the space around the form. You know that.

And then love can flow into the form. Otherwise you get the typical love of the mother or the typical love of the lover that we talked about yesterday. And the typical love of the mother is very clinging because it's only form clinging to another form.

It looks like great love and what happens to many mothers. And then they can't let go. The form grows bigger.

18 years, 20, 25, 30. And they can't, there's the clinging because you only know yourself as form. You only know your child as form.

And there's the clinging. The mother still loves and doesn't realize that she's now stifling through her love. And that's again ignorance.

So all the functions that pertain to this temporary form, whatever its temporary role in this world may be, the way in which they are being performed, when you totally identify with form, there will be dysfunction flowing because the basic ignorance will be flowing into your actions. Whether you are a mother or a lover or whatever form it is, the basic ignorance of not knowing who you are beyond that will flow into it. And that accounts for the dysfunctional way in which people behave and interact largely.

So there's already an awareness that this is a role. This is a function, a form, and you honor that. But there's not total self-identification with that.

You already know that this is a function. So there is the spaciousness around it. And then you perform your duties, whatever duties in a wider sense, it's not maybe a nice word, whatever you have to do as this temporary form, you will do more beautifully with those essential ineffable qualities flowing into whatever you are doing that don't come from you as the person or the form.

Compassion, love, compassion, gentleness, joy. Many mothers think they are wonderful mothers and they are totally neurotic about it. And that's just one example of many other forms.

So the forms are honored. The limitations that come with form are accepted. And we saw, we've been talking about how the limitations of form actually become a doorway, an opening.

Not attempting to find some situation that is free of limitation. Of course you can exchange one situation for a nicer one, but that won't be free of limitation either. It may be a nicer house, a nicer this, that's fine.

And then you will encounter different kinds of limitations there. And one way or another you will find them, and so you don't run away from them, but accept, surrender to what is. So continuously that which is beyond the form is there as an underlying knowing, an underlying awareness, presence, spaciousness, whatever pointer works.

Not denying the form at all. It's honoring, honoring it. And so, there was a question, we may look at some more questions.

I have a backlog of questions. Some question, I read some questions this morning. One questioner asks, why do we blame form?

No, we're not blaming form at all. We are thankful to form. Because the form and that which is beyond form are ultimately one.

It will take you there. And that implies, for example, if you're a mother, the mother that is totally identified with form can't even truly listen to a child. That mother will tell the child what the child needs to do and worry.

But even if you can sit with a child and listen to a child, the stillness is there, the awareness, the aware presence is there. And there the child is talking and there's a spaciousness. And then from there you can allow, we talked about it yesterday, they allow the child also to manifest the unconsciousness that is part of the human condition, the suffering that comes with that inevitably.

And you help as much as you can. And then you allow the child to learn whatever he or she has to learn through that. Another example of a form, a function, a role.

You may have a job that is not interesting, that you dislike, try to get away from. Of course you can look for another job, but maybe you've been stuck in it, maybe you have looked. Maybe you're a waitress, in reality you're an actress, but since there are not enough jobs, you have to work in a restaurant for a while.

And then there could be resentment, you don't feel, you feel bad about having to fulfill this function, this role. And here's an opportunity to simply not to surrender, to say, OK, I might as well accept that now I'm a waitress. You're adding concepts to your mind, you're not a waitress.

I might as well accept that I'm poor. Nothing to do with surrender, you're adding more concepts to the mind. I might as well accept that I'm a failure.

I'm carrying a plate from the kitchen to the table.

That is the function I perform at this moment. And that is, that I give my attention to, surrender to, just this movement. And then I talk to the customer, and I give attention to this person.

Is there anything else you would like? And there's a true question. Not a formal, do you want anything else?

There's a true interaction, because when the moment is honored, whatever form this moment takes is honored, and the form that this moment takes right now is the customer in the restaurant. And he or she is honored. And will sense something, even only very deep down.

And you ask, is there anything else I can bring you? There's a true interaction, because the moment is honored. The now, the form that it takes.

You don't carry a self-concept in your head that you dislike, and you fight a battle inside yourself. You have me against my self-concept, and it gets more and more complicated. Nobody could even work it out.

You need years of psychoanalysis to get through that. There's a part of me that resents the image I have of myself, and then there's another part that has enormous complexity. And then you carry that, and the whole emanation is of you don't want to be where you are.

And you don't like the form that this moment takes, and you don't like this customer. Even if you're smiling. And the customer can sense that.

And then you shift from complaining about some conceptual identity as me as a waitress, and being unhappy about some illusory, because conceptual identity, you simply honor the form of this moment. And there you are, and you say, is there anything else I can give you? And each time the customer comes, there is that openness and the flow.

And who knows, it's there that transformation happens, in one way or another, when the openness is there to the suchness of the moment, suddenly the doors are open. And where the change will come from, we don't know. You don't demand change anymore for your happiness.

And then one day you ask, maybe, just one example, can I bring you anything else? And he says, no, but what's your name? Here's my card.

And you say, oh, Steven Spielberg. And he says, there's something about you, I don't know what it is, but... And then, three years later, you are the world-famous actress, no longer working in the restaurant, and you realize that you cannot step out of your house without creating a riot.

Wherever you go, they want something from you, and they all come running, and it's mad. You now encounter the limitations of that situation. Can't go anywhere anymore, without bodyguards.

Can't go out anymore for a walk. Each situation has its new limitations. Everybody wants something, wants to enhance their ego through being in contact with you.

Where is true human interaction? New limitations. And it doesn't mean that now you run away from that.

You recognize that each situation brings its new limitations. And you surrender to that. Otherwise, you'll be unhappy as the actress, and if despite your unhappiness you should become famous, you'll be unhappy there, too.

Complaining, trying to get away. This isn't it, it's never it, if you resist the form of now. So with that, the beauty is, your inner state of being is independent of external conditions.

The actress, the waitress, and the famous actress, basically, one could say two different incarnations of the same person, deep down, they feel the same. The famous actress says, I still feel the same that I was because I was surrendered then, and I'm surrendered now. The inner state is independent of fluctuating forms, conditions.

That means you're free of the world, needing it for something, to give to you. And the main thing that people want looking to the world for is a sense of self. You're free of that.

And of course, many other things are possible. The waitress, who knows what happens to any human being who is in the surrendered state. Suddenly, something totally different may appear, and she's not an actor, an actress at all.

That might have been an egoic delusion. Doesn't matter. Doesn't matter.

So not carrying the weight of conceptual identity in your head. Always back to this conceptual identity needs past and future. It's heavy.

Suffering comes. And then you go... Just this.

Honor this. Surrender to this. Always simple.

Always fine. Even in the midst of death, it's fine. I don't know if Bhakti spoke to you about meeting each person face to face.

Did you talk about that, Bhakti? Kim did. So you talked about that, and that's the...

I love hugging. But hugging is only the external form of that encounter. The essence of that encounter is always beyond that.

And so as I'd like to meet each one and simply look, and that's a strange thing. If you're not comfortable with it, it's fine, too. There's a great beauty in looking into the eyes of another person in the state that is free of thought.

That is, without sounding too esoteric, there is always a transmission of presence in that look that is free of thought. The unconditioned consciousness. It is not one way.

Whatever you look upon through stillness, and especially looking at another human being through stillness, that is a transmission of the state that we call presence. And it awakens. In your case, it doesn't need awakening because presence is already awakened in you, but it calls forth also from underneath your mind, even if your mind is active at that moment while the other person looking through stillness, it calls forth the unconditioned within you and then strengthens that.

It's a two-way process. But that is not the only way. Presence is transmitted in many, many ways, simply through the field of stillness itself in this room.

Presence is even transmitted through words, through sounds, if the sounds arise out of that. Some of that fragrance or energy field of presence is still in the words. We talked about that.

So the words have transformational power, not because of what they signify, but because of the space out of which they arise. Presence can be transmitted even through a work of art. Great art arises out of the state of presence.

The artist becomes still, and it happens. The greatest works of art were not created by persons, human beings. They always have something sublime there.

In form, yes, the form is limited. Every work of art is limited and impermanent. But something within that form still has an energy of that which is beyond form.

And that's what makes it into a great work of art. And in some strange way, people can recognize it, and they sense something but don't know what it is. Presence could be transmitted through touch.

So anything can flow into that simple sitting here also. A song, a sound. Then those become carriers, or simple stillness.

And this is now your function more and more in this world. Your function is to be there as the field of presence. One could say you redeem the world, not through thinking, I'm doing it, through being the field of presence that does something.

To whatever and whoever you come into contact with. It lessens the illusion of materiality of form. There's the form, and there's the formless.

And the more noisy it gets out in the world, and some lives are very noisy in many different ways, the more you can sense the stillness. If there were only stillness, there would be no knowing it. So perhaps, and I don't take this to be the truth, it's only sounds coming out of my mouth, so one could say God perhaps seeks to know him, her, itself, and so enters the world of form, identifies with form, disguises itself as form, plays the dream of form, and then wakes up out of the dream of form.

And in that waking up, there's a self-knowing. Before you, this is, forget about it now, but this is just a little approximation. It's not the explanation, there is no explanation.

And in your life, the two are beautiful. The form, which is noise in one way or another, and stillness. The manifested, the unmanifested.

Ultimately they are one. I'd like you to, yes please, another question.

[Speaker 4] (5:38:01 - 5:38:42)

Part of my question you have answered in your previous sentence, still that is bothering me for the last three days, the question is, are the presence and the form related? If yes, why blame the form? If no, how can the form exist without the presence?

Are the presence and the form related? If yes, why blame the form? If no, how can the form exist without the presence?

All right, thank you, yes. They are one. I'm going to talk about myself, what happened.

When I was in deep suffering for many years, I only knew myself as the suffering entity. Consciousness was totally identified with the forms, but it was consciousness. Consciousness was appearing in the disguise of forms, thought forms, material forms, a mental form of me.

Consciousness appeared in that disguise and only knew itself as that form. And then something happened and consciousness knew itself suddenly as both within the form and totally beyond the form. Consciousness suddenly knew itself as consciousness.

The forms were still there. None other than the appearance, the essence that was in every appearance. So, in both, all that, the difference between what presence means in the way in which we use this term here and in this teaching, because there's no universal meaning, what presence means in this teaching is self-aware awareness.

Awareness that knows itself, whereas consciousness embraces the totality. When the totality, when that becomes self-aware, then consciousness becomes presence. But it's all consciousness.

So this is the limit to which we can go through words. Further questions may arise if you start thinking about it, but they won't get you any closer to freedom. Thank you.

All right. The microphone is traveling there.

I've been to other retreats, one in New York, and one of the challenges I have when I go home is the desire to sustain the presence that I feel when I'm here. Because I notice people I'm around, a shift in them, when I have that higher presence. And then it seems to...

And I feel bad about that. What can I do? Okay.

[Speaker 1] (5:42:30 - 5:48:32)

One could say that when you notice that there's loss of presence, there's actually presence again. It's there. It's only when you no longer know that there's loss of presence, then you're lost.

As long as the knowing is there, there's presence. It can be very subtle in the background. There's a knowing that you're not present.

But in that moment of knowing that you're not present, you're present. Unless it's just a thought. I'm not present.

I'm never present. Why can't I ever be present? What's wrong?

But there can be a knowing. There's no presence. Oh, there's presence.

The knowing arises out of presence. So, as long as you know you're not present, you're fine. Now, another level of answer.

Another answer on another level. Use whatever means you have as helpful pointers to presence. And, well, there are many possible means.

One of them implies again that you know it. Am I in suffering in any way? Am I immersed in some form of suffering?

And suffering can take even impatience, irritation is a minor form of suffering. Whatever form it takes. Suffering can be an alarm clock that tells you you've lost the now.

Because if you hadn't lost the now, there would be no suffering. There isn't enough space. The now is so small for suffering to arise here in this form.

Suffering requires past and future and a me. Just this, a challenge can happen, but no problem. Problem needs past and future and a me that thinks about it and identifies with the situation, has a reactive and personal relationship to the situation.

That's a problem. So, suffering, lost the now. I must have lost the now.

Where is it? Oh, here. And the shift happens from mind identification to...

At first you may become aware of sense perceptions, suddenly again. Your inner energy field is back. And then you sense the underlying field of awareness.

Oh, back. So that's how even suffering can be a pointer, can take you there. And then you can use other things.

Open the book occasionally or any other book that has come out of that state. Read a few lines and then it's enough, very often, to be present again. Listen to tapes occasionally.

Don't get attached or dependent on anything. Wisdom is required to use help without becoming attached to the form that the help takes. The help is, of course, always pointing beyond the form.

Not getting attached to the teacher, the form of the teacher. Not getting attached to listening to tapes. Not getting attached to books.

Not getting attached to a photo. And yet, being able to use them as openings, as long as they're needed. So you can...

Any photo taken of someone in presence is helpful. Looking at that for brief moments and put it away. Listening to tapes, not excessively, but occasionally.

Nature, use anything natural and bring your attention to anything that is nature, because there's no mind activity in nature. It's an expression of consciousness, but not thought. Anything in nature, place attention on it, auditory, visually.

Acknowledge its being. Let it take you into presence. You can do that more easily than a man-made, human-made thing.

Most human-made things are mind-made things. Especially in cities, you're surrounded by the externalized human mind in all the forms around you in a city. But even in the middle of a city, you can look at the sky.

Or there may be a flower somewhere. So use what you get. But remember, knowing that you're not present, if it doesn't then immediately degenerate into thought, which says, you see, I'm not, never present, because that knowing can easily immediately degenerate into thought.

From the knowing that you're not present, you can formulate a concept or judgment, a thought that says, you see, I've lost it, not realizing. How do you know you lost it? There was a moment of knowing.

[Speaker 6] (5:48:38 - 5:48:51)

I think what I start judging is the strength of the presence, how strong it feels. Yes. Because it seems always via that knowing, the knowing is that it's not as strong.

No.

[Speaker 6] (5:48:51 - 5:48:53)

And then the desire to want it.

But if the knowing is acknowledged, the knowing is suddenly, you notice that there's a knowing, then it deepens by itself.

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (5:49:10 - 5:49:13)

All right. The microphone is traveling there.

[Speaker 5] (5:49:29 - 5:49:29)

Hello?

[Speaker 2] (5:49:30 - 5:49:30)

Yes.

[Speaker 5] (5:49:31 - 5:50:50)

Well, I sent something to you that I woke up at 3 o'clock in the morning yesterday before the bells went off. And just some thoughts came into my head, and I wrote them down, and I sent them to you yesterday. And I'd like to read it to you before we end the session.

I just call it with you. When time has ceased its wheels turning, and that space between the breath of in and out has become my bed, you were there to see me go. A smile so warm it filled my heart fully, and eyes that would call my soul to play.

Your kindness keeping safe the joy I treasured till now when I become all that ever was joy. Oh, greatness, thanks be, you are my servant of sweetness, my bearer of warm tidings, with wood from the bodha tree that has carved this space in my heart. For leaving on this day has caused me no sorrow, for you who stayed, that clear bell ringing, this way, this way.

Thank you so much for everything.

[Speaker 1] (5:50:51 - 5:51:00)

Thank you. Beautiful. Thank you.

Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 4] (5:51:10 - 5:51:49)

Eckhart, could you tell some words about prayer? In my experience, when I struggle in mind stream and non-acceptance of suffering, when I remember that God can do the work, that I cannot do it, it puts me in an open heart, and I feel like that prayer, to pray God, can be very helpful.

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (5:51:57 - 6:01:05)

For many people, of course, prayer is asking for something or wanting something, but we talk now about a different, a deeper kind of prayer, where you're not making demands, seeking some kind of fulfillment, adding something to me, give me that, give me that. So we talk about a different kind of prayer that is also can be a very powerful pointer that you use for yourself to point to the surrendered state, which is the non-dualistic, the non-dual state. So the dual, which still exists whenever you pray, there is still a sense of duality between me and God.

And I'm not saying do not pray. There is a place for that. The dual can take you into the non-dual, if it is a pointer.

So use prayer, mantras also can be helpful. They are, again, only a signpost to take you into that state, expressions of openness, of surrender, of not demanding. So whatever words come to you, they can take you to the edge.

There's a whole book, which I like it very much, The Course in Miracles that was channeled. It is a book of spiritual teaching. And that the whole book, almost the entire book, is written within the dimensions of duality.

It's always you address God. You even call God He in that book. This is the old way.

God is seen as masculine. And so it has the limitations of all that, the limitations of form. But that is not usually what I teach, because this teaching is the non-dual teaching.

But for many people it is helpful, for those who feel drawn to it, a text like that, it meets you where you are. It comes to you, and you inhabit a world of duality, and it starts with a duality of you and God. And gradually, through the lessons, it's a little bit like a psychiatrist who joins the patient, instead of rejecting the delusion of the patient, and saying, no, you are not Napoleon.

This is silly. Just get this out of your mind. And then some psychiatrists have tried to accept the reality of the patient, and saying, okay, so that's who you are.

And then you meet. Suddenly there is a meeting. You meet the patient in his delusion.

Ultimately, duality of you and God is the last delusion. Delusion. Beautiful delusion.

Beautiful. So the psychiatrist joins the patient, and then suddenly they can talk. And from there it can happen that the psychologist takes the patient by the hand, metaphorically speaking, and they walk out of that delusion together.

But first he had to meet him there. So certain texts or teachings, there are some that seem to move within the realm of duality, only to take you out of it. So they are like the psychiatrist who meets you in the realm of duality in order to reach you.

So many people are reached in that way. They would not yet be ready, perhaps, to listen to this teaching. And so they are reached.

And at the end of the Course in Miracles, he says, you move into non-duality. Very slowly, very subtly, you move into that. So this teaching, again, is a more direct non-dual.

But if you still need the duality, use that wisely, simply as a pointer. So that... And after prayer, move into the stillness.

Whatever prayer it is, let the prayer, let there be a stillness after the prayer has been uttered. Whatever it may be, let go into stillness from there. And the stillness is the realm of the non-dual.

But prayer can point you there. Beautiful. The whole teaching here is a pointer, too.

So as long as you feel you love it, you need it, you can use that wisely. It's beautiful. And then observe the silence after you have uttered the prayer.

So... Many still in this world need to be reached in that way. And then they come, and then they are maybe ready to listen to this teaching.

And even this teaching, there are certain things that I don't say because it would be meaningless to you. This comes as realization, your own realization. But there's nothing important here that has been omitted.

There's nothing that you need to know that I haven't given you for liberation. Nothing has been withheld as far as liberation, the possibility of liberation is concerned. Absolutely nothing.

Now we need to meet those of you or some of you face to face as a brief meeting. The way we usually hug is that people come up, we stand face to face, look at each other, and there's a hug. This time, for those of you who want it, others can just stay and sit as part of the beautiful meditation.

And we simply here stand face to face in the sacred encounter, and then at the end I will greet you in this beautiful greeting that is used in India that acknowledges that you are God in your essence, no matter what the outer form is. But before we do that, since we listened to a lot of music yesterday, I'd like to listen to just one more piece of music, and this is interesting. All the devotional music that we listened to yesterday, of course, arose from India with so much spirituality.

Now there are things that arise that are devotional and point to the truth that even arise in the West. And it's a wonderful thing to see that those things, just as spiritual teachers now are arising in the West, because there is a transformation of consciousness, even beautiful, sacred, devotional songs and music are also arising now in the West. So it's wonderful.

We have that. Many of you know it. Sometimes this singer, Kirtana, comes to talks that we have and sings there.

And maybe we could just listen before we meet face to face. And this is a meditative listening listen to just one song of hers, Kirtana. Many of you may know it, but it's always fresh and new, because everything that comes from there is always fresh and new.

Who You Really Are. If we could just listen to that one song, it's only a few minutes. Who You Really Are by Kirtana.

Could there be more Up a little. To this life we call mine

[Speaker 1] (6:01:14 - 6:01:17)

Could there be more to this life we call mine

[Speaker 3] (6:01:17 - 6:03:49)

Than in journey through space For a storyline More to life Than the body can sense Than the mind can conclude From experience As who we are Begin with breath Depend on form Or end with death Strip away these rules, these names And tell me what remains Measure success As we accrue Or the bonds that we form Or the deeds we do These too shall pass It's hard as we try To hold on to the form For we'll die Inherent in this dance of form Is the chance to see What's yet unborn And the choice to throw this chance away And be caught up in the play

Who we think we are Who we think we are

This is your lifetime It could end at any time Where is your attention?

Where is your prayer? Where is your song? In fortunate life Comes a call to be free From the cycle of bondage Misidentity Wake from the dream Finally reap the truth of one's being Before the body dies So before the final scene is passed See the scream on which it's cast See what's seamless to me and you And then you will see Who we really are Who we think we are Where is your attention?

Where is your prayer? Where is your song? In fortunate life Comes a call to be free From the cycle of bondage Misidentity Wake from the dream Get me Get me But I Get me Get me But I can't Get me Who is Get me Get me Get me But I But I can't Get me Get me Get me But I But I can't Get me

When you listen to this kind of music and are very alert you can notice a sound at the point where it ceases the flute, the sound of the flute and then it dissolves there's a little point where the sound comes to an end and weakens and then disappears altogether so if you listen to this kind of music with complete attention that's a particularly beautiful point because that's where the manifested merges with the unmanifested the sound dies and so and with the master sometimes that's a very subtle thing to be to allow the sound because the masters don't they allow they allow the consciousness to play the instrument through them and so there's a very subtle movement towards cessation the sound weakens for a very short instant and then nothing so it's the interplay between almost something and nothing and that's your entire life talking about music there's a beautiful poem I believe it's by Hafiz the poet and he says about himself I am a hole in a flute that the Christ's breath moves through listen to this music note that he didn't say I am a flute that Christ plays, that's nice too but no, I'm a hole in the flute and that's the same with all spiritual teaching it arises in that way and you come to realize that you also are a hole in the flute and perhaps before you thought you were the flute and before that you thought you were the player of the flute and yet you are all these things also this is the last session of the retreat not that that means very much only the form we may look at a few written questions today but always at retreats and so on there are more questions than one could get through although I keep them all one day you may see the question that wasn't answered here in a book answered, by then you won't need the answer anymore and you may have forgotten that you asked it because in a way you didn't the human mind asks questions and a few questions are helpful pointers other questions take you into speculative regions some questions are helpful other questions could be distractions but all questions are interesting I like reading them now you may find if your question is not answered here that you may not have known it before that you may have a personal relationship with your question you may feel why didn't he answer my question it was so good and why did he answer all those there were such silly questions that he answered and mine he didn't mine, he didn't answer mine and then you feel diminished in your sense of self or you feel reactive angry with me which is designed to strengthen your sense of self or combat the diminishment and so we talked about the deeper sense of reincarnation and so it means you reincarnated into your question and that means your sense of self became entangled in a thought because the question is a thought so the sense of me, self, identity became entangled in the form of that thought and you derived some sense of selfhood from that and you may also derive it if a question is answered and maybe I said this is a good question oh I asked a good question I'm not talking about any particular person here because I'm simply this is how the mind works so if this happens to you and there is a sense of self in your question it is more important more useful far more vital to observe that in yourself than to receive an answer you learn much more from that inner observation than from any answer you could get we in this last session we are moving to this point where we allow questions to subside and we could also observe the inner impulse to ask more know more and watch that Ramana Maharshi was a great master although he did answer certain questions beautifully but many questions he didn't answer there were far more questions he didn't answer than he answered probably answered 5% of questions that people asked him and so most questions were met with silence stillness greater than any answer could be and then you learn something about attachment to a form and to a thought as a me a very subtle temporary form of me so we allow these silent spaces here we don't need to fill them with another question although I may shuffle some papers we allow the mind may come in when we have a silent space now and say this is my chance get your question in there now before it's too late it's always nice to have a funny question too so here's a funny, slightly funny I find some people get on my nerves without any particular reason and although I do some serious surrendering and being present they still get on my nerves on top of it I can't get my eyes off them it's almost as though I love hating them is there any redemption for me? and by the way where did you get those fabulous sounding bells?

the bells were given to me a few years ago I may have had them for 7 years or 8 years and I've seen somebody the Dalai Lama gave them to somebody who then had them for a few years and then they were passed on to me to be used in here otherwise the person knew they were used for this purpose so it was beautiful to let go of that gift it's rare, the sound is of a very rare purity so the people that get on your nerves that's an aspect of how the ego keeps itself going critical complaining, judging and then it loves that it loves those states and all you have to do here is observe that in yourself observe the people observe the reaction observe the addiction almost addiction to those reactive states observe them in yourself and from this the slightly humorous note of this question makes me feel that there's already some sense of distance from it because when you begin to observe those patterns in yourself they don't want to let go of a resentment, a reaction a grievance and get in there and hang on and you begin to observe it that means there's spaciousness around it quite often at some point you begin to smile and you see how like a dog that won't let go of the bone you won't let go of that grievance or that reaction or that resentment now the dog although the dog of course lives beautifully presence is a different matter it's extremely rare for a dog if it ever happens to have spaciousness around a bone maybe a very old dog and so that dog can then say I have transcended and perhaps when you look into the eyes of a very old dog there's some distance there some almost wisdom dog wisdom arising however most animals have to act according to their form whatever corresponds to the form and there's very rare that there's any spaciousness around that but humans for many thousands of years have been the same no spaciousness, totally conditioned and now that possibility is there to transcend the conditioning which does not immediately mean to exterminate the conditioning the conditioning then weakens so just watch yourself getting irritated and enjoy it rather than thinking I'm not perfect I'm far from perfect I need to achieve a completely different state this is not the state of perfection, of enlightenment that's a projection of the mind a state to be achieved any state will do if you only allow it it's enough when insights come when I feel connectedness with you teaching here and with other spiritual teachings a sometimes overwhelming need to cry rises in me why not joy, bliss is this identification with the pain body maybe it is joy why label it at all let that be let the tears come I cry not often but it happens and I don't know what label to attach to it it's not sadness, it's not pain it's more like joy but it never even occurred to me to ask myself, what is that it was beautiful to simply allow that when I listened to the song there were some tears this morning I didn't ask myself, why am I crying what label do I attach to these tears it was beautiful to simply allow without the need to find some position with regards to them adopt some mental perspective on them and if you don't adopt a mental perspective deep down it's all joy it's a beautiful thing not to label states that arise anymore if that doesn't, it's not possible then just recognize a label as a label and then it doesn't overpower you so you can be in that state of allowing no need to call it good or bad I want it, don't want it, it's here how will this happen to us what has happened to you when will we be fully realized the answer to that is the last answer in the book The Power of Now which is when you no longer need to ask that question because even that question is an obstacle put there by the mind and is a way of not fully accepting this because if ego gives superiority complex is inferiority complex being opposite preferable to superiority complex inferiority complex might look like ego getting lesser but it's not the case it's just as strong in both cases you have a mental image of yourself and patterns associated with that image inferiority complex means not as good as superiority complex means better than both are mental identifications with conceptual sense of self and the superiority ego the superior ego has underneath its apparent superiority the underlying fear of not as good as and the inferior ego despite its apparent sense of inferiority has an underlying desire to be more than greater than, bigger than just waiting so in either case you're trapped in mind and how to get out of that you know that already pay attention to this to what is surrender to this moment the end I've said it before but I have to say it again because it's easy to it's the end of conditioning or egoic conditioning whether it's superiority complex or inferiority whatever it may be most people actually move between the two maybe this is a slightly speculative question but the answer can be short the probability of intelligent life on other planets outside our solar system is generally accepted after all it is a conceit to think we are the only form of intelligent life in the cosmos assuming there are other forms of this intelligent life elsewhere would they also be a part of this supreme consciousness or be enlightened or working towards enlightenment as we are in this case under your guidance as we are doing well any form this is the one principle of liberation which surely because as above so below everything is reflected it applies to the entire life of form no matter where it cannot not apply to that so any wherever consciousness appears in the disguise of forms consciousness will also be awakening out of that play out of that disguise so wherever it may be it will be the same the awakening of consciousness out of the dream of form of matter must be the same anywhere no matter how distant the galaxy may be and I would say it happens simultaneously here and in many other parts of the cosmos one could say the entire cosmos is awakening out of that dream and now don't believe that this is the ultimate truth that I'm telling you, it's only a little pointer an approximation, a distant approximation or helpful as that not the final explanation I cannot give a final explanation of the cosmos by making sounds, it's not possible so treat any words with care the entire cosmos must be awakening otherwise we would not be awakening as above so below so this is a cosmic event that is happening here and it might look like a person becoming free of suffering and unhappiness on a personal level but it goes far beyond that and who knows perhaps there are some visitors in a non-human non-visible form in this room listening in to the teaching maybe technologically incredibly advanced and yet they come to this primitive planet because they hear the possibility of liberation and so on we could continue talking about this or write books about it can you assume the heavenly pleasure we have been feeling in your valuable presence and how we will be feeling after we depart in which way and how we can fully carry that peace and completeness till it blends with our life I wish the world was full of Eckharts it would have made realization easier and faster with regards at your feet the answer to this if it is a question maybe here last night I experienced poignant sadness I allowed this sadness and observed it with my presence the first part of the sadness was due to the end of the teaching until I realized that you have introduced me to the eternal teacher within me and I felt peace the second part of the sadness was in leaving my dear friend and teacher Eckhart until I realized that a part of you will always reside in my heart and I felt gratitude a part of not just a part of me but the whole is in your heart as yourself and this morning when I met many of you face to face I was meeting myself different forms but it's always myself so I know you very well without needing to know very much about you there is an enormous difference to the mind when the mind says I know you what the mind means is I know a lot about you and this is different when I know you not through mind I may not know anything about you and whatever I know about you isn't very important because the about means it concerns the world of form it concerns your past it concerns your story it concerns the content of your mind it concerns your conditioning that's all about but it's not you so there is this beauty and of course people believe that when they know about they know, they don't there are innumerable people living together as couples who don't know each other because they don't know themselves you cannot know anybody else except through knowing yourself and it is not through thought of course that you can know anyone all you can know through thought is about and that doesn't only apply to human beings it applies to anything that you have knowledge about nature, plants, the world any aspect of the world of form is knowledge about it's form knowledge not essence form knowledge always has a sense of separateness to it because it's known through concepts which is more form form knowledge has its place occasionally it's helpful occasionally it's needed to be trapped in form knowledge is a dreadful form of bondage not knowing anything beyond form knowledge is bondage no matter how much how knowledgeable you are about things about people so form knowledge needs to be balanced with the essence of knowing which is not through thought not through mind which only arises when the mind subsides and of course in this world so far we haven't had this balance everybody is lost in form knowledge schools that's all they teach so one could say they teach everything except the one thing that truly matters and at universities they know about everything proliferation of knowledge and increasing specialization so that PhDs are now written about a strand of hair it gets narrower and narrower the area of specialization so the mind is moving into greater and greater fragmentation and you can have people in the same field whatever it may be biology and that's now subdivided into little areas fields and so people go through these systems become conditioned a good friend of mine at university graduate school was writing a PhD on the inner ear of the field mouse and that is three years or four years of intensive research and study and a huge volume and I'm not saying this is bad but this is how much fragmentation we have gone and there is a great longing in humans for truth for true knowing especially strong now in societies that have moved very much into fragmentation and proliferation of both mind and things the proliferation of things in the highly developed world accompanies the proliferation of mind so many things everywhere so here we are concerned with something that perhaps at some point as more humans become conscious the main subject at school will be this what we have been dealing with this week it will be the most natural thing that will be the central core of every curriculum at school around which all the others revolve and then it's fine acknowledge and honor this field of external silence and inner stillness it's enough to notice it and then you honor it how could this leave you when you leave here you don't really leave anywhere just changing sense perceptions around you like a stage set you know in some theaters so that they don't have to change the scenery the stage moves it has already prepared the stage set for the next act and so the whole stage moves around and suddenly you find yourself in different scenery nothing has changed and this will happen to you of course when you leave here the scenery changes suddenly of course it's now always now it's actually the most enjoyable thing to allow the scenery to change to allow the impermanent nature of all things the continuous flux the short-lived nature of all experiences so fleeting and allow it see it and I mentioned it briefly before a few days ago allowing it, seeing it they go together and they imply that there is something that is beyond time change birth and death eternal the simple fact that you can see the impermanent nature of all phenomena and all forms that you can know it and see it not through mind by calling it this or that but simply see it means there is something that is beyond if there were nothing beyond you wouldn't see it I gave the example before if the entire world were green the color green would not exist there must be something that is not green for you to see green there must be something that is not subject to impermanence for you to recognize the fact of impermanence that's the seeing that's the consciousness the unconditioned that sees without calling it anything that is the eternal still presence that sees and that's why Buddhist monks in some countries visit morgues where dead bodies are kept and sit there for a few hours watching the dead bodies they are contemplating impermanence from a western point of view it's insane, what are they doing there? but there's deep wisdom in that the contemplation of impermanence and the greatest way in which you contemplate impermanence is to contemplate death as it arises, it always arises sooner or later, in the now some form of it the end of this retreat is a form of death it's beautiful every end, every farewell is a little tiny death that's why people have that need to say see you soon because there's a little death here so we must make sure that this is not final but you just allow it I don't say at retreat see you at the next retreat I'm very happy not to see you if you don't need to come beautiful, if I see you it's beautiful too don't be long, see you next time I will ring my fabulous bells and it's a call to presence to awakening out of mind blessings to you on your journey through space and time and more importantly your journey into the now ever more deeply into the now the timeless and that statement already contains a little paradox and that's how it is Welcome, we are settling into this moment, leaving behind the nervous energy of the city, which is very easy to absorb and carry around with you and then you become part of it. It may not be quite as nervous as New York or Hong Kong, but it's nervous enough. The location, it's beautiful, the room, the space.

The most important thing about any room is not what you see, but what you don't see, it's the space. That applies to yourself also. But the location, I didn't choose it, it just happened.

It's important, significant. Right in the middle of the old structures of our society, there's Whitehall, Westminster Abbey, Parliament. And they don't realize that in the midst of this, right here, a new consciousness arises out of the old.

And that's the larger context of our gathering this afternoon, the arising of a new human consciousness. Now, you don't need to believe that for this to work for you. You might say, I don't believe it's arising.

Nevermind, you are here, that's all that matters. Now, it seems that we are going to spend this afternoon together. And when I say that, that's already not totally true.

It's true in a conventional sense, in relative terms. Yes, of course, we are spending the afternoon together. In absolute terms, there is no afternoon, except in your mind as a thought form.

Afternoon is ultimately no more than a thought form in your mind. You're projecting forward, and you call it the afternoon. So in absolute terms, we are not spending the afternoon together.

We are only together here at this moment. Because when it's three o'clock, it'll be this moment. When it's four o'clock, it'll be this moment.

When it's five o'clock, it'll be this moment. The one thing almost everybody ignores. And so we are becoming acquainted here with a level of consciousness that we could call timeless, where the usual structures of the human mind are not operating anymore.

That you don't need to understand these words. Don't try to figure out what they mean. Just let them sink in.

Something from within responds. You already know all this. You are being reminded.

If you are new to this, I'd like to just point out, this is not a lecture. As you can see, the speaker has not prepared anything. No clipboard or lecture notes or program.

And it's not a workshop either. So if you expect a lecture or workshop, you would be disappointed. It's called an intensive.

Humans like to attach names to things, so we had to find a name. It's called an intensive. Now, you might ask, what could there possibly intensive about a man sitting on a chair and people listening?

What's intensive about that? Perhaps you can understand intensive if we were doing a workout for three hours, physically, energetically. That's an intensive, and then you feel you have achieved something.

You can understand it on that level. Not that there's anything wrong with workouts. They can take you into presence too.

Or if we were doing emotional work here, everybody going through weeping and screaming and having one catharsis after another, that could be called an intensive too, but it's unlikely to happen here either. It could, if it happens to one or two people, that's fine. And not that there's anything wrong with emotional work.

It has its place, and that also can take you into the state of consciousness, of presence, if you go into the emotion and through it. But that's not what we're doing here either. And then an intensive could be mental work.

We could be doing Sudoku all afternoon long, becoming more and more complex. Let's work that out. Or highly complex philosophical problems about the nature of the universe.

Let's try to understand all the nature of the human being, the complex makeup of a human being. That would all be, on the mental level, could be very intensive. Not that there's anything wrong with the mental level.

That also could take you, because eventually you get so exhausted that the mind stops. So if it's not physical, it's not emotional, it's not mental, although these three levels could occasionally arise in you. Of course, the mind will do say whatever it says while you sit here.

The body may go through this or that, and the emotions may arise and subside. That's fine. But that is not why this is an intensive.

It's not an intensive on that level. The intensity is the consciousness that arises. And the language, we don't even have a word for it in our language, this fine energy that arises here as we sit here together, which sometimes we call presence, which we could call stillness, which we could call pure awareness.

That is why you're here, for this to arise in you. So it is for you to tune into that energy field that arises here. It requires a certain alertness.

And you may find that occasionally your mind stops thinking. That's where we want to get to. And yet, you don't fall asleep.

Well, some of you may fall asleep. But that is not the worst defense mechanism against the new consciousness, because even if you fall asleep, a little bit will seep in, and maybe next year, suddenly it's there. There are other ways in which the habitual mind patterns in you try to come up and interfere with this moment.

I'm pointing out a few, just so that you recognize them when they arise. Especially helpful, perhaps, for people who haven't been to any of these talks, intensives. Boredom.

So it gets restless, looking for something to absorb, and not finding it. That's the frustration. And that's boredom.

Now, you may notice in yourself, or the person sitting next to you, but most importantly, in yourself, you start losing the alertness, and perhaps the mind takes you away completely from here and now, and you start thinking about your problems. Tonight's dinner, where you have to go, what you did, what you're going to do. You may find a restlessness coming in.

You may find your legs start twitching or moving. You're not here anymore. This is a normal human condition.

If a dog did it, we would take him to the vet. But for humans, it's normal. And if that happens, observe it in yourself, and then say, oh, there's my leg twitching, shaking.

And you can then feel the energy that's behind that. Another defense mechanism could be anger in certain people in whom anger is more or less habitual.

[Speaker 5] (12:59 - 13:03)

And so the mind says, come on, get on with it. What are you talking about?

So whatever arises, as we sit here, if you can acknowledge that that's what's arising, then it doesn't have you in its power. Whatever thoughts come up, emotions come up, physical energy moving through, if you just be there as the space for whatever arises, it doesn't control you anymore. So you don't push it away.

You say, this is what is. And so gradually, we disidentify from the movement of thought that most people are totally overpowered by. We disidentify also from the emotions that go with these thoughts.

Disidentify, there's no repression. It's just know it's there, that is. If you can sit here and actually enjoy being here and listening, that enjoyment comes from the deep place within you.

That means you are connected beyond the person to that deeper dimension of consciousness. That's all that's needed. If you're not connected, it's hard to sit here the whole afternoon.

If you're only here as a head, a thinking mind, it would become very frustrating. So for those of you who have come, who are still just the thinking mind and wondering what this is all about, I'd like to now to take us into, take us to the doorway of the new state of consciousness. That's why we are here.

The doorway is always on top of the head. On top of it, it says present moment, all there is. This is the key to what we sometimes call self-realization is to be present with what is now so that you are not alienated from the present moment.

You're not a stranger to the present moment. Now, a very simple, many of you know this, a very simple way of anchoring yourself in the present moment is body, inner body, not the outer body. What is the inner body?

The sense of aliveness as you sit here and to take some attention into that right now. And I will continue to remind you throughout to use that as an anchor for presence. For those of you who cannot yet feel the inner body, a very simple way of finding out what it means to indwell, so to speak, the body is to hold up your right or left hand, close your eyes and ask yourself, how can I know if my right hand is still there or not without moving my hand, without touching anything?

How can I know it? Now, not from memory, not saying, of course I know because I just saw it, that's why I know it's there. No, not like that.

To know it's there energetically, then you can feel the energy in the right hand or the left hand. And in the same way, you can feel the energy in the rest of your body. And that is inhabiting your body.

That is not yet the ultimate, but it is the doorway. The doorway into presence, the doorway into being, the doorway into a sense of self that is infinitely deeper than who you thought you were, an eye of infinite depths, and it's only the doorway feeling the inner body into it. So you have the, when you use the word eye, which to most people is the most important word in their vocabulary, because they use it all the time, I decided, I don't know, or me, or mine, or I.

Usually that refers to a sense of self that is made up of thought, a mind-made sense of self. It's your story, it's your problems, it's all the things that make up your life. It is the content of your mind.

So when people say I, what they're referring to is the content of their mind, the predominant patterns, thought patterns that continuously revolve in your mind. And so you identify with those thought patterns and they give you your sense of self. And those thought patterns create emotions.

Emotions are the energy of the body responding to the activity of the mind. So the two together then form the so-called I, and that is your person, your personal me. And that is what absorbs most people's attention most of the time.

I have to look after me, I have to worry about me. And if they worry about other people, it's because these other people are important to me. So you could worry about your children, or your parents, or this or that, but they're important to me.

So it's all to do with me. And the me is problematic. There's no me that is not problematic, very problematic.

And you can never get away from the problems that this I encounters, and not only encounters, but generates. The mind-made me generates problems. It generates drama and conflict.

It needs that to feel. It doesn't know that it needs to generate it. It says these things just happen.

Wherever you go, people are in conflict. Go to families. If you find a family that's not in conflict, either they are all enlightened, or they are no longer fully alive.

So if you come home, drink your beer, switch on the TV, watch for four hours, go to bed, then get up in the morning, go to work, no conflict anymore, but you're not alive anymore. And then go to, at work. It's surprising that they get anything done at all, because they're all fighting.

And then come larger collectives, countries, political parties, governments, go to parliament. And that's relatively benign, those things, conflict in parliament, but then there's a larger conflict of countries, warfare, and so on. The false sense of self, disconnected from the deeper level of your being, generates suffering, suffering, unconscious suffering.

I'm not the first person to say that. The Buddha said it 2,600 years ago, the self is suffering. It generates suffering.

To live like that, disconnected from the depths of your being, generates suffering. Now this we need to see clearly, because we need to recognize dysfunction, suffering, madness, whatever you call it, we need to recognize it for what it is. Now, very unconscious people, who are totally identified with their mind, to them, everything seems to happen.

Other people do it to me. They don't realize that they generate suffering for themselves, make themselves suffer, and for others. So if you look at your life on that level, every life is very problematic.

And now, so we are not here to solve the problems of the surface self. On that level alone, they cannot be solved, unless you go deeper. I don't remember who said it, it was Jung or Einstein or somebody like that, said the problems of mankind cannot be solved from the same level of consciousness that created those problems.

Now, when I say there is the possibility of waking up out of that unconscious pattern, and that waking up is not some new thing that you add to your mind. We are not here because I'm trying to convince you that you are more than the person, the personal self, because then I would be creating a new religion that would say, we believe in the transcendent self. Another thought form.

And of course, to identify with mental concepts is everybody's religion. Even if they say they have no religion, they do. It's their opinions and viewpoints and mental concepts that they cling to.

If you challenge them, they will quickly go, no, not that. So we are not creating some new belief. We investigating, but not analytically, experientially, a deeper level within yourself.

And we call, this can be called self-realization. And that is not that we find a new self that is bigger than the little self, not quite, because when we say that we find a new self that's bigger than the little me, we've created some new structure. That's why the Buddha, very wisely, used the word emptiness, but that's misleading, unfortunately, too.

But it doesn't force it. One good thing about it, it doesn't give you anything to believe in. Very clever.

It's the most uninspiring term any spiritual teacher has ever used. What are you trying to achieve? Emptiness.

What is your ultimate reality? Emptiness. Oh.

Oh. But this may also be why Buddhism remained a relatively sane religion compared to others, because you cannot very well say that my emptiness is better than yours. But what does that word actually refer to?

It refers to your essential being as formless, not form. The little me is form. The body has a physical form for a little while.

It gradually withers like a fruit. Fruit does it within a week, 10 days. You leave an apple for 10 days.

Or if you put a camera on it and speed up the film, it would be quite amazing. You see how the form is short-lived and you see the apple goes with us and it's. And the same thing happens to the human body, of course.

And for people who have been identified, who derived their sense of self partly from the physical form, that is suffering. One of the forms in which suffering arises. And then there is the psychological form that we've been talking about, the me, with its problems and its stories and its past and its projected future, which it hopes will complete my experience of myself.

The future will complete the me, is the unconscious belief. That's why everybody is much more interested in the future than the present moment, because they are looking for themselves in the next moment. If you're rushing to get somewhere or to get something done, you believe that that moment that you want to get to is more important than this moment.

And that moment will, when you get there, somehow it will free you for a deeper sense of aliveness. That's why you're trying to get there. Why else would you try to get to the future?

And does the future ever do that? No, it can't. Why not?

Because it's only a thought form. It never has no existence except in your head as a thought. Is that true?

It cannot not be true because otherwise, somebody would have experienced the future. Sometimes some great explorer, the first man to ever experience the future, which everybody wants to get to, but you can't. Because a future is only a thought form.

It's fine for practical purposes, moving about bodies from here to there, catching a train, meeting a person, nothing wrong with that. Beyond that, it's a dreadful, dreadful limitation to be trapped in that thought form and be dominated by that thought form and expecting some kind of release or fulfillment or some kind of addition, thinking when I get there, I will have added enough to myself and I can finally be complete. Whatever and what people want to add to their deficient sense of self, because every sense of self is deficient.

And condemned to remain deficient. I don't want to destroy anybody's illusion prematurely. The deficient sense of self remains deficient.

What people are trying to add to their deficient sense of self so that they can feel fully dwelling in the aliveness of being, being fully yourself, that's what people want, being fully yourself. They may express it in different ways, how they want to achieve that. On a very rudimentary level, perhaps you want to rob a bank or make enough money so that you can buy the things that will complete you.

And then other things, relationships, when I get this or that possession, this or that achievement, recognition from other people when I get that, or some sense of creating something that makes a difference in the world. Of course, that's a wonderful thing, but as long as you need it to fulfill yourself, it's much less likely to happen. And then comes the spiritual people.

They want to add some spiritual attainment and then complete themselves through that. Oh, I forgot to mention the intellectual people or so-called, they're reaching for some kind of knowledge. When I've absorbed enough knowledge, then I'll be full and complete.

Now, knowledge, of course, grows every day because they cut things into smaller and smaller slithers. And so you can't possibly absorb, if you're writing a PhD, you realize how small the area of your expertise has become. You're no longer writing about the plant.

You're writing about the leaf of the plant or a section of the leaf of the plant. You're not writing about the animal. You're writing about, as a friend of mine did a PhD on the inner ear.

He didn't write a PhD on the field mouse, but the inner ear of the field mouse. It took three years. And now he's the expert, but now there are other people who are even dividing that into smaller slithers, a section of the inner ear of the field mouse.

So, and this is when increased knowledge is getting us. It has its place for practical purposes, but as human beings, it's not really getting us anywhere. Otherwise, the enlightening transformations would come from the universities, but there's a whole arising, a whole new consciousness totally divorced from the universities.

They don't teach any of the things that really matter for transformation. Maybe they did once. I don't want to discourage anybody, young person from going to university, but just realize the relativity of it.

That's not the answer. And when you become a professor, you will be just as unhappy as you are now, if you're unhappy now. So the adding to, including this event, if you move within the old structures of your mind, you are hoping that this event will add something to who you are, which you can then take home.

If I were distributing a handout, everybody gets a folder of 15, 20 pages of things that we have gone through this afternoon, it would be very satisfying because it would symbolize what something you've added to it. Oh, yes, I am more now than I was before. Now, it's so frustrating to sit here if you are totally identified with their mind, because when you leave here now, you're not going to be more, hopefully less, because it's only by realizing the relativity of relative insignificance of the person that you begin to go beyond and say, okay, first we need to look at that.

Yes, it's very narrow to be trapped in that person. That's a strange word. It comes from Latin and it means mask.

But now if you look, so why did the Latin, the Romans call the person, and per is means through, and the S-O-N is related to the English word sound, because the actors in the theater would wear masks and the sound would come when they speak, would come through the mask. That's why a person is called a person. That's where the sound comes through, per-son.

Now, every person is claustrophobic. It's a claustrophobic sense of self. Even those you think, oh, they have everything.

They've got a private plane. They can go anywhere they like. They have a villa here and a country house there and this there, and so their life seems limitless.

And you say, oh, this person's life must be, has no limits. This is what I want, and this is what the papers write about. They say these people are the ones that are to be imitated, or maybe when you're lucky, you will get there too.

And if you meet them, you realize that they are unhappy and fearful, just like everybody else. Their advantage, however, the advantage that they have over ordinary people is that they have nothing else to look forward to. I have met people and they have realized that's not it.

They've realized the whole absurdity of fame, the emptiness of fame and ultimately wealth. And then suddenly they were ready to go deeper. And those that have achieved everything and are not ready to go deeper become more and more unhappy.

They take drugs, the alcohol, and so on. So how do we leave? I'm not saying that you need to eliminate the person, but find that which is deeper than how do we do that?

First of all, we realize the fallacy of believing that you can complete yourself through future. So you're not going to find yourself there because it doesn't exist, future. So all you end up with then is, oh, something that everybody always overlooks.

Which is now. Now, when I say now, for many people, it's an abstract concept. It's now, okay.

Okay, you've said it now. Now I want to know the next thing. Now, the now is not an abstract concept.

The now needs to become a felt reality for you. What we call the now. Let's look at this now and see if we can get deeper into it.

Now, this room, sense perceptions, visual sense perceptions, auditory sense perceptions, feeling, sensing sense perceptions. So you're here, you see, yes, that's now, okay. You're breathing, that's now, okay.

There's the body, you can feel the contact body with the chair, okay, that's now. These are all still in the perceptual realm, now. Then you go a little bit deeper into the body.

And you feel, yes, it's alive. Because you can feel a certain, if only a little bit, a certain sense of aliveness in the body now. So you can be aware of what you see, yes.

What you hear, yes. Outer body, inner aliveness, okay. Now, if your attention moves into those things, already you may realize you're not thinking that much anymore.

Because we are taking attention away from thinking and putting attention into sense perceptions now. But some thoughts may still occasionally come up, even as we do this practice, if we want to call it that. And you remain visual, auditory.

Sensing the body, feeling the outer body, the inner body. Thoughts, okay, little thought comes here or there. Maybe there's still some emotion, maybe not.

If there's an emotion, then you perceive that, the inner realm, that's there. Maybe there's a little pain. Maybe somebody here has a toothache, or the little toe hurts, or some larger discomfort.

That's also what is now, that is now. So the now, at first instance, consists of a number of things which you can be aware of simultaneously. Although when I talk about it, I talk about it, of course, this whole language works in succession.

But you can be aware simultaneously of the room, the sounds, the inner feeling, whatever is within. You're aware of all that now. So is that the now?

No, not yet. You're not there yet. Why not?

This is where confusion arises. People confuse the now with the content of the now. Now, of course, the content of the now changes continuously.

This room is full of people now. In a few hours, it'll be empty, and so on. Or you can feel a pain here or there now, and in an hour, there won't be a pain.

Or you feel an emotion, and then it won't be there. Or thoughts, that's the most changeable thing of all. One thing after another arising.

It is all now, but it's not the now. It's what happens within the now. Okay, okay.

Now, don't try to understand that through thinking. This is not the way. You can't.

We are approaching the now, getting close, because when you get into sense perception and inner perception, you are getting closer. There's the content of now. And how does all this arise?

Where does all that arise? The content, the thoughts, the emotions, the sense perceptions, all the things that happen, experiences, events, good, bad, come and go, irritating things, frustrating things. Oh, by the way, there are no irritating things.

There are only things, and you bring the irritation to them, but that's a different matter. If you call something irritating, you're confusing the inner and outer. Everything is neutral.

The irritation is the suffering that you bring to the event, and it's the resistance, and it's habitual, and it's not personal. It's a human condition, but we are going beyond that. Now, things fill the now, we could say.

But there is only, there's always only now, which means there must be something unchangeable about all that. There's something that is not subject to this continuous flux, the impermanence, the fleetingness of this world. There's something that's not part of this coming and going.

Now, the moment I give it a name, I have already falsified it, that even if I say something, I have already falsified it. It's so fine. The moment you give it some form, that's not it.

However, I'll continue to speak and give it form continuously reminding you, that's not it. So the words are only pointers to a reality within yourself, and it is vital that you find that, because if you don't find it in this lifetime, you're like a seed that has fallen from a tree and never sprouts. Now, that doesn't matter to the tree, and the universe is infinitely abundant, it's fine, because consciousness is evolving anyway, but from a limited viewpoint, it's a pity.

From the limited viewpoint of the person, it's a pity if you go through life and never find that which is not subject to decay, to impermanence, what the Buddhists sometimes call the unborn, the uncreated, the unmanifested. All negative terms, very wise, because the moment you give it a positive term, you've made it into content, something, and that's not it. It is the space for all content.

Okay, it is essentially you, this moment, visual, auditory, perceptions, thoughts, emotions. What else is there that is continuously overlooked? The space of this moment.

Without that, nothing would be here. And what is that space? Now, when you ask that question, the mind wants, again, to give it a form.

The Lao Tse, who wrote this profound book, Tao Te Ching, line one is, the Tao that can be spoken of is not the true Tao. Tao meaning the ultimate reality, whatever you want. But that which you speak of, this is the warning at the beginning of the book.

Nothing that I say about it is true in absolute terms because language is form. But as long as you know that, that's fine, because then you can use language as a little arrow pointing no more. It's not an explanation.

It's not it. When I now say, the now is essentially who you are at the deepest level. That doesn't make sense to the analytical mind.

But if you let that statement sink in and feel that you are the now in which all things happen, then it arises, the human drama, and subsides. Now, for a moment, there is, you can feel this, the moment the sound of the police car subsided, there was a moment when you could feel a spaciousness that before was filled by the sound. So something disappears, and for a moment, you can feel the stillness, the spaciousness more strongly.

That is the blessing of death, because when something dies, which means the form dissolves, could be just a sound. There's a sound, it comes, and then it dies. There's always an opening into the formless, into the space, into the stillness, whatever you want to call it.

At the moment of dissolving, something dissolves. There's the, that is the pure, true now. And that is, I'm now using a word, so don't confuse the word with it, consciousness, pure consciousness.

Okay, now forget the word, because the word, if it's not used only as a temporary pointer, becomes a wall. It separates you from the reality. So always remembering, words are only pointers.

That's not it. So don't say, now I know what the now is. It's consciousness, and I know what I am.

I am the now, yes. But on what level do you know it? Knowing it means living it now, being the now, now, not just in the head.

Now, a very practical way of knowing that you are the unchanging space in which the world comes and goes, the things of the world come and go, an easy way, the most direct, the most practical way to know that reality in yourself, and this is the primordial spiritual practice, is, and it's so simple, not to oppose internally the content of now, not having an inner opposition, fighting, resisting, condemning, running away from what arises in the space of now.

Then you come to a new way of living, which is the content of now you become friendly with as your spiritual practice, and that's a very rare thing for most people because their habitual state is they are unfriendly with the present moment, sometimes to a small degree, sometimes to an enormous degree, they are unfriendly with the present moment, they are not in alignment with whatever fills the now at this moment, so to be aware of yourself as space, the deeper space, which is stillness, a deep sense of aliveness, stillness, something that you, when you have that, feel, sense that yourself as space, the world can't shake you anymore, it becomes only of relative significance, and conditions that arise are no longer able to determine your inner state, you are no longer at the mercy of external conditions, things that happen, situations, where you are, who you are with, what this person is doing or saying to you, and you are no longer at the mercy of inner conditions, which also change continuously your thought processes, most people are victims of their mind, conditioned by their past, by their culture, by their society, and all the stuff, all the unconsciousness and the madness of our society has gone in here and has conditioned the way in which your mind works, it's a dreadful fate, conditioned to be mad, now, because everybody else is mad, of course, you don't know it, and then you look to the mad world to give you some sense of recognition, I want to be somebody in this mad world, succeed, so true success is knowing yourself as, not as something, that's a temporary form, it's fine, but as space for something, I am not what happens, I am the space in which it happens, I am not my thoughts, I am the space in which the thoughts happen, so the quickest way to that realization is to come to an inner alignment with what happens inside or outside, not to deny it, run away from it, resist it, that's the primordial spiritual practice, and that's the only way in which you differ from the great spiritual master, there is no master as an identity, nobody can say, I have now achieved, I am now the master, the spiritual master, it's another delusion, because you have another form identity, master means the density of the form, or the form loses its density, then the unconditioned space, the formless life, the formless one life, the pure consciousness, whatever little pointer works best for you, that's why I give you several, the formless one life, the consciousness comes through the form, and how does the density of the person, the mind made, the mental and also emotional density, how does that become transparent to the, it becomes transparent through living in a state of, I reluctantly use that word, surrender, surrender, surrender to what is. At this moment, only this, only this moment, and let's say your outer circumstances are not the best at this moment, you've just been thrown out of your home, you lost your job, you have nothing in your, no money in your pocket, and there you are, what do you do now, how can you not dislike this moment, easy, you're breathing, and you look around, sky, bird, people, cars, feel the inner body, and you become, you say yes to this moment, not to a story that your mind is inventing about this moment, people confuse that here, when I say yes to what is, people think, okay, then I have to say, okay, I have to accept that I'm a homeless person now, that I have no prospects, that I've thrown away all that I had, or people have taken it away from me, blah, blah, blah, stories, no, that's just a story, I'm ruined, I'm ruined, I've no nothing, no, you're not ruined, you have 150 pence in your pocket, that's the reality, I'm ruined is the mental addition to the reality, which is a story, so what is your mental addition to the reality of now, and you'd be amazed what people add to the simplicity of now, the baggage they put onto the simplicity of now with their stories, which sometimes they've carried over from 10 years, 20 years, 30 years of stories, inflicted on the now, or whoever you're meeting in the now, or what is happening in the now, and people carry that baggage, and life gets heavier and heavier, no, what do you need a story for? Come to the simplicity of this moment, just this, and then it's fine, so we are stepping out of story by accepting the simplicity of this moment, and that means you become aligned with the power of life itself, which is not stupid, which is because it's intelligence itself, it's out of it, the entire universe comes out of it, and you're aligned with that, and then suddenly, even the external life flows with much greater ease, but that's not why you're doing it, it's not a means to an end, it's an end in itself, surrender to the present moment as it is. If it's unpleasant, you don't need stories, but there is such a thing as unpleasantness because you could be cold and hungry, I experienced a short time of not having a home and sitting around on park benches, fortunately, I was already comfortable with the present moment, so it was extremely enjoyable, something that other people might have said, it's a dreadful experience, so you have always the two levels in you, the level of the person who goes about its business, but it's very easy to get trapped in that dimension only, so you're going to an important meeting, let's say, okay, you've graduated from being homeless, now you've got a good job, you're going to an important meeting, traveling and talking to the lawyers about the contracts and this and that, there's a big project happening, it's all so important and you get so absorbed in it, everything becomes absolutely important, what is relative only becomes absolute, you get lost in the world, and very soon you're in a state of resistance because you need to get there, the contract hasn't been done yet and there's a time limit, don't you know you should get yourself together? These days, everything is deadline, there's never anything that people ask me to do that doesn't have a deadline, but it has to be done by Monday, tomorrow, next week, but it has to be ready by we have deadlines, most deadlines I don't meet, so people don't even expect deadlines to be met anymore, when they tell me we have a deadline, they already know, and I suspect now they give me false deadlines, if they need it in four months time, they say I need it in two weeks, so the world which is the human mind and the things of the world can absorb you totally, so is it possible for you to always come back into the other dimension and that is a beautiful practice, so you're sitting in the office, this person is talking, that person is talking, or you're driving somewhere, the important meeting, and there's a moment when you feel your inner body, there's a moment when you look up at his tree, there's a moment when you breathe, take one conscious breath, there's a moment when you step out of that stream of the world into now, and that becomes so enjoyable that more and more often, that dimension is there in your life, stepping out of the story, and there you are in the lawyer's office discussing divorce proceedings with your husband or wife, and you're looking out of the window, and see there's a beautiful tree, but you don't even call it a beautiful tree, you just see, and there's not only a tree, you can feel the very presence in which the tree arises, and the lawyer is talking about this or that, and you look, and then you look back to the lawyer and say, okay, do what you have to do, and then you look back at, take a conscious breath, you're continuously stepping out of the stream that wants to absorb your attention completely into the space of now, so you're bringing space into your life, you're bringing space into your life also by accepting, this is surrender, accepting what is brings space, because by saying yes to what arises in the present moment, you become the space for it, which you already are, but didn't know, couldn't feel it, couldn't know that you are the space for the world, by saying yes to the things that arise now, you become powerful, but not in the sense of ego power, not powerful over somebody or something else, but in the sense that the power of life itself is now able to fully flow through you, the power of consciousness itself, because we have two movements in this world, in a human being, one is the outgoing movement into form, that has its place in everybody, that's the outgoing movement that wants to strengthen and preserve the form of me, and there's nothing wrong with that, if you know also the other dimension, which goes the opposite way, it's the need to be connected to the formless vastness of being, that is also in you, that is essentially who you are, so there is this, every human life needs to be a balance between form and the depths of formlessness, otherwise the whole world is lost in form, so the dimension which is the sacred dimension, which is the spiritual dimension, whatever you want to call it, to a large extent in the world, modern culture is completely lacking, it's dreadfully unbalanced, dreadfully unhappy, dreadfully insane, and if humans do not encounter this within themselves now, then simply these forms will no longer be useful in the universe, or the human race would, as if it had never happened, and then the wind blows over the planet, and the animals are suddenly very happy, and all the plants give a sigh of relief, oh wow, what was that? Could happen, doesn't have to happen, but it could happen, at the moment the humans are so heavy and unenlightened, it's a dreadful burden on the planet, it's a dreadful, no, the planet is only just, the planet, of course, is an organism, but also is an expression of the one consciousness, it has its own consciousness, which is an expression of the one consciousness, so it's only beginning to realize now what the humans are doing, because the planet is a little bit slower, and on the planetary scale, the humans have only been here for a few minutes, so the planet is only just going, what is going on here?

Oh, what can I do to get rid of these? Maybe I'll raise the temperature, have a little fever, that's how the human body gets rid of bacteria, fever, that might work, or should I make them infertile? That would be the easiest.

Now, it's a new, when you become free of the illusion that the conditions of the world, whatever happens to you, that they are here to satisfy you, that things should always go the way you want them to go, the conditions are here to bring me fulfillment, that's a big delusion. Conditions are here to challenge you, to frustrate you, and to wake you up. So instead of seeking better and better conditions, you accept the condition of this moment, and paradoxically, that's when very quickly, even the outer conditions that are not all that important, improve, because power of life moves through you fully now.

So that's a practice, the practice of surrender, in which you become very effective, you don't become ineffective through surrender, which is a misconception. Surrender says, right, this is what is, and I might as well say yes to it. I'm verbalizing it, but true surrender, there's no words, it's just, you look at the what is, you perceive, you look, you become the presence, there's a consciousness, you're aware of yourself as consciousness, that's the little secret of self-realization, space, stillness, consciousness.

And you can feel, feel is not the right word, there is no right word, in the background of all that happens, you can feel yourself as the presence in which it happens. We could call that there is a stillness in the background. It's not the stillness of being dead, it's a vitally alive stillness.

Here things happen, and there's the, you're no longer reactive, responsive, if something needs to be done, yes, but not reactive. So the question is, can you, at this moment, be aware, not only of all the things that are taking place right here, externally and internally, but can you also be aware of yourself as the awareness? In which these things happen, which is not a thought, nothing to do with thinking.

It's a sensing of an aliveness in the background of things happening in the foreground. And when I say things happening, that includes thoughts, thinking. Thinking happens in the foreground.

But when you are aware of the background as your very own presence, I say your own because it is essentially who you are, it is being. It is the I am, which is timeless. The timeless sense of being in the background.

I am, being, I am and being are the same word. To be, I am. First person singular of the verb to be, I am.

It is being. Can you sense the very being that you are, and on that level, you are one with all beings. This is a level of non-differentiation.

And it is that level from where true love comes, true compassion comes, only when you can feel yourself as the underlying I am presence. Now, you can only do it now, because it is now. It is the now in essence.

So that's where freedom lies. Freedom from conditions. Conditions will carry on, coming and going, some good, some bad.

And that's also where creativity comes in, because through that, the very intelligence that is the I am may manifest through you. That's secondary, secondary thing. What it manifests, I don't know.

It varies from person to person. What does not vary from person to person is that which underlies the person. That is where the oneness is of all beings.

And from there, when you sense that, you can look at a forest and sense, if you go to an ancient forest and sense the sacredness of the forest in yourself, the very presence that you are, you feel is the very same beingness that is the life in the trees. You feel the life, the one life, because you are the one life. And in whatever manifestation you see the one life, it manifests in billions of forms.

In whatever manifestation you see the one life, you recognize it as yourself. And only then can you sense the essence of the forest or the essence of an animal or the essence of another human being. And only then is there true connection and more than connection, a realization of oneness.

And it's only then that humans are no longer compelled to fight each other continuously. That's the madness. If you are cut off from that, everything is alien to you.

Everything is other because you only have the form. So there can be no love, there can be no empathy, there's no compassion, no softness. And when you look at a forest, you say, how much does it cost?

If we cut all the trees, what will we get? You can't see anything else. Forgive them for they know not what they do.

They don't know who they are. That's why they don't know what they do. So that is the fundamental dysfunction in humans.

And it's fine. But that too is part of the evolution of human consciousness. The shift in consciousness that is happening is a movement from predominantly thinking human beings to predominantly aware human beings.

For several thousand years, humans have been completely identified with the movement of think, of thought. That's how the ego came into being. Alienation, separation, all illusions come into being.

Since it happened, it was a necessary stage in the evolution and we are coming to the end of that stage. Because thinking keeps you trapped in form because every thought is a thought form. And most human beings are compulsive thinkers because their sense of identity is derived from the movement of thought.

They cannot let go of thinking because to them it would be equivalent to dying. Who am I if I do not keep reminding myself of myself and my story? And my life, my life, it's my life.

That's a big, it's a huge illusion, just those two words. How can you, I have, do I have life? Then there's life and there's me.

If I have life, there's life and me and I could lose it and then all that's left is me. No, that can't be right. I have life, that's what people think, they have a life because it's an illusion created by thought.

They're separating themselves from life and saying this is life and that's me. I am life. There's no life apart from I.

So since I am life, how can I lose life? I am a temporary expression in this form, fleeting, of the one formless life. So thinking is compulsive for most humans and it is an addiction.

The great addiction, much greater than drugs, is the addiction to thinking. Most of which is not only unnecessary but represents an enormous burden and heaviness in your life. So all of you who are still here are ready to make that shift, which for most people is gradual, for very few it's sudden, the shift from continuously having to think to experiencing gaps in the stream of thinking.

And I'm not talking necessarily about when you're meditating. Meditation is wonderful for those who feel drawn to meditation. Not everybody may feel drawn to meditation.

Main spiritual practice is daily life, even for meditators. No matter how good you are at meditation, three hours a day, four hours a day, don't need to move. Even the Buddhist monks are impressed when you can sit for two hours as some Westerners have enormous willpower.

Of course, that's not true meditation, but true meditation is, of course, wonderful. But the main spiritual practice is daily life as you go about your daily life. And it is there where you experiment with meeting situations rather than through thinking, through awareness, which means there are periods in your life when you're doing things without the movement of thought that accompanies either commenting on what you're doing or experiencing or some completely different matter.

While you're doing this, you're thinking about that. There are moments when you can move across the room, go to the bathroom, open the door, go to the washbasin, wash your hands, dry your hands, and not a single thought has crossed your mind. But you were not lost.

You were present with every movement, but it happened in a field of stillness. And if that's too long, then less. Putting some honey in the tea, no thought.

And the spoon goes back in the saucer. Or you stir, and while you stir your tea, there's a clear space of awareness. Why do you have to fill that with some kind of thinking?

It's not profitable. It doesn't help you in any way. If there is something that you need to apply thought to, then you apply thought.

But there's a vast amount of things that actually you can tackle and be with much greater intelligence if you do not apply thought, but you apply awareness. Awareness means you look at a situation. There's a misconception about what intelligence is because we equate intelligence with the movement of thought and the ability to, through thought, dissect situations, analyze, label it, remember the labels, see how labels are related to other labels, and so on.

There is a deeper intelligence out of which all creativity comes, which is non-conceptual. And that, in our educational system, is completely unrecognized. There are many children at school who operate, who would operate wonderfully on the non-conceptual level, and they are called slow or even stupid because they do not have a highly developed conceptual intelligence.

They have a deeper intelligence. That is where creativity comes from. Albert Einstein, after graduating, was the only person in his class who couldn't get a job.

He was a bit slow. Of course, to be deep, you have to be slow. But in our civilization, everything is fine.

What's the answer to this? What's that? Quick, give me an answer.

So you remain on the surface. You dance around on the surface of life. You never go any...

To go deeper, you have to come still for a moment, and there's an awareness, and you look at a situation. And then, if something needs to be said or done, the words come, but they come from a deeper level. Every therapist who is effective, or anybody who works with people, you can only be effective if you come from awareness.

If you bring awareness, it is not through thought. It's miraculous, even the most conceptual schools of therapy, let's say you're a psychoanalyst. You learn a lot of stuff about the human mind, and you apply it.

And often, those psychoanalysts will become effective after 10 or 15 or 20 years. They suddenly get tired of applying their... Continuously applying what they have learned, and they're simply with the patient in a space of awareness.

So we, it is our practice, as much as possible, think when you have to think, and see if you can be free of thinking as much as possible in your daily life, which is in many, many situations. And of course, one thing that helps enormously in being free of thinking is to say yes to the present moment, because a lot of the compulsion to think arises out of the denial of what is. And so through thought, you want to destroy or run away from, you judge the present moment, you run to get away from it, you create fantasy world so that you get away from this, and so on.

So that's already a great help, as you, that primordial practice that I described, becoming one with what is, so that you are the space, and the space is thoughtless, the space is awareness. This is the rising level of consciousness in you. So you have, on the surface, the mind created me.

And then you have something coming up from underneath, pushing, which is awareness, the new consciousness wants to come through. Sometimes it comes through the gaps in the thinking stream. Ah, and suddenly you feel more alive.

There's a peace, but an alive peace, alert, unburdened by the little me and its problems. Don't carry that around anymore. So your practice, when you're on the bus, in the tube, walking from here to there, doing this or that, just aware, but not thinking.

And it doesn't matter how long, the length doesn't matter, the frequency is more important. How often you allow a gap in the stream of thinking, and the gap doesn't need to be long, just shh. And so you become, it's like the density of mind lessens, because gaps are appearing in the mind.

And so you become actually more intelligent. We can call it, it's a title by a book by Krishnamurti, the awakening of intelligence. And really that's what it is.

True intelligence comes in, which is not the ability to solve IQ tests. That is a small aspect of intelligence, but not intelligence itself. Now, there may be some of you who are very good at IQ tests and to feel offended right now.

And that's fine, because perhaps some of your identity was built on the fact that you have a very high IQ. If that's the case, and you feel some inner, ah, that can't be right, then you observe that. I don't have that problem, because I have never undergone an IQ test, but I am absolutely sure the result would not be very good.

My mind just doesn't work that way. Yesterday I picked up, where I'm staying, my friend's house, there's a book on Sudoku. I picked it up, I looked at the simplest one at the very beginning for five minutes, completely meaningless, can't do it.

And the most beautiful thing is if you can meet other human beings, whether it's a brief encounter or a longer encounter, or especially in your relationship, predominantly through being aware, rather than think, relate through awareness rather than thinking. What does that look like in practice? Somebody comes to you and says something.

While you listen, there is this space. You're listening, you're bringing space to it. You're not preparing what you're going to say or commenting on what the other person is saying, or thinking about something totally different, or trying to get out what you want to get out and say, but simply be there as awareness, a space of awareness.

And there's a clarity. And this is where a human relationship deepens. There's no depth in relationship that are completely mind dominated.

They're all thinking. And then it's so easy to get drawn into that, especially when more than two humans come together, the mind energy starts working and you get drawn. It's like a stream that carries you along.

And then he said to them, oh, I can't believe, you know what he did then? Can't get out of it anymore. It's for you to represent, be there, and bring a different dimension to human interaction.

And that dimension is not some new thought. Of course, it's better to have a good thought than a bad thought, but go deeper and have no thought. And so awareness replaces thinking.

And where you still need to think, actually your thinking will be much more focused and powerful because you're not wasting the mental abilities in useless thinking. Now can become focused. So that is the practice of being free of mental noise.

Be there, and when you're aware, you are not a person anymore. You're only a person when you're dominated by thought because the person consists of thought. When you're aware, you're there as not a person, but a deeper presence.

And this is what the world needs. It doesn't need more clever persons. It doesn't need for you to become more knowledgeable or even better as persons.

Many persons have very good intentions. They say, I want to become a better person. Of course, that's better than wanting to become a worse person, but it doesn't quite work.

Many people who are trying to be good people often do bad things and say, how could I have done that? I wanted to be a good person. And I shouted at him again.

So it's not improving the person that you are, but going beyond the person. That's where the goodness, true goodness comes through you. And then you become compassionate towards yourself also and towards the limitations of your little person.

It's never going, as a person, you're not going to be perfect. There will be shortcomings, this or that. That's fine.

This, it's form. You have your, but the non-personal dimension is coming in more and more into your life. Some people who practice certain arts or crafts can be in the space of awareness in the moment of creativity.

Sportsmen sometimes who are very good, they're not thinking while they're engaged in hitting this ball or that ball, whatever it is. There's absolute presence. The moment thought comes in, it's lost.

I remember hearing an interview with the actor who fell from his horse and broke his leg. He broke his back and he died two or three years ago. He played Superman and he fell from his horse.

And he was saying, I lost the present moment for a moment. Some thought came in and the horse reacted to the thought and it threw him. He had to, he was in complete oneness with the horse until a thought interfered and that created the accident.

So when you bring awareness to a situation, you and the situation become one. There is a, and it's almost as if the solution, if there is a problem that you encounter, which is not a problem, I would say, but a challenge. Problem is mind-made and needs time.

Challenge is something that's happening now and you need to do something. That's true. If there is a challenge, you look at the situation.

Now, the look means more than look visually. It means awareness is brought to it. And there's the total space of that situation where the solution emerges out of the totality of the situation.

And sometimes when you bring awareness to the situation, the solution may not even come through you because you have brought the awareness, suddenly the situation solves itself or it becomes solved by some external agency. Very often this happens. So problems become perpetuated if you meet them through mind and react through mind.

So the practice then is to be with situations people, and initially with very simple things so that you can practice, smell a flower and don't say, oh, that smells good. Say nothing, think nothing, just be with the perception, be the perceiving consciousness. Whenever you, if you use public transport, wonderful opportunity instead of putting something on your ears that feed the mind with boom, boom, boom, boom or even reading, why not practice being there as the conscious presence, look at people.

I love looking at people and seeing the many human forms, the multiplicity of the human form. I love sitting in public places or being on a bus or tube and watch the multiplicity of the human form without any thought, you don't need to think, just watch. And you actually become a blessing in that particular place, wherever you happen to be because something emanates from you that is of a very different frequency than what the mind generates.

And that emanates, it cannot not affect others even if you have no actual contact through words with others it affects the space that you are in. And that's also where true healing lies. You can, you heal the space that is around you but not by thinking I am healing you, it happens by itself.

So you become a benign presence in this world rather than a heavy person with big, heavy... Now, the compulsive mind has been dominating humans for thousands of years. It's not going to go away voluntarily.

It's not going to say, okay, I won't bother you anymore. It is an energy movement that wants to carry on because it has a certain momentum and it's the momentum of millennia of thousands of years at least six or 7,000 years that people differ in how they see it. Let's say it's been going for 6,000 or more years, that's long enough.

And so it has a momentum and it will overpower you that momentum and it's not a, that's fine, it's the human mind. You will lose yourself in it again and again and then you wake up out of it again and again and back you are lost in this stream of thinking. If nothing else this afternoon, for many of you, perhaps even without knowing it, as you sit here, you experience moments of no thought.

Just, oh. And so you can, you take that into your daily life. If it is arising in you, otherwise it would make no sense.

If you were totally identified with mind, you would get very angry saying that you don't have to think all the time. How dare, what a liberation! Something happened to me many years ago and that's unusual in the sense that it happened very suddenly, whereas for most people it is a gradual process of becoming free when the mind kind of subsided.

It created so much suffering and something happened, something snapped and then the mind just went, the compulsive mind. And I woke up the next morning and everything was alive and peaceful and beautiful, even the traffic. And I didn't know why.

How can everything be so peaceful when I've spent the last few years in agony and anxiety and depression and suddenly it's peaceful? What happened? I didn't know what happened.

All I knew was suddenly everything is very alive and peaceful and beautiful. I was on top of a bus traveling along Oxford Street, which I was living in London at the time, and all the thousands of people, shoppers, everything was peaceful. They always moved about in a field of peace.

Beautiful. The underground, beautiful. Northern line, which they used to call, they used to call the misery line.

I don't know if it still is. It was beautiful, peaceful, wonderful. Just enjoyed sitting in the tube.

Then a year later, I looked at some books and visited some teachers and say, what is it all about? And one monk said to me, a Buddhist monk, well, what it all comes down to is really not thinking, that's Zen. And suddenly I realized, that's what happened, I'm not thinking anymore.

The mind had stopped, I didn't even know that the mind had stopped. All I experienced was peace because it comes from the being that's underneath the mind. And so I suddenly understood, oh, it's the cessation of compulsive thinking.

Of course, I was still doing some thinking, but my thinking had become reduced by about 85%. So that enormous burden of mental noise had dropped away. And so I understood now what the nature of this transformation is, whereas at first I just underwent the transformation without understanding it.

And now, many humans are ready now for this shift. Otherwise there would be no point in sitting here. You would have to go to a monastery for 10, 20, 30 years.

And even then, there's no guarantee that you would get it. That was the traditional way. Humanity as a whole, the readiness wasn't such that so many humans could be open to this.

Without undergoing through arduous, no, sorry. If you've been engaged in arduous spiritual practice for the past 20 years, don't feel offended. I do not want to invalidate your spiritual practice.

It all served a purpose because you're here now. But there are many who have not gone through arduous spiritual practices and are ready for it. Oh, well, that's a pity.

Man says, why? All this work for nothing. Maybe that's what Jesus meant as a parable about the laborers and some laborers work all day.

And then some come in the last hour and they work just for one hour and they get the same wage. So many humans are now ready for this shift because humanity needs to go through this shift if it's not going to self-annihilate. Well, self-annihilation is fine on a psychological level because that's what we are doing.

The person begins to dissolve, but not on a physical level. Freedom from, freedom, liberation is a term that is traditionally used in many traditions. Freedom, liberation, freedom from what?

It's freedom from compulsive thinking, which implies freedom from time because it's only time as we experience it is generated by compulsive thinking. It's a mind-made thing. And freedom from the false sense of self is also implied in that because the false sense of me is mind-generated.

So it's freedom from mind, is freedom from time, is freedom from self. And self, the false self, is a dreadful, curse and burden on humanity to carry that weight around with you. Will it, so for a time now you are a transitional being, most of you, some of you have already gone, you're virtually there, with perhaps occasional incursions of the old consciousness.

But for many, you are a transitional being, which is a very strange thing to be between two levels of consciousness. This is the shift. One day you're in the old, the next day you're in the new, and you shift even on one day, even in one hour.

You're present with everything and suddenly something comes in, pulls you back into stream of thinking. Particularly challenges difficult humans coming into your life. And of course, let's face it, most humans are difficult in the unenlightened state.

They're very problematic. And sooner or later, when two humans come together, some conflict arises, which can only ultimately be resolved by the arising of awareness. Otherwise this conflict will grow and proliferate.

As you know, it was Ram Dass who said, if you think you're so enlightened, spend a week with your parents. But that of course is a big test for many people. But spend a week with anybody is a big enough test.

Spend three days with anybody. Somebody said to me the other day that they experienced the first three days when people come together on holiday or visiting others, the first three days are okay. But then after on the fourth day, something happens and the conflict arises.

And that conflict would proliferate unless awareness dissolves it again, it will proliferate. And many friendships have ended when people went together on holiday. And if any of you have lived in communes, communal living, then you know how difficult, how challenging that is.

It's a wonderful challenge if it's used rightly, but then you see how hard it is to live with humans in a space together. I lived in a community once or twice and it was already easy because I had already embraced surrender. But otherwise, if I hadn't, it would have been dreadful.

Some humans are very unpredictable. There's the mood swings that come through whether what kind of mind stream they happen to be occupied by, enormous. There were some people in the community, often I was sitting at breakfast and I could hear somebody coming down the stairs and you never knew who would be coming.

I knew who that person was, but what mood was in it could be an angelic mood or monstrous mood. You never knew who was going to come down the stairs on that particular day. And all that had to be received in the space of aware presence in which many dysfunctions actually dissolved, even in others.

So you dissolve conflict. You dissolve dissonance simply by, not by doing anything, never by feeling I am dissolving it, simply by being the presence, by being there as presence. When you watch the news, it's easy to be reactive.

Of course, when you see certain politicians on the screen, it's easy to go, oh, he is such an idiot, shocker, maybe so unconscious. But even there, you can just be there and see it and be there as, and perhaps this would even affect the world situation although you're only watching it on the screen. You cannot not affect others.

Your state of consciousness affects others. Whoever has even the slightest arising awareness will be helped by the awareness that arises through you. I don't call it your awareness.

It's, it is only, there's only one awareness. It arises through you. No thought.

So now this is not to be confused with falling below thought, which is one way of escaping the dilemma of the human mind. Drugs will do that for you. Some drugs, alcohol will do that for you.

Some entertainment will do it for you. Or if you're getting very tired, you fall below thought and you feel a bit better because you're not tortured by the mind. Oh, that feels good.

Oh, I feel a bit more alive now. And the next step is then unconsciousness. This is not the way we are going when I say go beyond thinking.

You can fall below thinking or you can rise above thinking. We are rising above thinking. And when you rise above thinking, there's an alertness and a presence compared to which thinking is a dream-like state.

Compulsive thinking is like a dream. This is why traditionally, many spiritual traditions use the term awakening. You awaken out of incessant compulsive thinking and a me created by thinking.

So we rise above thinking. It is sometimes the case that when you rise above thinking, you're there for a while. And suddenly there's a pull and you go straight through the level of thinking where the humans into below thinking.

And before they know it, they've fallen asleep. So you were above thinking and very quickly you go. And I've seen Buddhist monks, especially in the early morning meditation at 4.30, going like daily life is our practice. And it is possible that some questions may have arisen in some of you concerning the transformation. Now you're welcome to ask. There are microphones, but before you do, first of all, the essence does not lie in any answer to any question.

The essence is already here. So whether your question gets answered or not is secondary. There are different types of questions.

Some questions are helpful. They are alive. Other questions are simply produced by the human mind.

And if possible, ask questions that are alive rather than questions like, how does your teaching relate to the doctrine of this or that in the Buddhist school of this and that? Or what did you have for breakfast this morning? If it's a vital question, it's helpful to everybody.

That's always the case.

[Speaker 3] (2:04:54 - 2:05:16)

I'm interested in with children, when would you start talking about the power of now and how would you do that, especially if you feel that the child is very conceptual and perhaps not a future Einstein as you mentioned before?

Okay, thank you. Nowadays, many children, because of all the entertainment, the media, the video games, and so on, their mind gets stimulated into conceptual thinking at a very early age. And they lose touch with the depths of their being.

They're completely in the mind. And then they lose themselves in the screen. They play this game.

All the energy flows out, completely cut off from the rest of their body, cut off from nature, a dreadful thing for children not to be in contact with nature. If they have a dog, at least that's something. But to be totally devoid of contact with nature and live in an artificial man-made environment is dreadful for their development.

So the question is important. First of all, it's the essence in bringing children to this consciousness and they have it innately. It's still there in the child.

Even in a modern child, it's perhaps less covered up than in an adult. However, the main way to teach a child is the way in which you lead your life. It's how you bring awareness into situations when you talk to the child.

How do you listen to your child? First question. When the child speaks to you, are you there as a thinking entity, reactive thinking, or are you there as an aware presence that is simply complete?

Aware presence is open and you take in the words of the child. There comes the first teaching. You're not saying anything, but you're teaching by being present.

You teach by being aware. So how you act in the world at home, how you interact with your partner and with the child or the other children, that is an essential part of the teaching already before we even come to the point of what you can do actively to show your child. First, it's so when children, sometimes you'll hear little children cursing already.

Well, probably the parents do, and so they learn it. So the way you are at home is the main teaching that will already transmit itself. Then in addition to that, it's essential to bring the child to nature.

A very young child will be very inquisitive because the mind needs to absorb labels and concepts. That's a necessary stage. So there's a stage where the child asks, what's this?

What's that? What's that? That's a critical stage.

Yes, the child needs the label. That's such and such a bird, that's a tree, that's that, that's that. But the moment the child is given a label, the label has also become a barrier.

It's not when the child hears the name of the bird, somebody said it, I don't know, it might have been Krishnamurti. When you give the name of the bird to the child, the child will never see that bird again. That's putting it strongly in strong terms because it will now relate mainly to the bird through the label of whatever the bird is called or whatever it is.

So you have to be careful when you transmit language to the child, that the child does not become imprisoned in concepts and language. So one way of avoiding is, for example, it's a simple way of saying, I just, what's this? You say, you don't say, this is a bird.

You say, we call it bird. We call it an oak tree. And then instead of leaving it at that, you take the child attention directly to the thing and say, look at it, touch, look, see that?

And bring in spaces where the child is just looking and interacting without the concepts so that the child's mind does not become dominated by concepts. Keep the reality. Look, listen, there.

You bring, you point the child's attention away from the conceptual world so that the child stays in touch with the tangible, can still perceive directly instead of through concepts. So don't get trapped in concepts. Again, in some alternative schools, they are reluctant to teach a child to read and write too soon.

And I think they're very wise. Let the child experience first the world before you bring in all that. So that's one way of teaching the child.

And then come other ways of teaching. Bring the child's attention to breathing, bring in little gaps in the child's, simply by pointing out attention, be it, can you listen? Listen to the silence, listen to this pain body.

Most children also have pain bodies. And I recommend in a new hours, I talk about how to bring a child's attention to the child's emotional field so that the child isn't, so that an awareness grows of the emotional fluctuations in the child. So in case of the child's pain body, I recommend that you, after a pain body attack, you say to the child, yesterday when you had the temper tantrum, how did you feel then?

What was that? When it come, what does it feel like when it comes up? Does it have a color?

What would it look like? You find your own words. The essence, what I'm saying is, bring the child's awareness to it so that the child, there's a beginning awareness rather than an identification with it.

But always, whatever you do, your main teaching is yourself, not what you say or do to the child. If you embody awareness at home, the child will absorb that. Of course, you will have to counteract the enormous influence of the culture, a mad culture to a large extent, the school and so on and so on.

Also not realize the child has, don't react to whatever, whether the child is doing well at school or not is secondary. So you, some teachers are bringing it in. That's a good, but they are up against the educational establishment.

But some are bringing it in without making it an official part of the curriculum. They just bring in presence and they teach the children presence, to be present with their mind and so on. So don't let the children get lost in a world of concepts.

But first, of course, you will have to step out of the world of concepts yourself. The religion, everybody's religion. Thank you.

One, two, can you hear me? Yeah, I just wanted to ask, how do you deal with grief? I'm just going through, I lost my mother, not long ago, and it's very painful.

[Speaker 1] (2:14:04 - 2:14:04)

Yes.

[Speaker 2] (2:14:05 - 2:14:17)

Just wanted to know what is your, kind of, you know, what would be the way to deal with this loss?

[Speaker 6] (2:14:18 - 2:14:20)

Thank you. Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (2:14:35 - 2:22:54)

Acceptance can be at two levels. One is the acceptance of, let's say, of death of a loved one. But that's very hard for most people, to accept death immediately as it happens.

It's very hard. So if you cannot accept that somebody has just passed away, and it is a very strange thing, somebody that has been part of your life for 40, 50, a parent. Both my parents passed away last year.

My mother in August, and my father in November. It's strange, they didn't even live together. So I also became acquainted with that.

Grief arises as a natural thing, when somebody close to you passes away, and you meet grief with acceptance, rather than thinking, I must become free of grief, experience, and accept that this is what you feel. But if possible, don't let it go into your mind so much, but put attention on what you feel. If you need to weep, you weep.

So rather than trying to get away from it, you embrace the grief, but you don't feed it. So there's a difference between allowing it and embracing it, and feeding it with your mind. So the mind may have stories about the past that you spent with that person, or how unfair it is, and how dreadful it is, or that you are now alone, or whatever the mind creates.

And that would feed the grief. But if you can take, and of course it helps if you have practiced being in the body, you can easily take your attention into an emotion. And you are with that emotion, and whether it is grief, or whether it is some other emotion like fear, which is many people are familiar with, and some people, many are familiar with fear on a daily basis, almost everybody.

Rather than thinking, how can I become free of grief? How can I become free of fear? No, this is, fear is there.

Feel it, and allow it to be there, because it is what is at this moment. Through completely allowing it as it is, another dimension arises very slowly. And that's very hard to describe what that dimension is, but the word that I use is there's space around the grief.

When you allow the grief, suddenly you notice there's grief and there's a certain spaciousness there, which comes through saying yes to what is. And that spaciousness is the unconditioned that arises. And in that spaciousness, there is great peace also.

When my father and my mother passed away, both instances, I wept a few times briefly. Came, and of course, as you know, grief comes in waves. Sometimes you're free for a few hours and then another wave of grief comes, and then you have to allow that.

I had a few very short waves of grief and the rest was surrender. And when grief came, I surrendered to the grief. And when the very, in both cases, I saw the body left behind of my mother and later the body left behind by my father.

And again, a very deep meditation. There was grief, but there was peace around and underneath it. So it's quite possible to be in the state of grief.

And if you allow it to also feel some peace beyond it, you can be weeping and yet not be totally shaken by it and still feel some peace beyond if you completely accept the grief. And then after a while, the healing sets in and peace remains. There can be great, death is always a tremendous challenge, but it's a great opportunity, whether it's your own death or somebody else's death.

I love to contemplate death. A very enormous revelation of deep peace I felt there was a strange moment when my father's coffin was led, there were some men that had ropes around it and then they tried to lower it into the grave. And the last moment they dropped it a few inches and it suddenly made a thump.

Boom. That moment was, there was grief and peace simultaneously. It seemed to be that some seem to say that's how insignificant every life really is.

That's the, it was the last, that last noise was so, such an impact on me. It was just, that thump was embodied the whole of impermanence of everything. But it was more than an, it was, every cell of my body could feel that thump and there were tears and underneath the tears, there was deep peace.

Because when you truly accept the fleetingness of every form, because we are all here for just a little while in this form, if you truly accept the fleetingness of form, there's always deep peace behind it. It takes you into a very deep peace. I love, for example, looking at old photos or very old films.

And then I often say, look at that. For example, a scene of people, a street scene in London in 1910 or whatever. I said, look at that.

They're all dead now. Or you watch a film and they all look so alive. And you look at each one of these actors, they're all dissolved.

They're all dissolved into nothingness. And in a few years, all of us here, we could take a photo now and in 60, 70 years, almost everybody will be gone. Well, I'll give you a bit more, 80 years.

And in many cases, probably sooner. If we took a photo and then somebody finds the photo in an antiquarian bookseller and says, oh, look at all these people. They're all dead now.

And there is when you also have to remember that soon you'll be dead too. So it's not that tragic because we're all following very soon.

You observed in nature that after a stressful event, ducks vigorously flap their wings a few times in order to raise surplus energy, thus preventing it from becoming trapped in their body and turning into negativity. How should we flap our wings? For example, after a car accident.

Okay, thank you. After a traumatic event, such as a car accident, some of the trauma may be contained in your body as a contraction. Sit down quietly and bring attention to it.

Feel the contraction, feel the contracted energy that is there in the body. And again, the key is always not wanting to get rid of it, but bring a yes to it, bring a yes to whatever it is that you're experiencing at this moment. That initiates the healing process.

So for humans who don't have wings to flap anymore, the key to dissolving stuck energy in the body, no matter what caused it, is to bring attention to it and allow it to be there. And through allowing, the space is there around it. It is the space that heals it and dissolves it.

So rather than you trying to heal it or dissolve it, bring the attitude of allowing it to that moment and allow the space to do the rest within you. So that applies also after you've had a fight, not necessarily a physical fight with your partner or conflict situation with another human being. After the event, you may still feel the energy of it inside your body.

And the key is to actually feel it. Rather, otherwise, if you don't feel it, conscious, bring conscious attention to it, the energy will use your mind. So the energy movement, which is the emotional energy of the interaction, is still present in you and it will rise into your thought processes and it will, the inner voice that is the thinker will be the voice of that emotion that's left over from the fight.

So the emotion will use your mind to keep itself going when you're not attentive. But if you bring attention to it directly, it cannot use your mind to keep itself going. Now the ducks, of course, are very lucky because they don't have a mind that keeps the energy of the fight going.

So all you have to do is flap their wings and then they don't remember the fight. Certainly not as a self-reference, like he did something to me. I won't forget that, what he did to me.

I'm never going to trust him again or whatever it is. But these are the human stories. So for ducks, it's easy.

For humans, they need to bring awareness, bring awareness to it, which is allowing this energy to be there. Feel it, but don't, if you feel it, you don't need to think it. Think about it, feel it.

And through that, it will gradually dissolve. Whatever you bring awareness to will dissolve in the awareness. Awareness is another word for which is presence.

As you know, I've wrote about it somewhere. I said, it is like a fire that consumes everything. So you bring your suffering into the space of awareness rather than thinking I shouldn't be suffering.

That creates a lot of suffering. If you think I shouldn't be suffering. But if you accept that this is what I feel at this moment, and bring awareness to it, something happens.

Acceptance is part of awareness. You cannot bring awareness if you don't accept it. There's a book called, it may be, I don't know whether it's a book called The Road Less Traveled.

I think that's the title, The Road Less Traveled. Now that book has a first sentence that is maybe the best in any book. And if you understand that sentence, you don't need to read the rest.

The first sentence says, life is difficult. And then it explains, but if you accept the fact that life is difficult, it's no longer difficult. It's not literal, but this is basically the essence of what it says.

But if you believe life should not be difficult, there should not be any problems. I should not have to suffer. Then you suffer a lot and it gets very difficult.

But if you accept, yes, life is difficult. There is suffering that arises from time to time. This is the human condition.

You accept. The transformation comes through acceptance. I never read that book.

I read the first two lines and I said, that's it. That's it. Thank you.

A little reminder now. You're not a person, but this is not something that you should believe in. But realize for yourself that apart from being a person, there's a deeper level to who you are, and that is consciousness or awareness.

Yes. So don't return to being a little person because every person is a little person. Even the big VIPs are little persons.

Use that, play with being a person, but don't get absorbed into being a person. Realize in your daily life that the essence of who you are is not in form, not the body that dissolves quickly, not the psychological form of me, not where you come from, your past history, or where you're hoping to go as a little me, which is only the grave, ultimately. Although the little me tries to know.

Mm-hmm. More and more, be open to the arising awareness so that the person loses its density. And if you are still sitting here, obviously it's already happening in you, whether the mind says otherwise, it doesn't matter, because the mind cannot recognize transformation.

The mind might say, nothing is happening to me, and yet it is happening. The mind cannot recognize presence. The mind, how can the mind recognize, and it's not, presence is not memorable because presence is presence.

So you can't say, I was present once. Presence, you can't remember presence as such because it's not content, it's space. So it's not memorable.

The mind relies on memory. It can remember something bad that happens much more easily. And it loves doing that because it builds its identity around it to a great part.

So it is already arising, and in humanity as a whole, and those humans who are not open to it, who do not have the transparency, unfortunately, will encounter more intense suffering. That's just how it is. Because, simply because the evolutionary movement is blocked in them.

So you can help them, not by saying, I can help you, but by being aware. The more aware you are, the more it will, whoever has the slightest opening will be affected by it, and not including people you don't even meet. And other times you will meet people, and if there's a slight opening, something will be mentioned, maybe just a word, and then you will say something, and they will say, what do you mean by that?

And you will see suddenly their eyes open, and they want to, what do you mean by that? And you say a few more words, and suddenly say, wow, yes. Whatever you might be saying.

Being in the body, being present, being aware, there's only this moment, oh, if they're right. So you become, whether you want to or not, a teacher, but that doesn't become your identity anymore, just as I don't have an identity as a spiritual teacher, because whenever you have a, we rely on a form identity, sooner or later you suffer. So spiritual teacher, yes, teaching will come through you, through energy and through words, it's inevitable.

But that doesn't mean that you now have a new identity, and you see yourself as a teacher, just as I'm not, the moment I walk away from here, this is a teaching situation, but the moment I walk away from here, there's no longer, there is no teacher. There's no longer, there is no teacher.

2015 Eckhart Tolle Be Still and Know That I AM

On my way here, I was sitting in this room, in another part of the building, and I walked past this sign on the wall that said, The Kingdom of God is now or never. So we are here spending an afternoon together, which implies time, spending time together, to go into that which is beyond time, the Kingdom of God. Now, there's always a paradox that comes when you speak of the timeless, the timeless eternal present, the timeless dimension of consciousness, where you know your own essence as timeless.

And yet, out in this world, undoubtedly, time continues. So we are spending time to go into the timeless, already a paradox. The event itself, sitting here this afternoon, as an experience, an experience being here this afternoon, also passes fairly quickly.

It was a future event for a while, for you. In other words, it only existed as a thought form, which is all that future is. There is no future except as a thought form.

And now, it's here. But since time could be compared to an express train in which you are sitting, and it's traveling, and it doesn't stop, you can't get off. This experience also, of course, is fleeting.

It passes before you know it. Now it's now. It fills your perception.

It fills the space of now. It fills your awareness, your space of awareness. And then, before you know it, it's gone.

Or let's say, where does it move? Past, future, okay. It was future.

It's now. And before you know it, it's over. And the experience itself then only exists as another thought form.

It was. It's now past. And so, it's amazing how fleeting all experiences are in one's life.

And the older you get, the more you realize that truth. So much so, that some old people say, was that it? My father said a few years ago, ten years ago, I believe, he said it, he was 75.

He said, I feel my life hasn't quite started yet. And once something has happened, receded into the past, only exists as a thought form, or as a photo album, or as a video disc, which also gets old, just lasts a little bit longer, and eventually the photo fades. It's almost like a dream.

One's entire past has a dreamlike quality. Did that happen, or did I dream all that? My childhood, even yesterday.

And it doesn't stop. Further experiences come, and go. As one poet put it, to use another analogy, it seems that time is like a fire, and we are being burned in it.

Which is a good analogy. And not only, of course, the physical body will end up as ashes, which is what fire does, it burns things up and they become ash. The entire physical universe, this room, if you could see a speeded up version of the future of this room, being condensed into one minute, let's say 5,000 years, which isn't very much on a cosmic or even planetary scale, being condensed into one minute, you would see everything crumbling, ordinary things first.

It would be an amazing thing to watch all the seemingly solid structures around you within one minute would go, dust, and then a gust of wind. Did it ever happen? And so in this unstable universe, that sometimes looks solid and stable, some of the human-made structures, they look solid and stable, but we see how quickly, either through time or some other event, a seemingly solid structure collapses and becomes dust.

And so here we are as human beings, sometimes living in the illusion of solidity, not only the solidity of the external structures, also the illusion, ultimately, of a solidity of me, one's sense of self as having some ultimate reality. And yet it's also just forms, thought forms, that have a limited lifespan. And we talked about this last night, here we come again to time, we talked about not knowing yourself beyond thought forms, which is how the external world, certain things are selected from external forms.

Particularly, they become absorbed, cling to the name of me, my name, experiences, possessions, status, other people's opinions of me. All these are important thought forms that are accumulated in the mind, and a very thin skin is around them, which is my name, to hold them together as me, myself. The skin is a little bit like a soap bubble, skin, myself, into the thought form of self, which is my name, I collect things with which I identify.

From the simplest thing, as I pointed out last night, the child saying, my toy, not the toy being important as a material object, but the toy being important as a thought form that is invested with a sense of self. That is why the toy to the child becomes so important, because the child is entering the stage of limitation and delusion, it has to go through that, where an ultimately fictitious and illusory sense of self begins to grow. So the child has to say, at least still has to at where we are in this cycle, at this present stage of human evolution, the child has to go through that stage and say, mine, which means this thought form is the arising self, because the child already knows his name or her name, and then, my toy, one of the first thought forms that are collected in that receptacle of name.

And then we go on, further and further things are being collected, some knowledge, what other people tell the child, who he or she is, and very often this isn't by choice, so many things become collected, accumulate as mental content of self, many things accumulate there that were not chosen, one could say the toy is chosen by the child, the child chooses to identify with that thought form, just as the adult chooses to identify with the BMW, which is the toy of the adult, which becomes the thought form of my car, my sense of self has expanded temporarily into the thought form of car, for a while it fulfills oneself, just as the child feels fulfilled when it can say, this is mine, the self has grown a little, the mind made identity. So, some of these things are simply imposed upon you, your parents, what your parents tell you about yourself, what school tells you about who you are, the surrounding culture tells you about who you are, opinions and viewpoints of you, they get absorbed and they cling to the name, the thought form of name, or they are contained in the soap bubble, whatever image you want to use, of name.

So, if your parents tell you, you are stupid, which some parents tell their children, usually stupid parents tell their children, you are stupid. Parents who cannot see that such and such will sometimes drop things, things go wrong, it cannot manipulate the external world as well as an adult, but an adult of little intelligence then will interpret that as stupid. And so that child is told for the first eight years, ten years of his or her life, can't do, stupid, not good enough.

That becomes a thought form that is involuntary and it gets lodged in the mind and that can, if that never is made conscious, because many of the thought forms you identify with unconsciously, you just think them without knowing that they are thought forms, they are taken to be reality and your sense of self is entirely in those thoughts. So it could be that you live with involuntary things that have accumulated as content in your mind, as self, for the rest of your life. So the conditioning happens, the conditioning of that sense of self, especially in early years, and then finally we have an adult, behaves like an adult with a certain importance, which basically is also a role.

The teenager gradually learns to play the role of an adult, which is also a thought form, and then there are different types of adults according to their function in society. So then the role becomes important, that is, me. And so finally we have a ready-made conditioned entity moving through this world, trying to complete its unsatisfactory sense of self.

Not yet enough. My me is not complete yet. I'm seeking to complete myself by looking for more of whatever to add to me.

And this is why time becomes very important, the movement into future, because it's only through future that I can get the more that I need to complete my sense of self. More mental accumulations, material accumulations perhaps in the external, but it is not that, it's the thought form that matters. And it never fulfills you for long.

Dissatisfaction, sooner or later, usually sooner, returns. The sense of incompleteness comes back, the sense of lack, the sense of fear. And you need more.

So that's what you're condemned to when you are totally identified with the content of your mind which is conditioned and with the emotions that accompany the content of your mind, the thought movements. So we looked at that last night. And although now something is emerging in human beings that is, one could describe as a new state of consciousness, an unconditioned consciousness, most humans are still condemned to complete identification with thought, with the content of their mind.

And we are here this afternoon not to add more to the accumulations that are already there, not more knowledge, not more experiences, not more beliefs, satisfying as they might be for the sense of self, if I could tell you just a new fascinating belief, and if you believe this, then you will be fine. Just believe this. What does that mean, believe this?

It means cling to this thought form and let it complete your sense of self. Derive your sense of self from identification with this thought form. And for a while it's satisfying.

It's especially satisfying because now while you totally cling to this thought form, a new belief, I've just been converted to ism, this ism or that ism, and for that moment, for a while it's very satisfying, particularly because it puts you in a position of being right. And the rest of the world who don't share your belief, hopefully there are many who don't share it because that will strengthen your sense of separateness of me. Oh great, I know the truth and you don't.

So you don't get that here either. So we are here not to add more, so on that level it is not satisfying to be sitting here the whole afternoon because nothing is being given. Not even stimulating to the mind.

Not even interesting with the mind. You say, isn't that interesting? He really gave us food for thought.

Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha. So we are here to step out of, quite simply, identification with the content of the mind, to step out of the thought stream and reactive patterns that are part of that conditioning of the self, the mind-made self, and also the emotions that accompany the mind-made self, the thought movements of the mind-made self. We see it, and then even to see it is the first, you're taking one step out.

Most humans are still totally identified with the movement of thought and the reactive patterns that are part of the conditioned sense of me. And here, suddenly, you see it. So the moment you see that movement, you have one foot out.

It's still happening, but the seeing is the arising of a deeper dimension of consciousness. Sometimes in Buddhism they may call it the witness or the witnessing presence, where you can see a pattern in yourself, a mind pattern or an emotional pattern, which means your sense of self suddenly is no longer in it. You are not identified.

Identify means, comes from Latin, idem ficara. Ficara is to make. Idem is the same.

To make the same as I. So a thought becomes as if it were I, as if there were I in it, a self. So when you see it, there's the beginning of freedom.

When you see how usually one is totally identified, not just with the mental image of me, but the compulsive thought activity that goes with deriving one's sense of self from mental content. And because there's a sense of self in mind, in thought, thought has become compulsive. And the movement of thought, the stream of thinking, for most humans, hardly ever stops.

And a lot of the thinking, of course, is about me and my problems and my future. Problematic. My past.

Unsatisfying. Hasn't really fulfilled me. And so the compulsive mind movements that most people are trapped in all day long, which even psychologists who had no interest in anything spiritual, they observed the mind movements, the thought movements of normal human beings, and realized that 99% of the thoughts that go through a person's mind every day are repetitious.

They are the same thoughts that went through their minds yesterday and last year, and in many cases 20 years ago. Although sometimes certain changes can happen. Nothing fundamental.

And you know how futile thought movements can be when there's nothing you can do. And you would be so much better off if you could just be fully here without being compelled to have your attention in the mind stream. So we are here to step out of that.

And what I am suggesting to you, this is just a way of approaching it. And if it were not happening to you already, you wouldn't even be here. So it's not that you need to make it happen or I need to make it happen to you.

That would be frustrating. And it would be stressful for me too. Are they going to get it?

So what I am suggesting, and it only works because it's happening anyway, so my function here is the midwife to facilitate the birthing process, but it's the babies coming anyway. Babies came long before midwives ever existed, although that may be the earliest profession perhaps, midwife, contrary to what some people say. The earliest profession is probably to help in the birthing process, but even before there was anybody around, babies were coming.

So it's happening anyway. It's just to speed it up. One could say the planet is running out of time.

One could say humanity is running out of time, really. If the current dysfunction in the collective mind continues and we have another 20th century or worse, and it would be worse if there's no inner change, for another 100 years it would probably be the end of the planet, perhaps of humanity. So we are running out of time for the first time in the history of time.

On this planet, humanity, we are running out of time. And this is not bad news, but good news. It is good news for the individual human also.

I have met people who have come to listen to teachings who in their personal lives told me, I am running out of time. The doctor has given me six months. What now?

Some of the New Age teaching, beautiful as they may be, don't apply to me anymore, they say, because they say you can make it. And I'm sure six months isn't enough to complete me, not on that level. And so some teachers say, whatever you want to achieve, you can.

This is true on its own level, but when you're running out of time, there isn't time anymore for that. So there's something more fundamental. And whenever a human being runs out of time, that is the greatest opportunity opening up, because that human being is running out of future, which is the escape for the mind-made self.

This is where it perpetuates itself through continuous focus on future. The needing it and the fearing it and moving between the two, that's how the self perpetuates itself. And all it does, it brings the past, obscures the present, so the past is more of the same in future.

And so if a human being runs out of time, it's the most wonderful thing that can happen. From the point of view of the mind-made self, it is the most dreadful thing that could happen to me. Of course, the truth is, everybody is running out of time.

On a personal level, it doesn't really matter whether you have six months or one year, or 40 years or 50 years, it's not that much. And it's fleeting, it goes, as you're sitting on this express train of time. Was that it?

Yes, it's time to get off. The train stops for one moment, and then you get off, that's it. That was your life.

And maybe then you bought another train, who knows? We'll go through it again. I haven't arrived yet.

So, collectively running out of time, this is why there is an acceleration now in so many humans want to be free, are ready to go beyond the conditioning of thousands and thousands and thousands of years of collective conditioning, which is increasingly becoming more and more dysfunction in this world, because we're getting to the end of an evolutionary cycle. The closer you get to the end, the more dysfunctional it appears to be. And this is how it has to be, it's beautiful.

Ultimately, even the madness of human history, 20th century, ultimately, that's all how it happens. Within the totality, that also makes sense. But it also makes sense to see it now for us as madness and dysfunction.

That's part of the waking up, to recognize that. So, here's the midwife, helping just to speed up the birth process of a deeper dimension of consciousness that is emerging, that has nothing to do with your past, that has nothing to do with your life situation, whether it's good or bad at this moment. They vary a lot.

And that's allowing that to emerge, what I sometimes call the unconditioned consciousness. I may give you some more pointers. So, how?

I may suggest to you just a few helpful approaches, what I call portals, ways in which you can allow that which wants to emerge, to emerge, instead of resisting it. So, this one could call portals into the state of presence. A portal is an opening, it's a doorway.

It opens up. A portal into the state of presence, one could say, or you could say it is a portal through which presence comes, emerges. Now, some portals appear in everybody's life, and they can be called involuntary portals.

For example, great loss. The opposite of what the self wanted, which is more, happens to you, which is less. So life, an involuntary portal, happens to you, and it happens to every human being.

Usually it's not recognized as a portal, because it's only a potential portal. When you don't recognize it, it may not be able to fulfill its function. You run away from it into more future.

But any loss, especially significant loss in your life, is an involuntary portal into the state of presence, the unconditioned consciousness. So, this isn't something that we need to explore here, but because that simply happens. Life does that to you.

You can't make that happen. Life, sooner or later, will remove things from you. The movement of the self was in the opposite direction.

Accumulate more to be more of me. And then at some point, life comes in, and it tears something out of an external thing, disappears from your life that you had identified with as me. The thought form suddenly has no foundation anymore.

The building has collapsed. The company that I spent 30 years building up has gone bankrupt. 30 years of effort, of making myself and my family and 2,000 other people unhappy, of trying to make it, and it's all been in vain.

It's a little example. That means the thought form of me having achieved this great thing and built up this company, and a very temporarily satisfying thought form, suddenly has no foundation anymore because the external structures have collapsed. And the thought form then begins to shake.

Of course, it cannot sustain itself unless you become insane and say, no, it never happened. I still have it. This happens too.

It's total denial. And then you can keep the thought form that I am still important, but usually when the external foundation of a thought form has been removed, the thought form itself becomes shaky and then also crumbles. And that leads to great unhappiness in the human being because the very foundation of oneself has become threatened.

And this is the most dreadful thing. It happens to humans, and it is not usually recognized as a potential for something else, but occasionally it works. And then a person may experience great loss in his or her life and is so stunned.

And it sometimes happens when there's loss not of one thing but several things all at once. That means every time something is removed from you and a thought form collapses that was linked to that, an opening happens in the stream of mind. An opening happens because a form has dissolved.

First an external form and then the corresponding thought form. A sense of self was lodged in that thought form, and now it's gone. This is called death.

It is the experience of death on one level or another that is very painful from one side. The death is, oh! And so the temptation not to face that is very great, to run away into future and say, I'm going to build up another company.

I'll spend another 30 years. I'm going to show them that I can make it. And perhaps you can.

And then eventually the same thing happens. If the company doesn't collapse, you collapse. This is the most fundamental law of the physical universe, that the structures are unstable.

And it shocks humans every time. That is not supposed to happen. They are supposed to be stable.

I was walking, I saw this wonderful, I was going for a walk near Los Angeles, but outside in a park, a wild nature reserve, and there was a collapsed building that had burned down 40 years ago, and the roof was gone, and trees were growing inside the building, and beautiful, wonderful to see how, how form is returning to the formless. They left it there, and there was a waterfall nearby. But as you entered that space, the city council had put up a sign, which to me was a sacred sutra, but they probably didn't regard it as a sacred sutra.

The sign said, Danger, all structures are unstable. So that was a holy sign. Thank you.

So sooner or later that comes, and so the instability of that, comes into your life as an involuntary opening of a thought form that was invested with self dissolving. And sometimes it happens if you don't run away from it, you're so stunned that you can't even run away from it. That may happen if several things are lost at once.

And now a strange thing happens. There was a thought form, and the form dissolved, and when a form dissolves, something that is formless shines through the opening. I call that, although we must be careful not to mistake the labels for it, the label is only a little pointer, the unconditioned, pure consciousness, the light, metaphorically speaking, pure, unconditioned consciousness shines through.

Whenever there is an opening left by a great loss or death, form has dissolved in your life. And it's not resisted or denied or run away from. At first you shake, and then suddenly as you're not running away from it, you face what is, and people have reported that in the face of great disaster and tragedy, which they didn't run away from, suddenly an enormous influx of deep peace, aliveness, and joy.

And they couldn't understand it. And it changed them forever. And some people have glimpses of it, even through minor loss it can happen, that you get a glimpse of that when it's not resisted.

So this is important to know. Although we cannot bring that about here, nor do we need to, it's life's job to do that to you. And by the grace of the one God, life, the one intelligence, it'll happen.

And in many of you, it's already happened. And perhaps for quite a few of you, that was how the inner transformation began, through that opening of great loss. And that is the only reason why you are here now.

If that had not happened, you would be watching TV now, being happy in the ordinary state of unhappiness, asleep. So one could say it's the great awakener to go through loss. It is a potential opening if you don't run away from it.

But, so this is good to know. So what is usually condemned as bad by the mind, and the mind made self, is actually grace coming into your life. And sometimes grace is fierce.

There's a film that was recently made about the life of Ram Dass, the spiritual teacher, American born, who suffered a stroke and is in a wheelchair now. And the film about his life is called Fierce Grace, because he recognized that the stroke that he suffered, that made it difficult for him to speak, he can't move anymore except in a wheelchair, he recognized that that also was an act of grace. It was a loss, it was a form of death, it was an opening.

But here, we invite the opt to do it to you, instead of waiting for life to do it to you, which happens, but also there's never a guarantee that you'll recognize it as an opening, so let's not wait. Instead of that, we voluntarily invite the opening into our lives, and so portals into the state of presence. This is a way of looking at it.

All portals will take you, of course, deep into now. No matter where you go, you will end up in the now. You move very deeply into this.

One portal I pointed to last night, and it's very powerful, I would call it the primordial spiritual practice, the most effective, the core of all spiritual practices, almost, and that is the portal of bringing a yes into now, which means allowing this moment to be as it is. This is a voluntary portal opening up into the transformed state of consciousness. The mind-made self, its continued dominance depends on resistance, depends on reactivity, depends on not allowing what is to be, because what is is not completing me.

This isn't what I want. It shouldn't even be here. I need the future.

Get this moment out of the way. It's an obstacle to me. I need to get past this moment somehow.

This is how most people live. The now is an obstacle to finding me. It puts these obstacles in my path.

How dare you, God, put these obstacles in my path? And so you recognize that that is a deeply conditioned mind movement and reactive pattern. And so you see how you miss life itself by denying or devaluing now, how conventionally, habitually, in the old conditioned mindset, you make the now, the only thing there ever is, into a means to an end.

The end is, I need to get there. It's the future moment. The now is the means.

That's the only value it has for me, says the self. This moment enables me to get to that moment, and I'm on my way there. And the unconscious belief, it's rarely made conscious, is always that the next moment is superior, of greater value, more important than this one.

I'm just on my way there. Now, and then if you look more deeply into what that means, what I've done, I've used a thought form, which is future. Future only is a thought form.

It never can be experienced, or you can't meet it. You've never encountered it. You're making a thought into something of greater value than the reality of this moment.

So this is the essence of being totally absorbed in thought with your sense of self. So that's how humans live. And everybody's doing it, so it's unconscious.

It's never questioned. Always looking for the next thing you must get. And very rarely a sense of ease, of being here fully, honoring what is.

It's never quite right, or very rarely, not never right for long, and then the moment again is dissatisfying. So the possibility arises only because the unconditioned consciousness is arising from within you anyway. Now you're able to, one could say, speed it up by inviting it, allowing this moment to be as it is.

And also, of course, you do it because you recognize, I mentioned it briefly last night, that it could not be otherwise. Because there are no separate events. Every so-called separate event is totally connected with the totality of the cosmos.

Nothing is a separate event. So what happens in this now is as it is because the entire universe has brought this about. And there's a little me that argues with it and says, this shouldn't, that's all wrong.

So you align yourself with is. This you recognize is as inevitable. It already is.

So there's the inner state of yes. It's a beautiful state when the now is no longer an enemy. Yes, okay, you're the now, you're my friend.

You're the is-ness of this moment. And so I welcome that, no matter what form this moment takes. The form changes anyway, quickly.

And the mind, of course, would judge this moment. Good, bad, not enough, shouldn't. And a strange thing happens.

When you are against what is, the fictitious sense of self gets strengthened, the me in the head. Because you have made the now into an enemy, and the self thrives on enemies. The arch enemy of the mind made self is the present moment.

It's very uneasy with it. And most of the time it's against it somehow. And that strengthens the me, the boundary between me and that.

And if I can complain about is in my head, through the inner thought process of the monologues or dialogues, that's wonderful. It loves complaining about what is, and how it should be. Because by complaining it puts itself in a position of rightness.

I am right, and this situation is all wrong. So there is a secret search to be superior to the situation by complaining about it. And you can see it in extreme forms how humans, some humans are very deeply immersed in that form of conditioning.

They won't stop complaining. And always the universe or something or somebody is doing something to them, and the present moment is always interfering through people and situations. They're all out to get me.

And so you see it. And then you see the madness of it. And also you see it's not personal.

Madness is not personal. Dysfunction isn't personal. Nor is it ultimately to do with the content of your life.

Unhappiness. Non-satisfaction is ultimately not to do with the content of your life, something that's lacking in the content of your life, or something that you don't want but is there in your life situation. The unhappiness, the heaviness of most human lives, human existences, is not ultimately based on the content, but is structural.

It's the structure of the conditioned mind. And built into the structure of it is the denial of now. Because it's continued existence depends on that.

Resistance and denial. So possibility arises for you to live in such a way that you welcome what is. And thus going beyond being a merely reactive little entity, a little me that is continuously saying, you know, and something opens up that is deeper than form.

Because you're not reacting to the form that this moment takes. That would strengthen the reaction, strengthens your own form identity, which is the mind made self. It strengthens itself by reacting against other forms.

So the form of me gets stronger through the reaction. When that is relinquished and you allow, the form identity is no longer strengthened. And something arises from, one could say, deep within you that is beyond the form of who you are, which is thought forms, emotional forms, the unconditioned consciousness.

And that is encountered as a certain stillness that is suddenly there. At first perhaps in the background. And a certain field of spaciousness or peace that one could say is there around the form of now.

There is the form of now which may be turbulent. Something is happening, a lot of noise is going on, whatever it is that the form is. And you allow it.

And suddenly around the event, and I'm only speaking metaphorically because you can't really speak about it. Around the form of now there is a space, a spaciousness, when you allow what is. There is suddenly a depth in which this event happens.

That depth or that space in which this event happens is that in you that is unconditioned, the essence. One could say pure consciousness, that's only a word, whereas everything else, including the entire universe, is the conditioned consciousness. The conditioned consciousness is there as the human mind, as thought forms.

Consciousness is born into a form, a thought. That's the deeper meaning of rebirth, is consciousness takes on form, temporary. And the form might claim, me, me, that's me.

And so further rebirth is sought when, to complete me, I want to be born into other forms, identify with as me, thought forms. And this comes to an end when you allow the form of now, then you become conscious of the essence of now, which is space, which is stillness, which is intense aliveness, which is emptiness, as the Buddhists call it, but no word can contain it. It's also fullness of life.

Not fullness of life in its manifested forms, the fullness of life itself, because before life is born into this or that, there is already the fullness of life as yourself. That's what Jesus talks about when he said, I want you to have life and I want you to have it more abundantly. In other translations he says, I want you to have life, I want you to have the fullness of life, more abundant life, he said.

And of course he was not talking about the abundance of things. He didn't teach that if you work hard enough you can buy lots of things, and then you will have great abundance. That wasn't the teaching.

So when he talks about abundant life, he is not talking about things, life as life forms. He is not predicting the arrival of shopping malls and saying the kingdom of heaven will have arrived when every city has huge shopping malls, and you will live in great abundance. No, he points to something else that is not to do with the forms of life, but life, the essence of life, being itself.

And to know the fullness that is already there is liberation from seeking yourself in the forms of life. Knowing yourself to be beyond particular forms. And the mind says, yeah, but I can't quite work out how I can know myself like that.

Of course you can't work out, because the mind is thought. Thought is attempting to understand the formless, and it cannot. It simply is there with allowing what is to be.

Peace comes, stillness comes. When you allow what is to be, the compulsion to think continuously subsides. And a gap arises in the thought stream.

Or the thought stream loses some of its density, and something shines through that is stillness or peace. And that is the unconditioned, and one aspect of that, it's great intelligence suddenly. The intelligence of the one.

The one intelligence that manifests as billions of life forms in the universe, underlying it, there's an intelligence, one could say. This is one aspect, an aspect of it. And that can then move through the opening that is here, where before there was a dense little me, there is now an opening.

And through that, that one intelligence moves into this world, one could say. It flowers, it emanates. Life is, you are being lived by life suddenly, instead of needing to make a living.

I'm trying to make it. Already you are life, beyond form. And so it's, all you need to do is recognize yourself, the essence of your being, as already that.

You could never get there in time, through more future, more of this or more of that, that can only obscure it. And it's not, there's nothing wrong with more. If you play with more, you juggle the things of phenomenal existence, the balls, position, relationships, money, and you juggle with these things and occasionally you lose one, and then another one pops up and you juggle with that for a while.

Simply, it's the life of form. Without self-seeking, it loses its heaviness. When there's self-seeking through the forms, the me in everything, it's heavy and it's painful to live, because everything is so unstable, and you can't hang on for what's going to gain us.

So here's the portal that opens up with a yes to now, which is the, if you are interested in spiritual practice, a meditation method, keep the one you have, that's fine too, but here's a continuous meditation that is bringing the yes into now. And part of the meditation is to detect the no. When it comes habitually to detect, to observe, how you deny the now, run away from it, make it into a means to an end, it's happening again, there's the no.

There's the complaining, the whining about what is, and suddenly you see it. So often you detect the no, and then you say, oh. There's a tendency again for the mind to come in and then make some other judgment about it.

When you detect the habitual movement of no, wanting to, being in the future, then the mind says, you see, you can't do it. You're no good, you can't even be present. More thought forms, self-talk.

So often to see the no is very helpful. It's not personal, it's collective conditioning. And there you see it, and the seeing is freeing.

Oh. So the yes comes into the no. The yes, instead of saying no to no, which is more resistance, this includes emotions.

An emotion comes, and you watch the turbulent movement, perhaps, of that emotion, anger or sadness or fear, quivering, and what do you do with that emotion, the movement of emotion? It is as it is. And you allow it to be, which means there's no self in that anymore.

And you realize emotions are human emotions, not really personal. Fear, anger, anxiety, sadness, they are all ultimately non-personal, not me. Human, human emotions, human feelings.

So the self goes out of that, as you simply allow the emotion to be as it is, and suddenly, around that movement of the emotion, there is a spaciousness, through the allowing. It is being, it is, in other words, when you allow what is to be, you become aware of the depths of now. And you realize that now is not what happens, but the field or the space in which it happens.

And that never changes. And you can verify this in your own life. The one thing that, whatever happened to you, and whatever can happen to you, one thing is for certain, it was now, and it will be now.

Nothing can happen to you. So the one thing that remains forever, it's always now, the field of now. So the field of now is one with the essence of your being, and you can sense and know it directly, not in a subject-object relationship, but it knows itself.

You sense what that means, the depths of now. The space of now. The field of now.

And there's the event. And there's the depths of the field of now. At this very moment, what it is that fills up your now is the voice that you hear, the perception of this room, the space here.

And that's what's happening in the field of now, and if you're alert, you're aware that there's what's happening, and there's the field in which it happens, as stillness, as consciousness, awareness. And there's the sound of the bell, an object in consciousness. Beautiful.

And then it dies. The sound comes to an end. And there's a moment when the sound touches the silence.

Maybe you can pay attention to that. That's the moment of death. The form dissolves.

The formless remains as it always was, always will be. So now you can listen to this sound and be aware, not only of the sound, but also of the field, the space, the awareness itself in which the sound appears. That is the deepest meaning of now.

And that is inseparable from who you are in your essence. And that's an amazing thing. There's an object in consciousness which is there.

You know it's there, but it is not absorbing your entire attention. You're also conscious of attention itself, of awareness itself. And when I say that in language, it creates a non-existent duality.

When I say you are conscious of, it's not true. Language only creates that duality. Awareness is conscious of itself.

You are conscious of awareness as yourself. So while you listen, and the sound is only one example, we simplify it because as you move through life, objects in consciousness arise continuously, as thoughts, as emotions, as sense perceptions. Everywhere they pop up.

And most people move through life totally absorbed in all the arising objects and reacting to them as a little me entity, fearing some objects, wanting some other objects to add to me, totally absorbed in the arising objects in consciousness. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha. In other words, they are lost in the world.

And the world is a promising place, because I'm hoping to fulfill me through some objects that I can add to me. And it's a threatening place because the world might take away what I have or may even remove me altogether from existence. So here we're reducing all the many objects that arise in consciousness to one.

And just watch that, see how it arises, and sense the awareness itself in which it happens. And that is what remains, what is there before the object arises, as the sound. It is there while the object has its limited lifespan, and it is there after the object has dissolved, the sound has come to an end.

So let's see what arises in the field of now. And it begins before the Big Bang, because the sound is the equivalent of the Big Bang, just on a smaller scale. It is what's there before the Big Bang happens.

Scientists trying to figure out what was there before there was nothing, there wasn't anything there. And of course, the mind can't work that out. So this is the beginning, just before the universe happens, there's this.

And of course, the bird. And suddenly, and then, and another universe. And the strange thing is, the state of the universe before it was a universe, you see, language becomes absurd, of course.

The state of the universe before there was a universe is still in you. Before there ever was a Big Bang, that is still in you. So you can't figure that out through thought, but you can know it as a thoughtless awareness, as stillness.

Oh, it knows itself. It's not so much that you know it, you are it. So that we could call also the unmanifested stillness.

Be still and know that I am God, says God. And that is a beautiful mantra, or pointer, to realization. And all the words that make up this mantra are really expressions of the one.

They are synonymous. Each word is synonymous with the other word. Be, being.

Still, the stillness of being. Know, there is deep knowing in that stillness. Vast intelligence before it becomes thought, before it becomes something.

Be still, know I am. The deepest meaning of I am is that the words that people use most frequently in the language I or I am, which usually refer to the illusory entity, ultimately, of me as the form, these words have a deeper meaning. When you no longer say, I am this, or I am that, which is identification with form, but the forms are gone, the essence remains of I am.

That. Presence. But it is saying too much.

I am. Just. So the essence of your identity is there.

It is that which even when you are completely absorbed in the story of me, the essence, I am essence, becomes mixed up with form, thought forms. But within each form, the essence of I am remains. It just gives the appearance that I am such and such and such and such, this is my story.

But the innermost feeling of I is actually true, even within a totally mad story. The innermost sense of identity of I is what is true. And that's what people fear most they might lose.

They sense somehow there's something incredibly precious that I am, somehow. And they're afraid that they might lose that. And of course the good thing is you lose everything else except that.

So the I am gets mixed up with forms. And so it's now moving out of, as we sit here, sometimes it happens through disaster, that the I am goes out of identification with form and knows itself as prior to any form.

Oh. Ah. Ah.

What a relief. I'm not this or that. And so that's why, again, be still and know, being, stillness, knowing, I am, all synonymous, and God, the one, before the one becomes many, the one that underlies the many.

There are even some spiritual practices that ask you to ask yourself continuously, who am I? Who am I? Until at first answers may come in your head.

Ah, ah. And then finally no answers come anymore and then you're beginning to realize who you are. Who am I?

Thought suddenly comes to an end. You've exhausted all the possible answers. Who am I?

And you enter the state of, I don't know. That is the state that the form-identified self, the mind-identified self, is most afraid of. I don't know.

And it imagines that the state of enlightenment or liberation is the state in which I'm going to know everything. And I'm going to know myself completely. Wow.

And then it's a shock to realize that the enlightened state, one could almost say, is the opposite of what the egoic entity imagines it to be. Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha. It is entering voluntarily the state of not knowing.

Particularly not knowing who you are anymore. What is that state of not knowing? It is a state in which thought has subsided.

And you become not uneasy with not knowing, I should know, but I don't know. No, you become comfortable with not knowing. You relax into not knowing.

Not knowing is fine. Is it? Feeling.

Feeling. Not quite, but it is closer to a feeling than to a thought. It's the cessation, it is the gap between two thoughts.

In that gap, there's a space of not knowing. You're trying to understand it through thought, but you can't. You can only know it through the arising of the gap, which means relinquish the next question that comes into your mind.

Just let it go. And the next. You see what...

Ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha, ha. You see what that... Yeah.

Because the mind will come up with more... Okay. Thank you.

Ha, ha. And... This.

And you realize that's only not knowing from the point of view of mind. In that not knowing, there is a deep knowing, but not through words, concepts, or mental labels. You can't describe it through thought.

What kind of knowing is that? A simple example. You can go to a tree or a flower and simply perceive that flower being comfortable with not labeling it in any way mentally.

So to have the perception to be totally... Give it your total attention. And this brings us now to another portal.

We've looked at the portal of yes to what is. Another portal opens up through perception, sense perception. Now sense perception, the predominant sense for most human beings is sight, seeing.

The second sense for most human beings is auditory, hearing. Then other senses come in that are much less important in human beings these days. They were very much more important millions of years ago.

Sensing, tasting, smelling, feeling. So the predominant two senses in us tend to be seeing and hearing. The others also.

Let's just focus for a moment on seeing and hearing and see that the possibility... So we're talking about the portal that can open up through sense perception. Now this is very subtle.

I would suggest that you observe yourself when you first look at something. Something arises in your field of consciousness. Let's say your head turns and there's a flower.

Or you're out in nature and suddenly you look at this flower. There is a moment when the perception is being taken in. When you notice, the moment of noticing a new perception that has come in.

There is a moment when you look. A space of pure looking. It could be a second.

It could be two seconds. It could be three seconds. And this is the space in which the perception happens through stillness.

You are looking, examining this stillness and after two or three seconds, if you observe yourself, most humans are completely unconscious of that, after two seconds or so, the mind will come in with an interpretation or a label. But always when you first notice something, and it could be a human being, suddenly this person that you haven't seen before comes in and you look into the face. And for the first few seconds, in some human beings it's only one second before the mind comes in.

And immediately the mind will interpret according to its conditioning. It's called knowledge. And so you look, and there is, whenever you first notice something or someone, there is a gap of no thought.

And this is where the true perception happens. And it is not that you are unintelligent in that gap. There is actually a deeper intelligence through which the perception happens.

And for a moment, through the unconditioned intelligence, there is the perception. And you can test it for yourself. You can walk somewhere and look at something and truly give attention and then the mind comes in.

Watch the gap that is there naturally. You don't have to make it happen. And then, whenever you first notice something, there is a small gap of no thought.

And this means of not knowing. But then most humans are not comfortable with staying in that state and habitually, it's conditioned, they need to interpret very quickly and label through some thought movement. And that means the conditioned mind comes in and obscures the pure, unconditioned perception of that.

And if you notice that, a strange thing happens. When you notice that gap, it tends to become longer. And then you may stay, it may remain for half a minute.

And then during that time, which is really timeless, the perception happens within a field of stillness. And that is amazing. That is the transformation of consciousness.

And you notice, this is beginning to happen to you. You are moving through the world no longer compulsively, immediately labeling everything and thinking that's knowledge. It's conditioning.

Now, it does not mean that you don't, that you lose your mental labels because they may still be useful occasionally. So you look upon something and what arises is the perception happens within the field of stillness. And then if somebody asks you, what are you looking at?

You don't say, I don't know anymore. No, the label is still there. When you need it to communicate, I'm looking at my hand.

But I'm not thinking about it. And this is very similar to the bells. This is the auditory equivalent of that.

It is possible to simply notice the sound, give it complete attention, notice it, and it happens within a field of no thought. And so that is, first of all, noticing the gap that is there when you first notice something. Or it could be a sound, it could be something you see, or even touch.

You can close your eyes and touch something and just completely sense the touch without trying to figure out what it is, just sensing what it feels like, sensing the perception. So there's the perception, and there's the field of stillness in which that happens. So this is the...

And then you can go out into nature and you may find that it becomes easier and easier to perceive what is around you without the compulsive interference of thinking. So the unconditioned consciousness is there. And this is a very...

It means you're not... From the point of view of the mind, you don't know what's there. And yet, there's a deeper knowing which most humans have lost touch with.

Maybe they had it once in a more innocent way, but now an incredible transformation to be able to perceive without compulsively interpreting immediately, labeling, judging, thinking about. Then a greater intelligence is at work. And this is not only when you are a passive perceiver, you can then bring that into situations.

Into situations where you... There's a flow of attention. One could also say there's a current of awareness.

And there is the form that this moment takes. And you simply look. And you have attention within a space of stillness.

You can... As you sit here, you can look aware of this room. No need to label it.

It is. And it doesn't mean that you become totally ignorant. You still know what it is even deeper without the label.

Just don't try to figure it all out in the mind. But through sense perceptions, the possibility of perceiving against the field of... through the field of stillness.

Now the third portal, and they come together, you can bring two together, so to speak, especially these two now. The third portal that is there, that is very simple, that anchors you, in presence, the state of it, is sensing the inner energy field of your body as you sit here. To have a little bit of attention in the inner energy field, to sense the aliveness that is in your hands, your feet, your legs.

It's there. It's alive. The entire body is alive.

But most humans don't notice that because their attention is in thought, in the head. They live only up here. So you simply notice suddenly that the body is alive.

It feels alive. Very subtle at first. There is an aliveness.

And some of your attention is in that aliveness.

As you sit here, you're perceiving the sound. You may be perceiving also visually the room. And at the same time, sense the aliveness in the body.

You can also close your eyes and go more deeply into the sense of aliveness. Give it more attention, more attention flowing into the feeling, the sense of inner body. As you sit here.

At first you might feel one or two parts of the body more strongly. And then after a while a general sense of awareness in the body. It's quite easy.

It's very natural and you may notice some of your attention has moved from thinking into sensing. And now you can open your eyes without losing that sensing. So when you open your eyes, perception happens again and you continue to feel a little less strongly perhaps.

The feeling of inner body. And if you are rooted there, this anchors you in the present.

And from there it is easier to perceive in that clarity of not labeling mentally.

And when you can become comfortable with that, it's incredible what that does to your interaction with human beings that spacious clarity of looking at another human being without any, without the arising of judgments, labels, or interpretations. Which is the veil usually that descends when you meet someone, the veil of conditioned interpretations, what Jesus calls judgment, becomes between you and the other human being. The conditioned self begins to operate, wants something from the other human being, fears something from the other human being.

So that's, so ultimately in this transformation of consciousness, what arises when the unconditioned consciousness arises is simply, this is profound and incredible evolutionary transformation, the ability to dwell, transformation, the ability of no thought, in which actually a greater intelligence operates than could possibly operate through conditioned thinking. And you do not lose the ability to use the mind by the greater intelligence, And then the mind can still operate much more effectively, giving expression to that which comes from the deeper levels where all inspiration comes, all creative realization, creative activity comes out of the greater intelligence, not the conditioned mind, there's nothing new in the conditioned mind, but the mind has a function. It can give form to something that comes from the deeper level of the formless, and that will be powerful, sacred, new, alive, fresh, in all great human creation that operate it.

Wonderful! It's just, so we've seen the portal of allowing this moment to be the portal of sense perceptions, noticing when you first perceive something, there is a gap, that gap is the portal, and then you notice that can be there, then you can actually bring the gap into sense perceptions, starting with nature, which is easier because there's no thought in the flower, so it doesn't stimulate thought in you. If you look at a car, it's built by thought.

It's more likely to stimulate thought. So the natural world is a great help because it exists in that beautiful state of oneness still with the totality. It may not really know that, it just is that.

So nature teaches, it may not really know that, it does it beautifully. And that can be the ground of your practice, going out into nature and meeting it in that state. And then, and only then, you, when you meet other human beings, you can allow that state to be there.

More difficult because most human beings are walking noise factories, mental, and they come at you wanting something. Most you say, come, what's your opinion about, come on, stimulate thought. So there needs to be already intense presence for you not to get drawn, stimulated, because their mind will try to draw in your mind.

What's your position towards, you must, and just be, watch, look, alertness. And then action comes out of that intelligence when it's needed, sometimes through words. I am told that our bodies need to be moved and we will meet in 15 minutes according to clock time in this field of now again.

Thank you. We will meet, time passes very quickly in the now. We looked at the portals, some of them, the portal of loss, the portal of the inner body, of sense perceptions, of yes to now, one more portal, and this is a particularly appropriate place where we are here to look at that simple is silence, one could say, the absence of sound, which is here in this space very strongly, simply to pay attention to it.

To notice it. And one could almost say to listen to it. Now while I talk about it, you can also listen, not just to the words, usually your attention would be absorbed by the words or your attention would be absorbed by your own thought processes, that's possible too, about tomorrow's problem.

So that's the usual case. But now, as you sit here, you can pay attention to the words, but also to the silence that's still here in this room. Everywhere, in between every sound.

The sounds couldn't even happen. If the silence were not there, they stand out, the sounds stand out from that. So usually you would not notice it, because usually you would be sitting here as a thought-based entity looking only to what thought can relate to, which is form, which is more thought.

And you would forget a deeper dimension that is there. And that is the dimension of stillness, thoughtlessness, formless stillness. And it's a strange thing when you listen to the words, but at the same time you also listen to the silence.

One could say silent spaces, but they're not really spaces, because silence is one. So there is an underlying silence, and then the words come like wave movements. Now a strange thing happens.

You could, of course, listen to silence completely. No more words, just that. And to listen to silence, it requires a certain degree of alertness.

Almost the alertness of expectancy, although you're not looking to the future, but the kind of alertness you would have if you were expecting perhaps some very faint sound, and you have to catch it when it comes. But there's no strain in this, no tension, just an alert listening. Like, one could say, as if you were going like this.

And then you notice the strange thing, and that is whenever you listen to silence, and you may not be able to sustain that for very long, maybe only a few seconds at a time, whenever you listen to silence, there's no thought. And even if you can only sustain it for three seconds at a time, whenever you listen to silence, the mind must stop. Because the mind is mental noise.

It forms. Silence has no form. It's formless.

So you cannot, through noise, listen to silence. You cannot, through form, listen to or understand the formless. So the simple fact of allowing attention to be there, allowing the alertness to be there, that is needed for listening to, because silence is subtle.

Sounds are very much here, like big egos. Every sound is a here I am. And sounds can be fascinating.

And we live in a civilization that is very noisy. Everywhere we go, they're making noise. Even hard to find a restaurant that's not very bombarded by noise called music.

So it's very, silence is very subtle. And to the thinking mind, first of all, it doesn't know what to do with it. Silence.

And then it says, okay, that's not very interesting. No, of course not. It's completely uninteresting.

Because only thought is interesting to thought. And it might even say, this is boring. What's the next thing?

Of course it's boring. Silence is boring. Enlightenment is boring to the mind.

Because the mind is looking for the next food, the next stimulus. In its state of restlessness and discontent, it needs, quick, give me the next stimulus. And if it's not coming, it gets restless, impatient, bored, or worse.

So that's the movement of thought and the me, the thought-based me. Okay. So all this, if you've been sitting here and found an alive response to this, even if not necessarily a complete understanding, who could understand that which is beyond thought?

But you found, as you were sitting here, an alive response yes, a recognition almost, if not a complete understanding, that means that which is beyond mind is already emerging in you. It's being pulled out here because this gathering here is more than the words. There is an energy field of, one could say, presence, that state of consciousness.

So, it almost transmits itself. You can catch it. You can catch, but it's not in the words.

The words are helpful pointers, signposts, not in themselves, it. So here, you enter the alertness that is there, that is needed to be aware of silence. And the moment you're aware of silence, there's the equivalent of outer silence in you, which is stillness, the cessation of thought, without loss of consciousness, the opposite, enormous consciousness, but no form, unconditioned, formless.

It's only through that that you can be aware of silence. And what we've been talking about, language has created certain dualities here when I say you can be aware of silence, it's only a way of speaking. What's really happening when you're listening to silence and the mind stops, what's really happening, you become aware of awareness.

That still sounds a little bit dualistic, but that's because of language. Self-awareness, awareness of awareness. It's not two, but one.

The field of spacious, aware presence. And another word that, another pointer one could use to point to that, which I've been using recently, is space consciousness. Everything else is object consciousness.

Now, most human beings know only object consciousness. Consciousness as a thought. And they know themselves only as objects in consciousness.

And in the egoic state, you become an object to yourself in consciousness. You walk with a me, a companion, a self, which is an object in consciousness. So, if you're unaware of the dimension of space consciousness, all you know is objects in consciousness.

Sense perceptions, thoughts, emotions, and they're all quite important. And they matter to me, or they threaten me, or they promise something to me, and so you're in a reactive relationship you make an object out of yourself, a mind form of me, and then relate to other objects, wanting to accumulate some, reject others. And completely unaware of that deeper dimension.

So you become a conceptualized entity, thought object, me, inhabiting a conceptualized reality where everything is labeled and according to the conditioning of me. And you're trapped in the world of mental forms. So, in theistic language, you would say you know the world, very well perhaps.

You might be very knowledgeable about the world, about objects in consciousness. And if you watch TV, you can see with what gravity and importance these matters are being discussed. How is the stock market performing?

And then the experts will talk about it. It's very serious looking. With a lot of tension, this matters.

It's very important. They're completely, of course it matters relatively because you might have invested a million dollars and maybe you didn't know it, but it's now been reduced to a hundred dollars. So it's relatively important, but only relatively important in the world of relativity.

But people are so absorbed by the objects in consciousness that it draws them in totally. So they are lost in mind and they are lost in the world. And the world becomes a heavy place to be and the mind is a heavy place to be with.

Oh! And everything is heavy with, it matters, the matter matters. And then the freedom arises of realizing a deeper dimension in yourself.

Just go through one of the portals or allow one of the portals to be there and something arises that has nothing to do with objects in your consciousness, thoughts in your head, things that are happening in your life, your life situation, good, bad, happy, unhappy, pleasure, pain, trying to make it work. And it can, the portal can be there, it doesn't depend on what the particular configuration of objects in your consciousness has to be at this time. Maybe it's great at the moment, everything is working in my life.

Okay, we'll meet again in a year's time. Because it's not in the nature of things to stay around stable for too long. Or you might say, everything is collapsing in my life.

Great! Loss, loss, the structures of my life are becoming unstable. Oh, that's good news.

Loss is coming. A portal is opening up. So here, the arising of space consciousness and such a simple thing, simply acknowledging silence.

It's there. Noticing that it's there. It doesn't matter for how long you can notice it, just notice it.

And as long, every noticing of it is the arising of thoughtless awareness during that noticing of silence. And of course, the arising of that is sacred. It is.

I use largely non- religious language. In that way, it is more accessible to people who have lived with the terminology of religion that's been used by the mind without the actual experience or knowledge of it for so long. So misused, really, by the mind.

But that is the only state of being out of which that arises which makes life so precious on this earth. It is only out of that state that love arises. Anything you look upon that is not judged or labeled or interpreted according to one's conditioning, anything that you look upon and allow it to be as it is, you enter a completely different relationship to that whether it is a being, a human being, an animal, a plant, a completely different relationship from the relationship that you would have with it if you were looking at it through the conditioning of the mind and the self that goes with it. And that self cannot see the sacredness that is in every being. It is only looking at what is my relationship to this.

How does he or she or it fit in with me? So even when it looks at a beautiful plant it will have some kind of relation to me. It might want to pull it out.

I want to have that. Or it might say, I wonder where I can get that works great in my garden. But there needs to be some relationship of me or these are relatively mild, innocent manifestations of that relatively.

But then we come to the same thing that me comes in the form of a company and they look at an ancient forest been there for 20,000 years or more and all they see is what they can get out of it. They might only see it's worse, it's such and such on the market. This is what we can do with it.

They miss the deeper dimension in everything they miss it. The deeper dimension in each human being is missed when you're only there as a labeling entity judging when the spaciousness of presence isn't there you miss the essence of all beings and your own continuously. And that's why the sacredness of the ancient forest in order to sense the sacredness of the ancient forest there needs to be some space of stillness in you even if you didn't know it.

Otherwise you might be going to the forest and writing a PhD about this particular tree and again that's not really true that's mind knowledge it has its place occasionally but to be absorbed by mind knowledge completely then you miss the essence of all things. You miss the essence of the forest. You may know a lot about the forest you might have studied about forestry for six years and your mind may be full of knowledge about the forest but if the if the spaciousness isn't there in your perception if you cannot go there and for a moment be in the state of complete openness that is the state of perception in and through the stillness then the essence you cannot sense that.

And then you do it to human beings all you see is the form of that human being all you see is the physical form and all you see is the psychological form of the conditioning of that person which you are going to label very quickly and then the labels are the screen through which you interact with the other person you've reduced the person in many cases the labels are so one sided that some people do that more strongly than others that you reduce other human beings to mere caricatures through focusing on certain judgments it becomes just absurd reduction of who that human being is but one way or another that's what the mind does so if you are lost in it an awful existence to be totally lost in the conditioned forms not knowing who you are or who the other person not knowing the dimension of depth and even this gathering here there's a sacredness to that and that is missed unless there's some space inner space cessation of mental noise doesn't matter for how long and from then on as that arises thought no longer has that incredible importance you no longer totally believe in every thought that still comes you have some distance between the thought and you and you don't completely believe in every thought that arises anymore you're not completely in it otherwise you're totally conditioned so this simple portal of listening to silence and the mind becomes still and after a little while you can listen to the stillness within even if there's no stillness no silence outside you could be in the middle of a traffic and suddenly the mind is still that comes with all the portals are really one so that for example comes with allowing this moment to be totally noisy traffic not moving fumes machines noise the mind says I need to be there this is dreadful what's going on it is as it is and then you allow that moment to be and suddenly that same stillness is there there it is so you see all the portals are really one they're different entry points to the same state of consciousness and that is the state in which thinking becomes secondary in your life ah at last and the thinking that is still there it will still happen first of all on the one hand thinking loses its capacity to make you unhappy that's a relief because the unhappiness that arises in you is created by thought not by what happens it's created by thoughts about what happens obviously as I called it already Shakespeare nothing is either good or bad but thinking makes it so and for many people their minds are torture instruments that they are condemned it seems to live with

uh oh

and so many thoughts they have about themselves other people situations they are in are critical and judging and so much pain in those thoughts that transform simple situations into big problems of me so there are many people who live with a self mind made self that is a very cruel entity and they would never live with a person like that would you live I wouldn't live with somebody who is continuously critical criticizes me all the time disapproves of what I do all the time and yet people have many people have their self is predominantly negative there are many people like that who have to live with themselves if that were their husband or wife they would have gotten a divorce long ago but but you can't divorce yourself from yourself you can only be aware of yourself so thought then you have a space around thought increasingly as this presence arises thoughts still come even old thought patterns still happen for a while they're no longer so energized by total identification because it's only total identification with thought that gives them enormous energy there's a me in every thought what's going to happen at night you wake up as I used to three o'clock in the morning and suddenly the mind becomes hyperactive I have to think about this oh my god and then the emotions that you sense the mind is painting disasters that are going to happen you know and the emotions that you feel are as if these things that the mind is fantasizing about were already happening and people have to live with these entities that is a beautiful moment in bed warm silence all around the night very still they don't realize that they are in some kind of hell and so you must think about this as a mind you must think about this the mind is saying I'm trying to find a solution to this problem of course it's fueling the problem that's what people live with so on the one hand the mind loses its capacity to make you unhappy because now you have a distance even if the old thought patterns still arise they are recognized as thought so they don't you don't necessarily believe in what every thought says it loses its importance although thought will try to get importance back every thought wants to be taken very seriously because if you take it seriously you give it more energy every thought says give me your complete attention because I matter and it pulls it wants to pull it in that's how it is and so you there it is all that's required is to be there allow even the mental noise to be enter the state of non-resistance to what is you could even try that with unhappiness unhappiness is of course is some form of no to what is some form of non-alignment with now I'm so unhappy that you feel the unhappiness of me if you try this little thing okay I'm unhappy so what I accept I'm unhappy I don't mind being unhappy

there's the unhappiness there it is and suddenly you can have a space even around unhappiness anything that you accept becomes transformed that's the miracle and many of you have actually already experienced that in your life that by when you let go of needing a situation to be different from the way it is you wanted it to be different but nothing happens you let go you allow it to be and suddenly it changes so much so that the expression has been coined by somebody what you resist persists so the resistance to what is keeps you stuck with what is so thought loses its capacity to make you unhappy on the one hand but on the other hand as presence arises thought actually becomes more powerful too because thought that is inspired by the one intelligence that comes out of the state of presence is fresh alive new creative it contains insights it has energy to it that is transformative when you speak to somebody out of presence they will listen because they can sense there's more than the words there's an energy that comes with the words I talk a lot about these things and every time I talk it feels completely new to me because it comes out of the state of presence I've said these things many times in one way or another but the words are nevertheless fresh because they come out of presence and it's it's so alive so that is the thoughts then become more powerful less self-serving and you can create through thought of course you can everybody does it most of them unconsciously and then you create not so much as someone who needs something to complete him or herself but creation happens through you out of the joy of creating aliveness out of the joy of playing in this universe of form and so the new motivating factor for action as the old motivating factor for action disappears which is fear and wanting the two motivating factors in the egoic self-obsessed state desire or wanting and fear those two motivate people and that becomes replaced by the joy of acting of doing in the now not making this now into a means to an end but to enjoy the movement the doing every master whatever your master at in your field of mastery there will be a joy as you perform those actions and so thought becomes also more empowered the silence is still there and I will keep you here a little bit longer unless you need to go there's something that can easily obscure the portals into presence and that is what I call the pain body the pain body is accumulated residues of emotional pain from the past your personal past as a child you suffer emotional pain especially living on this mad planet emotional pain inflicted on you as a child especially children the pain of the child leaves residues of pain also the pain later on in relationships that you might suffer residues left emotional residues of painful emotion and they come together in the body as the pain body the past pain that still is an energy field that humans carry inside but part of it is actually goes back a long long time part of it is human pain collective human pain and humans have created so much of that in their history on the planet enormous self-created pain so every human in addition to accumulating more pain in their personal lives have their share of collective human pain and that's always more than whatever you can collect in your personal life and that is an energy field of stuck non-flowing aliveness the emotions live in the body one can say in your energy field and I will offer to you the helpful perspective of looking upon this pain body almost as an emotional entity that lives in you but you don't know it's there all the time it's not always visible so this emotional entity it is a way of looking but it comes quite close to the truth is some of the time dormant when things are going relatively okay in my life ups and downs yes I'm uneasy yes I'm restless yes I haven't found myself yet yes I'm struggling but I can live with it pain body is dormant then pain body occasionally needs to become active to feed on something the emotional entity of pain needs to feed on the further experience of pain more pain I want some more pain I need to not enough pain one could call this the human addiction to pain and that is the pain body and if you observe yourself or start with others it's always easier you can see that when the pain body is dormant it's fine you might not even notice it perhaps as a slight weight or turbulence in the background but you may not notice it at all then suddenly it becomes active when it becomes active it means it's feeding time it will then use any any trigger in your surroundings and react to something it will trigger usually something relatively minor it could even be just a thought in your head triggers far more pain than would be warranted by that situation out of proportion very often to the situation but the situation doesn't matter to the pain body it will use a trigger for the influx of pain a thought is enough if you live alone in your head one small negative thought about me and my life or my partner and the pain body will flow if it's ready to awaken it will move into that thought which then becomes empowered by emotion and that emotion will lead to further thoughts a whole stream of negative thoughts starting from the one thought and that stream is full of emotion so it's empowered the emotional stream is empowered by the pain body but the thought stream is empowered by the emotion and at that time the emotion renews itself by feeding on your thinking every thought is energy it feeds on that it loves the negativity of every thought how dreadful my life is how dreadful he is life is generally my life situation anger depression fear fearful thoughts one fearful thought after another and the pain body loves it and that means you are identified with that old pain pain body has become you it's feeding on your mind and at that time you don't want to let go of the negative stream of thinking you love it not ultimately you but you have identified with pain body that's why you love the pain it's an indulgence in the negativity of it more of it more please and it can become very destructive it can destroy sometimes a pain body episode which can last for a few hours can last even for a whole day in some cases two days it can stick around for three days it varies from person to person but a few hours is quite normal a few days is not uncommon longer periods are also possible in very heavy pain bodies they can be active for two weeks three weeks even in some extreme cases 90% of the time 100% of the time in deeply unhappy people who live almost exclusively through their pain body and everything they see and judge is through the pain every relationship gets immediately sabotaged through the pain that they carry so they bring it into the relationship but most people have dormant pain bodies and active they fluctuate once a week once every two weeks twice a week the pain body will need to feed on more pain and then it'll use your partner because it's not enough to feed on your mind it is looking to other people to feed on their reactions emotional pain give me some pain I need some more drama please and the right buttons are pushed especially in your partner and you get drama and they love it couples are forced in the unconscious state to reenact periodically their particular version of the drama and they're feeding their pain bodies please I want you to feed my pain body and so I'm going to provoke you and say something that will trigger pain in you and it works every time and so this is an unconscious movement and many people become so identified with this that it can easily obscure presence the portals that gaze the gates shut of the portals clong clong clong clong and then the pain body says all that nonsense about pain body and all that talk was so much nonsense this is real this is real and after it the pain body has fed on other people preferably your partner but colleagues will do other family members will do or if you're a hermit it'll feed on your mind and that'll be enough so then it gradually becomes dormant again and you feel a lot better so does the pain body the pain body feels a lot better when it feels a lot worse because to the pain body better means worse and so pain body is an important aspect of the self the mind made self because it is the old emotional accumulations that very often empower amplify the structures of the mind made self so here you have the mind made self that's already quite dysfunctional but added to the dysfunction that's already there comes all the pain from the human past human pain and it becomes a me a self that was already heavy even without that and now gets so heavy that you can't carry that burden of self anymore there's so much suffering in it so much anger so much fear whatever the predominant energy field of pain body is so such heaviness turbulence how to live with that but it periodically you get taken over by it again and there are people who've been meditating for 30 years and they don't recognize their pain body and it would be so easy to recognize it when the pain starts and simply watch it as the arising pain body so that it doesn't become a me when you don't watch it you're not aware of it it quickly slips into your mind and uses your thinking if you can watch it then there's a space around it and it cannot pretend to be you anymore it can't really use your thinking anymore it cannot feed anymore because you watch the turbulence you feel it inside you sometimes all over the body it might feel heaviness all over the body it's everywhere almost some people feel it only in the solar plexus or stomach area depends when you observe the pain body arising in another person in your partner you have a first hand view you can the shift in the energy field that comes over that person is so obvious that there is an entity there one could almost say that before there was that beautiful aliveness that may have been the person that you thought you married and suddenly this enormous heaviness or anger a little monster or big monster suddenly there next to you and the shift can happen within one minute how can the wife or the husband turn into that and it happens all the time it's not recognized as the pain body and then the pain body suddenly looks at you and thought processes whatever it thinks about is through its pain it interprets everything through the pain every interpretation of my life who you are who I am what my life situation is totally distorted because it's looked at through the pain so you get an absurd worldview inspired not by heaven but by hell and so most human beings unconscious so they are forced to feed it again and again and very often you will recognize pain bodies the transformation in somebody close to you there it is and you sense you don't need to be a psychic to feel to feel the emanation of that so all that's needed is know it see it for what it is and continue to watch its movement so that it doesn't turn into an unhappy me anymore it cannot flow into the mind structures of the unhappy self and amplify those so all that's left really of the pain body now is a heaviness or a turbulence inside you or a quiver of fear very much like atmospheric turbulence bad weather which isn't a personal problem except to very heavy egos who react even to the weather and say why is it always bad when I want to go out but if you're not such a heavy ego then weather is relatively neutral but really so is the atmospheric turbulence in your own energy field not there's no self in it it's human pain human turbulence okay not a person ultimately so it doesn't amplify anymore the story of me and makes it into some dreadfully unhappy nightmare you watch it almost as a physical symptom when it comes and that's the beginning of freedom because it can no longer replenish itself now as you watch it you recognize it when it comes you might recognize it first in your partner when it comes in your partner and then you might say there's your pain body or maybe not because you might be wrong it could be your pain body already speaking through you not impossible now you could talk to your partner and have an agreement that you will help each other when you notice the other person's pain body at least what you can do is not to confuse the pain body with who that person is so you recognize it as the human pain body now you might live with an extremely dense pain body next to you in your partner so you won't meet anybody who is totally free of pain body but as presence arises in you your partner will no longer be able to feed very much on your reactions so that's very frustrating and then it is quite possible that presence also arises in your partner or it won't be long before he or she will look for some better pain body to live with and there's no shortage of pain bodies

so

this is the one thing that needs to be recognized in yourself so that it cannot obscure the arising presence each time it comes in fact it can actually contribute to the arising presence usually pain body pain body would pull you back into unconsciousness identification with it and you're in the middle of the pain body and then finally it goes and then you wake up oh that must have been the pain body and so then a certain level of consciousness is reached when the pain body doesn't pull you into unconsciousness anymore but the pain that you feel the turbulence or the heaviness actually triggers more presence the pain body becomes like a little alarm clock for more intense aliveness of presence oh there it is and you stay really alert and watch it and it can't feed so usually what the pain body does then when you're very alert while it's there oh and alert means you allow it but you see it the pain body doesn't like that it comes into the light of consciousness and all that light you looking at it it withdraws and then it waits for a better moment when you're less conscious after drinking some alcohol it may come up that's a favorite not the first class the second or third suddenly the male pain body does that quite often that's why quite a few men become violent after a few drinks they trigger the male pain body or you could watch TV for hours three or four hours your level of consciousness goes down down and then you switch off and suddenly oh so there's a more modern phenomenon that relatively you have this huge and a few drinks they trigger a large part of the entertainment industry of course brings out violent movies in other words people pay money to feel bad they pay money to sit there and feel bad now who does that who is paying money to sit there and feel bad the pain bodies so the large part of the entertainment industry is financed by pain bodies and made by pain bodies they make the films the pain bodies make the films the pain bodies watch the films works oh that was a great film i feel really bad the human condition so that's all that we need to see time passes very quickly when the truth arises it doesn't really exist anymore that's why this afternoon passed almost in an instant and that's beautiful so this if we had more clock time we could spend more asking questions but ultimately it's not through any further questions or answers that presence arises in you it's arising already be alert there are portals let's just use them so to speak and it's happening anyway it's happening already no need to look to the future for some kind of attainment you are already yourself fully at the deepest level there's nothing you can add to you that is truly essential only on the world of form you can play with adding and losing and gaining and losing but you're already that already complete then the rest is easy you can play the world becomes a lighter place you can play in it and enjoy even the world of form don't need to say this is form

2015 Eckhart Tolle In The Presence of A Great Mystery

Welcome to our afternoon together. Many of you have only just arrived here, and perhaps some of you are not yet completely here. There may be parts of you that are still arriving.

So let's wait for them to get here. The truth, of course, is it's very rare for a human being to be completely here. The usual state is to be peripherally here, just enough so that you don't bump into things, and the rest of your attention is taken up by what appears to be much more important than here, and that's past and future, and somewhere else.

And almost everybody believes unconsciously, because when you make it conscious, you see the fallacy of it. Everybody believes, almost everybody believes past and future to be more important than here and now. That's an implicit assumption.

That's how people lead their lives. If you ask them, maybe they won't admit. They say, well, no, but how do you live?

Do you live as if past and future matter more than this? As if you didn't know that this now is all there ever is, that your entire life unfolds within the space of now, that your life is never not now. Now, you may start thinking and say, is that true?

It would be hard to argue with that, very hard, that your life is never not now. You can remember the past, only now. You can think of the future, only now.

Whatever you think, do, feel, experience can only happen now. I don't believe the greatest philosopher could argue with that, but the mind is very clever. It may find reasons why this is not the case, but in any way, humans live not recognizing the truth of that.

The shift in consciousness that is happening on the planet is very closely connected with that realization because the shift in consciousness that is an absolute necessity on this planet now is not something that is going to happen. It's happening now in you at this very moment or not at all, and that doesn't make sense to the mind either. The shift in consciousness is not to do with improving your ability to think or adding more information to the store of information that each one of you already has, your knowledge.

If you wanted to improve yourself on that level, there are many universities you can go to to add to yourself in terms of knowledge, but that adding to is not the shift in consciousness. It is a continuation of the same consciousness that is the state of being completely identified with your thought processes, with the content of your mind, the content of your mind, which is thought. One thought after another.

Identification with the content of your mind leads to a sense of self, a sense of identity, a me that is based on thought activity, based on a mentally constructed story, and the emotions that accompany that mentally constructed story, which is the most fascinating story on the planet, which is the story of me, and all the identifications that go with that, the reactive patterns that go with that, all the knowledge, the opinions, the viewpoints, the achievements and the non-achievements, the successes and failures which make up the story of me, your sense of who you are, that begins with your name, to which many other things are then added, identifications, which are all thought forms. The child begins to say, this is my toy, which means there is a beginning identity, and humans have to go through that. The tragedy is if they get stuck in that limited content-based, thought-based sense of self or identity.

For a child, it is good to say this is my toy, not yours. It's mine, and in that statement, which is the arising of a thought form that is invested with a sense of self, there's the beginning of a mind-made me. It's the beginning of a story, because you're telling the story that this is mine.

The thought form is what matters, not the toy, because the thought form is invested with a sense of self. 20 years later, the toy becomes the BMW, mine. Same thing, same thought form.

It's not the car that matters. It's the thought form that has a sense of self in it that matters, and that's only one level possessions. You may graduate beyond that.

Most of you in this room have gone beyond that level. Otherwise, you wouldn't be here of identifying with material possessions. Occasionally, it may still happen, but surely you have gone beyond that, except perhaps that then you identify with the thought that you are somebody who has gone beyond material possessions, which is another little story.

It looks more advanced, so the identification with thought forms, the identification with thought as me becomes more and more subtle as you progress spiritually. You recognize certain very simple identifications, and then more subtle identifications come in. There's the identification with other people's opinions of you, which you adopt becomes a thought form.

What the world thinks of me, am I important or not important? That may shift. One day, the world may tell you you are important, and the next day, it changes its mind.

So many things come in to form a bundle of thoughts and identifications and patterns. That is your sense of who, that's who I, that's me. The mind-made sense of self.

And this is, I sometimes call it the old consciousness. That's been the dominant state of consciousness on the planet for as long as we can remember, recorded history and beyond that, far beyond that, to be identified with that very limited self. And one of the first human beings to discover that cage, that trap, that dreadful limitation, and to see how much pain and suffering this delusion causes that all you are is a mental story, that identification with thought, to see how much suffering that sense of self causes to yourself, and if you cause suffering to yourself, you make others suffer.

One of the first human beings to see that was the person we now call the Buddha. 2,600 years ago, he saw the delusion of what he called self. That we could say is the self that we spell with a small s.

But if we now say there is a self with a big capital S, that's, we have to be very careful with statements like that, because very easily another concept forms in the mind with which one can identify. You then become somebody who believes in a greater self that can add something substantial to your sense of self. And most usefully, you can disagree with others who don't share that opinion or that viewpoint, which strengthens the self enormously.

If you can disagree with somebody, somebody who does not agree with your mental position, challenges it, questions it, and then you defend it. And an enormous amount of energy goes into the defense of mental positions, personally and collectively, warfare, collectively. They're defending collective mental positions, not a me, but an us against them.

We against them. On a personal level, it's me against all those who threaten me. An amazing state.

This is coming to an end now, but you don't need to believe that. We are here this afternoon because something else is arising or is being realized. We need to be very careful with words.

I often, I'd like to stop almost every other sentence and say, that's not quite it, it just points to it. So be careful with getting attached to a statement. No statement, statement is very rarely absolutely true.

They're all little pointers. And this afternoon, there's only one thing we ever talk about. What's that?

The flowering of human consciousness. Another pointer. What's that?

The mind will say, explain, give a definition, and then a definition comes. Then the mind says, okay, now define that. Or it adopts another mental position and say, this does not agree with the mental positions that I have formed in my head.

These are not my positions. Now, you may have noticed already that this afternoon does not work so well on the level of thought. It's not really a lecture.

It looks like it on the surface, but it isn't. It's not a workshop either. I don't know what it is.

If tonight you call somebody up and they ask you, what did he talk about? And if you can say, well, he talked about this and that and that and that, then you probably didn't get it. But if you say, well, I don't know, I can't, I don't really remember what he talked about.

It's more likely that then you got it. This is strange. This gathering here this afternoon is pointing to a dimension within you that is deeper than thought and deeper even than the flux of emotions, a dimension of consciousness within you.

The possibility of realizing that dimension within yourself, that realization is the flowering of consciousness and it is not, it has nothing to do with adding new concepts to the content of your mind. This afternoon does not work if you expect something to be added to you, but of course there is the unconscious belief that something needs to be added to me so that I can be complete and full and fulfilled and being completely myself. There is the unspoken, unconscious or semi-conscious belief that who or what I am is not yet enough and that is a walking entity that believes that.

That is one of the core beliefs of the mind-made sense of self. I am not yet enough. I need more to be fully and completely myself and that walking entity that needs more to be fully and completely itself will become frustrated this afternoon sitting here because it is not being fed more concepts or opinions, information, knowledge, interesting and fascinating ideas that it can add and then walk out a little bit expanded because you have added to the store of knowledge with which you can then identify the me, the story of me has expanded then a little bit. So it doesn't work like that. So if you cannot get beyond that entity with its very strong need for more, then you may not make it.

You may not be able to endure sitting here the whole afternoon because you will continuously be waiting for a statement that explains it all where suddenly it goes, click, now I know what enlightenment is. When is he going to say it? Come on.

And you may notice in yourself this enormously powerful need which is part of the conditioned mind made entity. This enormous need, there's nothing personal in that at all. Oh, that's a disappointment.

I thought it was my problem. This enormous need for the next moment where surely it's going to happen. And then what?

And you can see it in people's faces when they go about their daily business, the tension, the strain, because they need the next moment and they're saying, isn't it here yet? And this isn't, people live like that, it's normal. If you watch TV, a lot of what you see, how people, whatever you see, film, soap operas or whatever, or the news readers, they're all in that state of where's the next moment where surely things are going to be resolved.

So you may encounter frustration and when you find it, that's fine. Don't say, don't be frustrated. When you encounter frustration as you sit here, that's fine, you notice it, you see it for what it is.

That means you are not the frustration. That's a pattern that you then discover in yourself. And whatever you discover as a pattern is fine.

Because there it is, you see it. If you don't see it, you are it. And then you become fidgety and then finally you will jump up and run out of the room.

I don't want to discourage anybody from visiting the bathroom, but I mustn't get up, otherwise people will think that I am identified with it. Yes. Now, we are pointing here to a deeper dimension of consciousness within yourself where the need, that deep seated need for the next moment, which is very closely related, really one with the enormous needs that people have for needing to add more to me to make me complete, which is ultimately a delusion because you never get there.

We are here to go beyond that. And as I speak, that dimension may arise in you where the need for the next moment suddenly falls away. And you don't go to sleep.

If you go to sleep, that's fine too. But it is an enormous thing when you suddenly, you're able to simply be in that beautiful state of relaxed, alert presence and perceive whatever it is that you're perceiving without the need for more. Something now arises in you that is not conditioned.

We could say, but be careful with any word. They're only, all words are pointers, no more. We could say what is arising is the unconditioned dimension of consciousness.

Consciousness, sometimes called awareness. So the shift in consciousness that is happening on the planet in you, otherwise it's not happening, is something that you may not even have been aware of that shift because it was still so much identification with thinking and from the point of view of thinking, nothing much is happening here. And this shift is the shift and it is an enormous, incredible transformation in a human being.

When that happens, it is a shift from being based in thought to being based in awareness. It is the shift from being dominated in the grip of thinking, the continuous stream of thinking and self-identification with thinking to what I sometimes call consciousness without thought. Now, thought will jump in now and make that into a problem and into something to be achieved.

How? Through more future. Okay, that sounds great, how do I get there?

That dimension of consciousness is already fully developed in you underneath the stream of thinking. That's why you can't get there. If something is already fully here, you can't get there.

That could only take you away from it. So what a little hint before I continue that some of you may find very useful as you sit here, there are two dimensions one could say to this talk, the words and the spaces between the words. Usually an audience, when an audience comes to listen to a lecture or a talk, all they are interested in is the words, the concepts, the thoughts, which they can add to their mind, the content of their mind, the content of me.

It is rare, very rare for an audience, a listener to be conscious not only of the words which in you exist as thoughts, they go into your ears, become little nerve impulses, are then decoded and become a thought, that's on one level. On another level, the entire talk is happening within you to be conscious not only of the words, but of the ground that underlies the arising, the coming and going of words. Now in you, what is auditory perception becomes thought.

If you become conscious of, which all that that means is notice, this makes it more simple. If you notice not only the words, but the space or stillness between the words, which is there, usually ignored, then sitting here, can be a very powerful transformation within you. Why?

The mind wants to understand why, so will satisfy up to a point, the mind, only up to a point. Because if you become aware of the silent spaces, the ground, like the canvas, the space or the silence, the stillness, the gaps is where the canvas, so to speak, shines through. There's the words and there's the background.

The words are the foreground. Awareness of the background does something amazing inside you. Awareness of the foreground, all that it does, all that does is create new thoughts because that's the foreground, the words becoming thoughts.

And there's the mind grasping at each new one. And if you're sitting here only interested in the foreground, you're here with a tension in your head a little bit. And the tension implies, what's the next thing then?

Okay, go on. Oh, and now consciousness of the background, what happens inside you through the simple act of noticing the space or the stillness or the gaps? There's nothing much there.

Thought says, there's nothing there. What am I noticing? Nothing.

From the point of view of the mind, this is true. But every moment that you notice that little space, the underlying space, that is a moment of space inside you. And that is an amazing thing when space arises inside you.

What is that? What does that mean? The mind says, space arises.

It is a moment of pure consciousness with nothing in it except awareness. A space of pure awareness, I've already said too much, just unconditioned. I've recently come to call that space consciousness.

This is not a term from science fiction. We're talking about inner space. The one thing that in your lifetime here, any achievement, no matter what you achieve, if you are poor and deprived and ultimately have not flowered, if you have not found space within yourself, and then all that there was in your life, all that there is in your life is things.

Every thought is a thing. Then you are trapped in a world of things, both external things, and you know what that is like. So much going on, objects, situations, you have to deal with, and the next thing, and another thing that absorbs your attention.

A life dominated by things happening. What's the next thing? And then the inner things, one thought after another, and identified with each arising thought becomes a part of the problematic me, completely dominated by, we could call that object consciousness, objects everywhere.

And when people interact with each other, superficial interactions, relationships, close relationships, families, at work, every interaction is dominated by object consciousness. Something is very important here, and it's not the relationship, it's something that we need to get out of it, something we need to get to, some other point. It's not this moment, it's the next moment, that is always goes part of object consciousness.

What's the next object that matters? No space. No space also, by the way, means no love, because you are trapped in forms, form identities.

Every form reduces you, every form that you identify with reduces you to that form, every thought, and the bundle of thoughts, the me, that's the human condition. To be trapped in object consciousness, not knowing the freedom that is there, waiting underneath it as the vast spaciousness that is within you, that is the unconditioned consciousness itself, where you go beyond a purely personal sense of self. And the amazing thing is, that is so close to you, that you could never get there if you create a distance by believing that something will enable you to get there.

That is the danger that is built into every technique. Some techniques are very good. They are there to bring about space consciousness, but the person practicing the technique will have put the technique between him or herself and the space, and to create it a little bit of future.

So as you sit here, simply to be aware, not just of the words, but also of the underlying space or the gaps, you could call it, between words. And in every moment when you notice that, like now, and now, and now, there you have simple intelligence, and you can perceive this room, the body sitting on a chair, listen to the words, this perception happens, but you're perceiving it through the stillness that is there in between the words. You're no longer perceiving through the conditioned mind that labels every perception, compares it to something, or already projects itself forward to the next moment.

Well, there's going to be something that is more complete than this. And this is an amazing, if this is all, if you have only moments here, as you sit here, of perception through stillness or awareness, in which that which is perceived is not labeled mentally by calling it something, comparing it to something, putting some mental, just, that is an amazing thing. If you can then walk out of here, perhaps in the break, and take a cup of tea or coffee from someone, and while he or she gives it to you, your hand reaches out for the coffee or tea, and within that space of taking this coffee and lifting it, it's happening without mental commentary.

Wow, it's possible that the mind then will come in and say, oh, it's happening without mental commentary. That's okay. Afterwards, it comes in sometimes, but it is an amazing thing.

And from the point of view of the mind-made self, this is not significant at all, because it always says, okay, and yeah, okay, I got that now, what's next? Because the mind-made self is based on what's next and what, and that does not add anything to it. But that is the most amazing thing if, and this is only a tiny, it may arise initially, and many of you, it's arising already, you may not even know it fully, that already in your life, there are spaces.

And I'm absolutely sure that in many of those spaces are already arising, and you may not even have fully known this. You may only have noticed it as occasionally peace in your life as you go about your daily business, a space of peace. You may only have noticed it as inner peace in the midst of doing something perhaps, not beyond that and not perhaps recognized it as the arising of unconditioned consciousness within you.

Thousands and thousands of years of collective human conditioning subsiding as that space arises. And then you are looking at a cup of coffee or a flower or the sea, or you go from here, walk three, four steps down the stairs, staircase, in a state of simple, alert presence. That is an amazing thing, way to live.

What does it, how does that change my life? Says the little me. And above all, how does that solve my problems?

Don't I need to solve my problems first before I can allow myself to explore this dimension of consciousness? Or don't we need to tackle all the problems that are out there in the world, not all the enormous amount of suffering that is on the planet? Don't we need to sort that out first before we can allow ourself the luxury of transformation of human consciousness?

The mind asks. It may be a legitimate question, of course. So much suffering, yes, in oneself and in the world, but what comes first?

Can you tackle human suffering without going to the cause, the root cause of human suffering? Self-inflicted, humans inflicting it on themselves, each other and themselves, so ultimately self-inflicted by humanity on itself, as you saw the warfare, that is human history. Why is all that, where does that madness come from?

Why this need, this seemingly, this inability or unwillingness to live together peacefully? Why can't they do it? Why can't we do it?

What is it that impels humans to violence, not just the obvious violence out there that we see in the world, but also violence in relationships that may not even be physical violence, the violence at work, the fighting battles for a little bit of power, a little bit more position, more power, a little bit more money, a little more right than you, where does that come from, that self-inflicted suffering? It comes from not knowing yourself beyond the needy little entity that is the mind-identified me with its story, which needs, not only does it need more, it also needs conflict.

That's an amazing realization, that there is something in me that needs conflict to keep it going. Why is that? What is the mind-identified self that needs conflict?

Why does it need, look at a simple thing like the need to be right, which is a great source of conflict in relationships. If you look, a lot of conflict in relationships is based on the need to assert my position as right, me to be right, which implies I need you to be wrong. And an enormous amount of emotional force goes into defending one's mental position and proving that I am right and you are wrong.

This is one of the ways in which the mind-made me strengthens itself. Because if I can be right, I have added a little bit to my sense of self. I have diminished yours, it's all delusion, but it works, it's on the level of delusion, of course.

I have diminished your sense of self and I have added something to my sense of self. I am right, I have identified with a mental position and then asserted the position as me. And in some cases, it goes as far as physical violence that need to be right.

Collective entities need to be right too. We are right, our belief structure, which is not recognized as a belief structure, it's called the truth, it's not recognized as a story, it's called this is how it is. And so we are in possession of the truth, our interpretation is not recognized as an interpretation.

We, this is the truth, we are absolutely right, you are absolutely wrong. So we create an enemy and that's enormously satisfying to the mind-made self. You can see how satisfying it is inside you when you can be right.

And so finally, perhaps you've even triumphed and you've shown the whole world that you are right. Sometimes the mind-made me does that by, let's say there's a committee meeting or something and one person gets up and shouts his or her point of view and before anybody has a chance to question it, they walk out of the room. Just say, you are all totally wrong.

This is how it is and then quickly walk out before anybody can challenge it. And then you walk and then feel enormously enhanced in your sense of self and then it wears off. So then it has a need for enemies, the mind-made self, because it's a sense of the story of me is defined through those things that impinge upon me, that those things that are problematic.

This is how we all know people who is, where you would say, who would they be without their problems? I'm sure you've met one or two, but of course the question really, some have it more strongly than others. But everybody's sense of mind-made self, a lot of the story of me is the problems of me that go into my sense of identity.

And in many human beings, if you removed the problems, I'm in conflict with this situation and that's, and not much would be left of their sense of identity. With, if you remove the conflict out of the mentally constructed story, the story comes to collapses. What's not much left without my enemies, without my ex-wife and ex-husband and whatever things without the belief that the world has treated me unfairly, which surely is the truth, without the belief that I didn't make it, something prevented me.

So there is a need in the structure of the mind to be in opposition with something or someone. This is the mind-made self is looking for the next thing to be in opposition with, a human being or a situation or a place. Anything will do because, and that is one of the mind patterns that is very, very frequent, very common mind pattern when you are totally identified with the self is complaining about something or someone in the head.

If you're very alert, you can catch yourself complaining a lot of the time and looking for the next thing to complain about. Where's the stain in the carpet? There, that shouldn't be there.

Why didn't they remove that? They should have done something about it a long time ago. Shouldn't they?

Don't you agree? Oh, yes, yes. It's dreadful.

They are just awful. Yes, of course. Every time you complain, you've made something or someone wrong.

A situation, a person, a place, the weather. And when you make something or someone wrong, the fiction of me, the mind-made me, grows a little bit stronger. So every little complaint in the head that you have about a person, a situation or my life, my what happened to me, is satisfying to the mind-made self because at least now you think you know a little bit more strongly who you are.

Your sense of self has become a little bit enhanced through complaining. So some people have that pattern so strongly that their very identity is a complaining one. Me, what they did to me.

Me, life, what life did to me. Oh, let me tell you about it. And so to discover that pattern is liberating.

What does it mean to discover it? It simply means to see it. Oh, oh, okay.

There it goes again. That means you're no longer trapped in it. And that is another instance where when you see something like that, that was a habitual pattern in yourself, that you had identified with completely, when you see it, that also is one way in which the unconditioned consciousness is arising in you.

Because that in you that recognizes, that sees a pattern is free, is not part of the pattern. And the seeing doesn't need to label it. You simply see it.

Any inner pattern that's been habitual in you that was part of your sense of self, you see it internally. You recognize it. Oh.

And perhaps the next time the complainer comes as you walk out of here, and suddenly you see it. Oh, okay. There it was again.

Something is arising that is not part of that. And that is also the unconditioned. That is very similar to you noticing the gap between words here.

That is another way in which that dimension is arising. And so you are becoming free of thousands of years of collective mental conditioning that has created unbelievable suffering on this planet. A nightmare of suffering on this planet.

Simply because human beings have been completely trapped in a narrow, personalized, collective or personal, personalized sense of self, me, form totally identified with mental formations as a me. Human beings have been completely trapped in a narrow, personalized, collective or personal, personalized sense of self, me, form totally identified with mental formations as a me. Complete absence of space.

No space. Therefore, no love, because love arises out of the unconditioned, not through identification with a form as a me. The me form in the head, of course, needs other humans to add to it as a thought forms to enhance my sense of self.

Maybe, okay, you are the ideal person. You meet someone. And very often when there's a strong attraction, it means that this person is ideally enhancing my sense of self.

I feel more myself when I'm with you. You are here to fulfill me. And we are going to sign a contract that you are going to fulfill me for the rest of my life.

And I'll get very angry if you don't. And it usually happens. The anger comes.

The anger comes and the frustration comes because nothing in this world can live up to the expectations that you have as a mind-made little self with its story that's as yet incomplete. Nothing in this world can live up to those expectations because the story-based me says, okay, do something. Make me complete.

It's looking for places, situations, conditions, people. And sooner or later, and usually sooner, frustration sets in. It's not living up to expectations.

It's not at every retreat, we have some people who get extremely unhappy because their accommodation does not live up to expectation. I hadn't booked, I had booked a better room. I'm not saying you can't go to the office and say you made a mistake, I think.

I'm in a shed and I booked the best. Okay, we made a mistake. Or they say, no, well, nothing we can do about it now.

The world let me down again. And that's the strange thing. And you may have noticed the world lets you down a lot.

That includes people. And then the little me comes up with strange theories and interpretations. The story becomes very twisted.

And it says, I'm not trusting anybody anymore because they've all let me down. That's how they are. They're all like that.

They talk about spiritual, but even the spiritual people let me down. And the story then gets incorporated into the story. And that is a little bit satisfying at least.

The world lets you down, but then the story that you form out of that gives you a little bit of self-enhancement because obviously you are right and increasingly the entire world is wrong. That's, you can feel inflated in that way. It can go to the, it can go the borderline between what we call sanity and insanity is not clearly defined.

And when you look at what is usually called insanity, and then you see most of it is just a little bit more pronounced versions of what is normal. You can see it more clearly. Oh.

Oh. And we call a person insane, just a little bit more of identification with that. Identification with a story, complete absence of space.

Oh. So that a dreadful fate going through life and never realizing the most what is both the most simple and the most profound thing in a person's existence, which goes beyond the person. Never realizing that's something of such simplicity, which is knowing yourself, not as that which arises in your consciousness, in consciousness as objects, thoughts, sense perceptions, situations, events, emotions, knowing yourself, not as that which arises, but as the space in which all those things that make up your life, which ultimately is not your life, but only your life situation, all those things that make up your life, that conventionally you would identify with as my life, a dreadful limiting thing, those things that arise, come and go, knowing all those things ultimately not to be who you are and knowing yourself to be not that which arises in consciousness, but consciousness itself. As you sit here, what does that mean? What arises here, words, thoughts, sense perceptions, they come and go.

Underlying it, there's a space of awareness without which nothing would arise. If you were not aware, there would not be this room. They would, it all comes to life in your awareness and simply noticing the space, which is the inner space of no thought.

Oh, somebody said, truly, I tell you, unless you become as little children, you cannot enter the kingdom of heaven. Now, to know what he meant, you have to look at a little child and how a little child perceives the world and perceives you, one year old, one and a half, before the entire structure of the conceptualized mind, including the conceptualized me, before all that begins to come into operation. There is a time in a child's life when they perceive the universe through unconditioned consciousness and there's an innocence and a clarity and a love that flows through their eyes.

And you can see it when you are very alert and you watch a child and a joy, he or she looks at you and you look into the child's eyes and it's liberating because you are not being judged by the mind. There is a pure awareness looking. And with that pure awareness always comes a very subtle joy, which is a simple joy of aliveness itself.

It has nothing to do with your life situation. And the child has that for a brief moment as awareness grows before the mind takes over. Then we go through identification with mind, the story of me.

We begin to suffer, life gets difficult, heavy and serious. It's a serious business, this life, very serious. You better take it seriously too.

And you carry a burden of yourself. The conceptualized self becomes the burden. And then there's the possibility of realizing who you are beyond that.

And then you encounter the childlike state again. It's the same and not the same. In one way, it is the same openness, space of awareness.

And yet, if you have been through the dimension of thought and you've come out the other end, so to speak, which we all have, which humanity has now, there is an added dimension of depth to that awareness that is not yet there in the child. And yet, it's very similar to that state. Innocent perception, innocent, open perception.

The ability, and this is essential, the ability to look. And now I'm using look in a wider sense than just referring to visual perception. I'm using look as almost an analogy for something deeper, which the ability to hold in awareness whatever arises, the ability, one could say, to give attention to whatever arises in this moment, to meet everything that comes into the space of now with that innocent looking, which begins with looking at a flower without labeling it and thus realizing how alive that really is, that you don't really know what it is, that it remains a mystery, that it has a depth to it that you didn't know about it before because you thought you knew what it is when you gave it a name.

And so, to look at a flower in that way where you suddenly know its sacredness and its beauty so deeply as not being separate from who you are, and then to look at another human being in that way. In other words, to meet things and people through that inner dimension of space, which is also unconditioned intelligence itself, in which it appears that you don't know anything, and yet a far deeper intelligence than the conceptualized mind is suddenly flowing through you. And then to meet a problem, a challenging situation, not so much a problem because all problems exist in the head, or there is really a situation that may be challenging, to meet any life challenge, not a story in the head, but an actual challenge which can only be here now, to meet any challenge in that state of clear, aware, alert presence.

And to simply look at it within that alert spaciousness, that means an intelligence far greater than the conditioned mind with all the things that it has learned can now come in and deal with the situation. Some people have encountered that when they were faced with life or death situations, and they had never heard any spiritual teaching like that, say simply, suddenly the mind stopped and they were able to confront the situation in that state of complete alert presence. And they just looked.

Whenever there's a true emergency, the mind is far too slow and it doesn't have enough intelligence to deal with it. So it sometimes happens that the mind steps aside because you want to survive, the mind steps aside and the unconditioned consciousness comes through in that moment when there's a life-threatening crisis. And then you become far greater and deeper and more intelligent than you thought you were because it wasn't you.

You stepped aside, you as the mind made me stepped aside. And then that came through and out of that action sometimes comes and you find yourself doing without premeditated, saying, okay, now I need to run over there, jump into the water and pull this man out of the water, but it might be cold. Should I or shouldn't I?

No, none of this happens. You're just like a bird sitting on a branch. The bird, there are no thought processes involved.

In animals, they are beautiful expressions of consciousness but they're not thinking. Should I or shouldn't I jump off this branch now? It could be dangerous.

Let me think about it. Now, when you look at a bird, you will notice strange movements, the typical bird movements. Every animal has its own way of being in the world.

And the bird is, as all animals are extremely good at looking, there's an intelligence in an animal that operates beautifully, that has become obstructed in humans. Animal is limited, yes, through its form, it has certain limitations, but it lives in greater harmony with the totality because it is a more perfect expression of the totality than humans are. So the bird is sitting on a branch and it looks, and to a human observer, it might appear as if the bird were thinking about what to do next.

But it's not, it's simply looking. Or the cat, now, due to the limitations of animals, a cat cannot help feeling desirous of eating the bird. The cat cannot go beyond that condition pattern.

And yet, within the limitations of its form, it operates beautifully. The cat, when a cat also looks, whenever a cat comes into a new place, comes around a corner or up a hill, and then the cat doesn't just move on, it stops and it looks. And then at some point, movement happens.

No premeditation, it simply happens. And usually they do the right thing. And all, you can, anywhere in nature, you can observe how things function, how beings function without thought, beautifully.

Now, we as humans can learn from that realm of functioning as pure expressions of consciousness, but we cannot go back to the pre-thought stage, although we try sometimes very hard. We try very hard through all kinds of things that get us out of our minds that we can't stand anymore with its heaviness and its problems. Give me another drink.

Oh, I feel a little better now. I'm not thinking that much. I can't even remember my problems.

And then another one. Oh, that feels good. And so you are leaving the problematic evolutionary stage level that we call thinking, but you're not moving beyond thinking.

You're falling below thinking. And even that is liberating from pain. It liberates you a little bit from the dreadful pain of thinking.

I've identified with thinking. And then one more drink, and finally you drop off the chair, you fall off. So you have successfully left the thinking realm but you've moved into pre-thought and unconsciousness.

And you're now on your way towards the vegetable realm. And if you become even more unconscious, you will move to the mineral realm, which also have some consciousness. It's beautiful for minerals to be minerals.

They are not in a world of problems. Minerals are fine, but we are not moving back there. It is the destiny of humans to step beyond thought.

And it doesn't mean that they're not going to think anymore. From then on, thought operates quite beautifully when it's needed because thought has become free of self. It has become simply functional and it's a beautiful function.

It's become free of claiming to be someone, to a me. So where does that leave me? Who am I if I'm not that?

A pattern arises in you, for example, complaining, needing to be right, whatever the pattern is, and you see it. Look, you look at it. Before, you thought you were that pattern.

You didn't know it was a pattern. It was the problematic me. Now you see it as a pattern.

It loses its sense of self. And you are the space within which that is seen. You are that which sees it.

The awareness that sees the patterns. So the story continues of me until it comes to an end, which it does, sooner or later. But while it continues, yes, it's still there.

My past is still there. And yet you even honor it, but you are not seeking yourself in it anymore. This is the form as which you appeared or continue to appear for a little while in this world of form.

And yet you know yourself to be the consciousness that underlies all forms as that which sees, the aware presence. As you sit here, you listen to the words. You are that which listens.

Not what you're listening to, the listening. You are the listener or the listening. When you see, you are not that which you see.

You are the seeing, that which sees, not that which is seen. And that means self-realization beyond the little self that was conditioned. And even when you think, you are not looking for yourself in the thoughts as identified with each little thought.

You are that in which thinking happens, the space in which it happens. And that's a wonderful choice. Freedom, ultimately, freedom from form, freedom from the world, because the world is the world of forms.

And every form has a limited lifespan. It's amazing how quickly forms go. Everything in your life, every experience, every situation, it's here one day and the next day it's gone.

Even this morning, breakfast somewhere, where is that now? It's disappeared, the experience is already gone. You arrived here, you were looking forward to coming here, now you're here, but you're on the express train of time which operates on the surface of things, not in the depths of consciousness.

But on the surface of things in the world of form, time seems to be the dominant force. And it seems that you can't get out of that express train. It pulls you along.

And now you're sitting here and before you know it, the conference is past, it's gone. Oh, that was nice, we had a nice session. You can hang on then to a thought form.

And even that, eventually forget about the conference. And then you have a photo, that was the conference. And then the photo fades, and then you can't, what was that, there are few forms here.

They must be people, but I can't. It's amazing how quickly time dissolves things. And frightening to the mind itself that wants to hang on to something permanent.

Surely there must be something permanent that I can hang on to. No, and so that's why everybody lives in fear. Because deep down, everybody knows it's not going to last.

It's not going to last. I'm looking for something that's going to last. That is a sense of truly being being, of being rooted in life, of being impermanent, a sense of permanency, of, ah, at home.

I want to find home, I want to be at home. Let people live their life. They're never feeling at home.

I haven't arrived yet, wait. And you can't in the world of form. It is not in the nature of the world of form to satisfy you if you're looking for yourself.

That's why it's so frustrating, this world. And that's why you've all seen how, when you finally find the ideal form that you thought would complete you, which might be a situation or a person or a place, it didn't quite live up to expectations. Something came in there that spoiled it all again.

And that's how it is. Every form is already being consumed. That's why a poet wants to compare time to a fire, and it's burning you up.

And that's beautiful, to see how impermanent all the forms are in this life. To the little egoic entity, it is dreadful. Now, why is it liberating to see it, to see that the story of me will end, will finally become the dash between my date of birth and my date of death on my gravestone?

It will become reduced to a one-inch dash. And it mattered so much. It was so serious, my achievements, my successes, my failures, what people did to me and what I didn't achieve.

And it was so important. And then the soap bubble pops, and sometimes very suddenly, and that's usually regarded as the most dreadful thing. But death is something very strange.

What is death? A form dissolves. Where there was something, suddenly there's nothing.

And it could be the death of a person, or it could be the death of something that was important to me, a thought form, something I had identified with as me. It could be a whole way in which I had interpreted the universe. I had sorted it all out in my mind.

I knew exactly where things fitted in where. My little universe was my philosophy of life. And suddenly, death comes and goes whoop, whoop.

But my explanations don't make sense anymore. And that's what death can do. It removes form, not only from out here, it can also remove form inside you as thought forms.

That can be very painful, but it can also be an incredible spiritual opening into formlessness. Because what's left when a form dissolves, and this is why every death is sacred, whether it is the death of a person, or if you have even said, some of you may have sat with an animal that died, and even death of plants. There's always the dimension of the sacred that comes into this world through death.

And I'm not denying that death is also sad on the level of form, that tears may happen when a form dissolves. And yet, whenever a form dissolves, there is suddenly that space that is beyond form. It's like a little opening of space appearing in the fabric of existence that before was so neatly arranged, my house, my living room, every item of furniture was in its place.

And one day I come home and it's collapsed. Where there was a house, there's an empty space. That's a form of death too.

And when it's not resisted through running away internally into future, into some thoughts, some new thoughts, to explain it all, when my explanations, okay, there must be some explanation. Just be with it. Surrender to the factor of death, no matter in what form it comes, because it'll come.

It comes all the time in one form or another. How can you be in this world without encountering death? And is death the dreadful thing that it's made out to be on one level?

Yes, it is very sad. There is pain, perhaps emotional pain. But if you are in touch with who you are beyond thought, you will encounter the strange phenomenon of sensing peace underneath the emotion, which may be pain.

So in any kind of death, a form dissolves. And for a moment, there's an opening into the formless, the unconditioned consciousness, which is sacred, shines through. But you need to allow it internally.

When we are all conditioned into believing that it is the most dreadful thing and a terrible injustice, that there should be such a thing as death, the fact is, there is. And so ancient cultures that were still in touch, where people were not so completely absorbed in thought, they could sense the sacredness of death. And there are always signs of respect whenever a person dies.

In more ancient cultures, people would feel very reverent suddenly. They might have hated that person who suddenly died. And yet the moment this person dies, they show great respect.

They take off their hat, make the sign of the cross, and are very quiet and whisper, as if in the presence of something, some great mystery, which is the truth. They are in the presence of a great mystery. Okay.

But it's not hidden as it is in Western civilization. Death is denied that no dead body must ever be seen unless you're a close relative. Don't look at death.

In ancient cultures, you see the dead body. So welcoming death when it comes into your life as an opening into the formless one life, one consciousness, which is, as you sit here, we are all dying. We are dying to a false sense of self.

And it's beautiful. That's a beautiful death. You've probably died quite a bit already.

To be capable of sitting here and embracing that death of that self voluntarily, you must already have died perhaps a few times, so to speak. And that was painful because there was still resistance. You suffered, otherwise you wouldn't be here.

Suffering is another way. If you want to avoid spiritual teachings and omega conferences and retreats, then eventually suffering will work also for you. It may take a little longer.

The only thing with spiritual teaching is it speeds things up. If you're ready. You may not have noticed that we are talking only about one thing all the time.

Space, whether it's through death, whether it's through becoming aware of space space during this talk, perception, looking without the conditioned mind. It's only a habit, a deep seated habit of labeling everything. So all we are doing, we're going to move our bodies in a little while.

The secret is of this transformation is not so much to make it happen, but to allow it to happen. Because if you think that you have to make it happen, that can easily become another problem. And the fallacy of believing that you need to achieve a particular state, which is very widespread in spiritual circles.

I need to achieve a stage. It's called enlightenment. That's why I'm here because I want to achieve that state.

The truth is you've achieved it already. It's the unconditioned that is already there underneath the conditioned. So how do I fully know that?

I don't, why believe the speaker when he says you are enlightened already. You can add that to the content of your mind. How do you truly know it beyond believing?

And the key to that is, and this is a very powerful portal into space, inner space, the most powerful. We are going deeply into that for the rest of this afternoon, deeper and deeper into that space. And that powerful portal is simply called to allow what is now.

Because what is and now are inseparable. So I don't even need to say now. To allow what is to be as it is.

Because it already is. That is the most powerful opening, voluntary opening. Death is an involuntary opening.

To allow is a voluntary opening. To allow internally this moment to be as it is. The form that this moment takes, which changes all the time.

And a lot of the time, people don't want the form that this moment takes. They want another moment. Not this, I want that.

And when they get to that, they don't want that. Because the mind structure always wants the next and more. Allow this moment internally to be as it is.

And you will notice enormous power comes with that which the ego, egoic little self tells you. You will become powerless if you don't fight anymore. But you become empowered.

And space is that which arises. Whenever you allow this moment to be, no matter what form it takes, because there's only one moment ever, which is this one. The form it takes changes.

The moment doesn't change. It's a fallacy to believe that many more moments happen in your life. There's only ever this moment.

Can't get out of this moment. But the form changes. There's the space of now, which is the space of consciousness, which is you.

The form changes. And usually people resent the form it takes. It's not quite right yet.

This isn't what I wanted. So there's an internal no to the form that this moment takes which keeps the little of me going. But it's the story of no.

The no keeps the story very much alive of me. If I'm not fighting anymore, then the story will dissolve. Who am I without?

You bring a yes to now. With that, suddenly there is space around what happens. This is only a way of putting it.

And that's an inner space, spaciousness. So here's that annoying little thing happening again. And instead of the usual reaction, there's simply the recognition that you cannot argue with what is.

You can, but it's called suffering. And then you, internally, you become aligned with whatever form this moment takes. Instead of reacting to the form that this moment takes, which strengthens your own form identity, the illusion of me.

The reaction keeps it going. Ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah. Whatever the reaction is.

Complaint, ah, ah, ah, ah, ah. And so you bring a yes to now, uncompromising, because it is. Otherwise, you're accusing the universe of not doing a good job.

You say, I could do better. This isn't how things should be. This isn't how life should, but it is.

Now, don't mistake a mental interpretation of what is for what you need to allow. Now, this is very important because otherwise, you might think that, let's say, you lost your money on the stock market. There may be one or two here who experienced the dark night of the soul.

So, and that's good. It all makes sense. You lost 80% of your money, okay.

And 80% of your sense of self, perhaps that was part of what you possessed is also dissolved. And now, what is it that you allow? Do you allow the story that, okay, I worked for nothing.

I saved for the past 30 years. I've been working for nothing. I've had three marriages.

They failed. Now I failed at this. My business empire has also collapsed.

I've, it's all been quite pointless. And it's too late now to start anything new. What could I possibly do now?

So life has dealt me a dreadful blow. This is called a story of me. And as such, it's satisfying, even if it's an unpleasant story, at least it tells me who I think I am.

I still have an identity and I keep telling myself, my story of me. You want to listen to me? Listen what happened to me.

Dreadful. And so that's not when I say allow what is, we're not talking about allowing some fiction in your head because that isn't, it's a story. It's a thought movement.

It's much more simple, allowing what is to be. Allowing what is to be refers to is. This moment, which in the case of the person who lost his or her money on the stock market means standing at a bus stop, waiting to catch a bus, breathing, looking around at the sky, the trees, the aliveness in your body, other people walking past.

Then the bus comes, getting in, paying your fare, sitting down, watching. And there's an alertness and there's a beauty. You're watching the dance of life going on all around you.

You know at the back of your mind that you're going to visit your attorney to file for bankruptcy, but that's the story. Every moment you have a choice. It's not that you forget what this trip is about, but what is it that dominates your consciousness?

Is your consciousness being absorbed by your story or is your consciousness present? Are you totally absorbed in the conditioned consciousness or are you present here as an aware, a space of awareness, which is who you are beyond form? So another way of putting it is, are you here as the form only or are you here as the formless one consciousness honoring, yes, honoring the form that you are while you are in that form.

That's why you're going to see your attorney. So you honor it and then you see your attorney and then you shake hands and you look into his eyes. There's just, and you sit down and you breathe and then you sign a few papers and then you look for somewhere to live.

You pick up the phone and then you sit in a little room on a, not as comfortable as before and you're just present with what is. And occasionally the story will want to come in and get hold of you again. And occasionally you get lost in it again.

Now, the amazing thing is the more you are out of the story, the more intelligence begins to operate in your life that it even affects the story on the level of story. So the likelihood that something that is pointing towards harmony, something that is fits into your needs at this moment will come in is far greater when you're out of the story than when you're in the story. And perhaps trying to look for a solution from within the story where you are an unhappy, failed entity trying to become a happy, successful entity, that's hard work and it may not work at all.

And if you get happy, you won't be happy for long as just that entity. But if you can step out of the story as much as possible and be the aware presence, you'll be amazed how much intelligence comes into your life to support you, not just from within by finding yourself suddenly doing the right thing. You do something and it just happens.

You suddenly have an idea. It may even come as a thought. Oh, that's what I'm going to do.

And then you go and do it. Or you're walking through a park, not with the burden of the story of me, but as an alert, aware presence. And suddenly you run into somebody and he offers you a job and you just lost your last job and you lost your money.

And so synchronistic events, coincidences come very often, almost one could say miracles come into your life when you access the unconditioned consciousness. And when you don't access it, you are very limited. Life is still flowing through a little bit, but it can't flow through a tightly tied knot, which is the egoic me entity, which is, it's a state of contraction.

And so nothing can flow, not only the energy in your body, the entire intelligence of the universe cannot fully express itself through that knot. So an amazing power operates in your life when you access that, which is so simple. So it's essential not to get your life, have your life absorbed by the story of me, which is thoughts.

It's another way of putting, not to be absorbed, all your attention being devoured by thought, to step out of that, step out of the story as much as possible into the space of now, and then become friendly with the space of now instead of antagonistic towards now. Become friendly with whatever appears in the space of now. That great power lies in that when you no longer deny internally whatever appears, even if it is death, because sometimes death will appear in the space of now.

Whatever appears in the space of now, you become friendly with it. Whatever, because it is. If you talk to physicists, you will see that they tell you there's ultimately what we perceive as separate beings, objects, things.

It's only on the surface of our sense perceptions where we see everything is separate. The chair you are sitting on, your body, the flower, all a web of interconnectedness. The entire universe is one being, one could say.

That means nothing that happens is a separate event. It's only appears to be a separate event. And it appears to the mind as if this should not be happening, at least not to me.

So when you look at events through the conditioned me entity, you will have a personalized and reactive relationship to whatever happens. And that's very problematic. You have a person that's complaining that this shouldn't be, and you would know.

Very personal, everything becomes a personal insult almost to you, to your story. How dare you say that to me? How dare he say, how dare he not call me back?

How just, he didn't call. He let me down. Three times he let me down, he didn't come.

Are you going again to meet him? No. Keep the story out of it and stay with the simple facts.

Nobody lets you down. They either gave you the money or they didn't. They either came or they didn't turn up.

That's how it was. And if they didn't turn up, that's how it was meant to be because every event is connected to the whole. Everything that is, is an expression of the whole.

So there is an inevitability to whatever happens because if everything is connected, nothing that is could be otherwise. And that's strange. And then the mind says, no, I don't agree with that because there's so many dreadful things.

Yes, of course. They're created by the unconscious human mind, most of them. But even there, you're not going to solve the problems of the universe through resentment or anger.

This is how it is. And then intelligence operates. And very often what is, changes.

And even non-disharmonious conditions change. But first they are allowed. There's the space with which they are being perceived.

You look, the power that lies in looking at a situation, just looking. And then intelligence operates from within and without. Miraculous.

So that's why we are here, to move into that space or rather to know ourselves as that space. So simple. And not reducing all there is, which is now, to a means to an end.

The end is the mentally projected future. And every human being becomes a means to an end. If you reduce this moment to a means to an end, the only place where you can meet another human being is in this moment.

So whatever appears in this moment then becomes a stepping stone to where you want to get through this person. Maybe he or she will enable you to get there. So it becomes a, it's being used.

The other human being is being reduced and used. And that's nothing personal in that. It's the collective conditioning of the human mind.

And then you slip into roles because part of the story of me is that you're through identifying with the thought forms that make up the story, you fall into a role that you play that is an essential aspect of being identified with a story because the story is that you identify with and it becomes also your role that you play in the world to yourself and when you relate to others. Whatever your function is can become the role that you play. Whatever relationships you are, you are then, you may be a successful role or a failure role or different roles put together.

You're a mother and you're a working mother or you're a divorced single parent or you're, and then many other things go into the role that things you identify with. Your function, it's dreadful when a function becomes, you identify with a function, a temporary function in this world and it becomes the role that you play which could be the CEO of a big corporation. If you get trapped in that, that's just as dreadful as getting trapped in a role of being a person who sweeps the road that you can get trapped in that role also.

It could be a role of me not being good enough, of me as a failure, of me as the great one. Then you relate to other humans through the role. You reduce them because you're imposing then other mental images onto the humans that you relate through your own story and your own role.

You impose another role and another, an image mind made self on the other person. Begins with a simple thing as meeting a shopkeeper, a waiter in a restaurant. You're going to a store, not to the man in the store or the woman, unless he or she is already going beyond that.

You probably are a customer. To you, he's the store assistant and you both want something from each other. You're not meeting.

You want the present moment in which you're meeting is a means to an end because you want to buy something, you want to get a good price. He wants you to sell you something. He wants you to use it for what he wants.

So yeah, he's meeting a customer and you are meeting a store assistant. No human beings. And then you behave according to the respective roles.

Just one tiny example. And you never meet. It's a pity.

Two humans are there and they never meet. Beyond their roles. Beyond their conditioned selves.

And so even that is a little missed opportunity. But imagine people living together and never really meeting. Families, married couples.

After 20 years, you're not meeting the other human anymore at breakfast table. You're meeting your conception of the other person. Last time you saw them was 15 years ago.

And so life becomes stale and lifeless. And then you do the same to other humans with you have formed already opinions about them. For years, you've carried the image of who they are.

And you meet your opinion of the other person. You meet your image of the other person. They might, sometimes it happens that the other person changes completely.

And this may have happened to some of you. You changed completely through the old consciousness, the old conditioned beginning to dissolve. And it's possible that nobody noticed in your family people you've been knowing for many years because they carry so much the mental image of you that they cannot, when they meet you, that's who they see.

And you have, it happened to me once. I went, there was this total inner transformation. And then I saw a person I hadn't seen in a few years.

And he said, oh, you haven't changed at all. If so, it's space. Give them space.

But first you have to give yourself space. Allow this moment to be. That's the key also to transformation in human relationships.

Very problematic, human relationships. I believe it was Ram Dass who said, human relationships are the sadhana, which means spiritual practice for the West. It was also Ram Dass who said, if you think you're so enlightened, go and spend a week with your parents.

And it's good that one is challenged through human relationships, because if you are not challenged, the patterns that are inside you, many of them might be dormant. You could only, certain patterns may still be there, but many you wouldn't see. It's through the challenges of things going wrong, so to speak, not going according to expectation, things no longer being in their proper place where they should be, things shifting around you.

Somebody wrote this book, Who Moved My Cheese? I haven't read it, but it must be about that. And something that comes very powerfully into human relationships is what, through so many thousands of years of not being who you are, being trapped in a limited conditioned identity and creating so much suffering out of that delusion, that suffering left traces in each human being, that suffering weighs heavily on the planet as the collective field of human pain, that suffering you can sense, sometimes in some places you can feel it almost in the air, that so much suffering created by human beings over millennia, and there's no human being on this planet who doesn't come into this life already with their share of human suffering, the heaviness of human pain.

I wouldn't be surprised if one day they found that in the DNA there's a certain amount of the enormous amount of data. There's also pain that is passed on genetically and in other ways. So humans carry what I have called the pain body, old, genetic, and personal, although ultimately nothing is personal, but let's just use it conventionally, pain from your lifetime, emotional pain, leaves behind traces, energy fields.

They come together. And the genetic pain that is already there that every human comes into this world with, that grows through childhood, through the pain suffered in childhood. The pain body as an emotional entity, each human being carries that.

And when I call it entity, there's nothing strange about it, and I'm not channeling anything here, although it's not in the convention. Many spirit guides call people entity, but this is not channeled in the conventional sense. It just comes from consciousness.

When I call the pain body entity, there's nothing spooky about it. One could say that every thought that you think is a life form. It has being, it has an existence, it's an energy field.

As such, it's a life form, not material, but semi-material. It's a thought, and it has, you know, some thoughts get lodged in people's minds for years. There are some thoughts that take possession, they become part of the thought bundle of self, and they get lodged in there and won't budge.

This is, you know exactly how things are, which means you're being possessed by a thought. This is, I know exactly how it is. That's how it is.

That's, you don't even say, I believe. I know this is how it is. This is how they are.

That's how, so some thoughts live there for years, and other thoughts are passing thoughts. They come, dissolve again. Other thoughts come, dissolve.

They are born out of the field of consciousness. And when you identify with a thought completely, you could say you are born into the thought. This is rebirth.

Your sense of self is in it. And each time a new thought comes, you completely identify with the next thought that comes into your mind. And every time, because your self is in each thought, in a wider sense, you are reborn into the thought when you identify with it completely.

That is the deeper meaning of the Buddhist term rebirth. So the Buddhists ask, I want to say, I want to reach the end of the cycle of rebirth. And when you study Buddhism, sometimes you read the text and it sounds very abstract, and you don't see how immediate the truth of rebirth is.

And there's no need to spend another 20 lifetimes before you can come to the end of rebirth. The question is, are you being reborn at this moment into another thought stream, which means complete identification with it? Are you being reborn into the pain body, which means are you completely identifying with the old pain, emotional pain that you carry inside you?

That's rebirth. And the end of rebirth is not to be identified with it as a self or a me. And so to see how the old pain is an emotional entity, just like a thought, except that this entity tends to be there, can be there throughout your lifetime, and things get added to it.

And you see how that pain body entity, that field of emotion is not always on the surface. You don't always notice it. To see how sometimes in your life, it goes away for periods of time, it's dormant, and you don't feel pain, at least not deep pain.

To see how periodically you go through the experience of intense pain in whatever form, whether it be anger, sadness, heaviness, fear, whatever form the pain takes, how periodically some slight, relatively insignificant triggers sometimes bring up an enormous amount of pain reaction. And how the emotion of pain gets linked into your thought structure, the structure of the self, which in itself is mad enough. It has its dysfunctional ways of keeping alive, as we've seen, how it needs its enemies, how it needs, it feels so incomplete that it always looks for more to add to itself, how it denies what is and makes it into a means to an end.

It lives for the next moment because the next moment will give it the more in which I can complete myself. All the structure of the self, what people perceive as a personal problem in their lives, not real, I think it's the structure of the human mind-made self that is the problem in their lives. The rest is interchangeable.

And so that is painful in itself and it creates further pain, but that gets linked up with the old emotion that people carry that periodically needs to feed on the experience of more pain. That is what the pain body needs to do, that humans carry, because it's a little entity. And periodically it wakes up and says, I want more, more pain.

And then it looks around, it begins to move. It looks through your eyes, the emotion, then you're looking, it's no longer spacious. You're looking becomes emotional and an emotion looks through.

There's nothing wrong with emotion except when it becomes a self. So the emotion looks through your eyes, looking for trouble. And so as somebody once described it, you could say, well, some people live like that.

They are in the grip of pain body 80% of the time, it happens. Somebody once described a person like that, a grievance looking for a cause. And of course there are many causes you can find to be angry about, sad about in this world.

And it's easy. And in your relationships and about yourself, when you look at the story of me, you only start thinking about the story of me and you start getting anxious or resentful or angry or sad. And if the pain body, it's time to awaken, the pain body will then move and become linked to your thought processes.

The emotion becomes linked with your thought processes. The emotion of pain, which ultimately is not you, it is human pain, becomes you, it becomes personal. It becomes part of the story of me, which then becomes amplified, which it was already painful even before the pain body awakened.

But when the pain body awakens, the story of me becomes amplified in its energy and becomes a very unhappy one, big drama. So the pain body will begin to feed on your thought processes because your thinking will reflect the energy field of pain body. The emotion then controls the thought processes.

So the work, so the egoic self, the mind made self, the pain body really is an aspect, an essential aspect of the mind made self. They work together and they are really one. And so the pain body periodically needs to feed on the experience of further pain.

And it will use your thought processes on the one hand to do that. The thoughts become very negative, self-destructive or destructive of others. Whether the thoughts are predominantly directed towards yourself or towards others, this just depends on the makeup of how your pain body works with your mind that varies from person to person.

But usually what is the case is that you believe that a certain situation that is part of the story that you're thinking about, that is part of your identity, you believe that the pain is caused by this, this and this, that person or the situation I'm in, the place I'm at, what happened to me. So it's not recognized as human pain that flows into a story and energizes the story and feeds on the thought. Every thought is an energy field and it feeds the emotion that corresponds to its vibrational frequency.

And you can, this is not an abstract thing. You can just, any self-observation will tell you that when you are in the grip of that, this is what happens when your thought processes go. Or whatever you then interpret, it was whatever you interpreted was already a distortion even without the pain body being active because you were looking at it through the conditioned mind.

But what you interpret once the pain body has moved into your conditioned mind and is amplifying the energy of that, whatever you interpret, any situation, any other human being in your life or your partner or whatever, will be a complete distortion because you will see life around you through the emotional pain that you feel and interpret the mind and interpret it through that. It will be a total distortion. This is already, you go a little bit further and it's called insanity.

Only a little bit further. And it's just complete. Then you, if it's fear, you might interpret a person's innocent behavior as threatening.

And that's already, take it a little bit further and it's called paranoia. Only a little bit more. Still basically the same.

And it's just one example of complete misinterpretation. So you inhabit your own fantasy world of pain and then it uses other people. It wants reactions from your partner, especially if you have one.

The experience of further pain coming back through enacting drama in your relationship.

Any excuse will do so that the pain body can experience more pain in the relationship. So it will provoke, attack, do whatever it knows will cause the other person to react.

Give me a, come on, give me a reaction. And usually it happens. And if it's not a partner, it might do it to somebody else at work.

Come on. Even if you can't find anybody because you're trapped in your car, the pain body is very active. It will try to pull another driver into the drama.

And if they knew what was happening, of course they don't know because they're so identified with it, they would know within themselves they are driving and just waiting for something to get in their way or not go fast enough. And then they can draw another driver into the pain body drama. And if that driver is unconscious enough, he or she will cooperate and it works.

They will feed. And if the other person also happens to have a pain body that is in the active period rather than the dormant period, they will meet. They might even get out of their car and the pain body is having a wonderful time.

Now, if you have few relationships, if you say, I'm not having any more human relationships relationships are so problematic that I want to do no more, no more relationships for me. I've suffered so much. I've been through hell.

And you will remember that John Paul Sartre, the philosopher said, hell is other people. And he say, I know exactly what he means. And I refuse to engage in relationships.

And so you sit alone in your room. Maybe you're making money through your computer or something. Or you still meet a few people that as abstractions on the screen.

What is your name? My name is. So the pain body will be feeding on your mind.

That's enough. It'll find enough food there because when the pain body moves from dormant to active, it will move into your thoughts. And then you will sit there brooding or being angry about all these dreadful unconscious people in the world.

So, how do we get out of that which has such enormous momentum? It is collective human pain. With an enormous momentum in everyone.

How do we get out of that? Don't even try to get out. The good news is just see it.

You remember the one lesson really here is to see how powerful it is. The simple act of giving attention, just attention, directing the light of consciousness, which is attention, onto it. This is looking, not labeling, but just looking.

And in the same way, when you feel the arising of emotional pain, you look, not with the eyes. You feel it. You sense it.

And you bring an awareness to it. And really another way of putting that is you allow this moment to be as it is. And if this moment means the arising of pain, emotional pain in you, that is what is at this moment.

And if you said, I don't want to feel this pain, you're creating more pain. Or if you say, I should be beyond this by now, that's more pain and more conflict. But simply, whatever it is, allow it to be, notice it.

So there it is. The fear, my pain body consists to a large extent of very enormous fear, like panic almost, with shaking. So I know what that feels like.

I remember it. And in my case, as it's usually when people are unconscious, the fear became fearful thinking. And so there was the vicious link between thinking and pain body.

But now, if you can be with the fear, not even label it as fear, perhaps, just be with what you feel there, half semi-physical, it'll have a physical component too. The body may be doing something. There may be a contraction, which you sense.

There may be a shaking, or if it's anger, it may feel like fire, raging fire inside you. There it is. And you simply, you can't argue with it.

It's there. And so you allow it. And you look.

Looking and allowing go together. You cannot really look at it internally if you don't, and looking doesn't mean you analyze. Simply look at the emotion, feel it, as almost a physical manifestation, an energy manifestation.

That's what it is. It may be trapped energy. It may be raging energy with some form of energy.

It has some form. And there it is. So by simply allowing it to be, it becomes depersonalized.

Not that you deny it, but the self, the illusion of self, of me, comes out of, taken out of the pain. And you begin to realize, not conceptually, but through its true realization that who you are is to be found in the looking, not in that which appears, but in who is looking, the space, the awareness, the presence, the witnessing presence. You are the witness.

And you see the pain. You feel it. No need to label it even.

It's just there. It is. That means the pain is not using your thought processes anymore.

It's not feeding on your mind. The link is cut between emotion and thought processes. Emotion is seen directly.

That is the end of the pain body masquerading as a self, a me. And that is how the vicious circle is broken. Otherwise, the vicious circle remains and you are forced to reenact the old pain again and again and recreate it in your life through situations.

So, and so the realization comes that karma, what the East called karma, which people usually think is to do with things that happen to me, things that happen to you are a tiny aspect of karma, maybe 10%. 90% of karma is your unconscious reactions to what happens. And a large part of that is the pain body.

So the pain body amplifies what happens, distorts it and creates drama out of it. It can do that with simple situations. I can often see it how people get angry with me because I cannot respond to everybody.

There's too much, so many letters come in as I don't still read them. It is wonderful to see, but then people expect, I wrote to you four weeks ago and you still have not even acknowledged my letter. They don't realize that there are 3,000 other letters, but it becomes personalized.

And there's pain flows into a relatively insignificant event that is nothing to do with this incident, it's old pain. Going back to childhood, perhaps not being acknowledged and going back beyond childhood into old human pain. And so, but they don't see the simple, the neutral event and their reaction to the event through pain, they become one.

Events are neutral, but people, as long as you're unconscious, you mix up your reaction with a neutral event. I managed, I mentioned before saying, he let me down. You're already constructing a story out of a neutral event.

And he promised me something and then he didn't give it to me, that's the fact. But especially if the pain body comes in, that's not enough. The pain, you will react to the fact through the pain.

You will react to the fact through the mind made entity which needs to be right. So can you imagine these two getting going together, really one getting together, the old pain that wants more pain and the mind made self that needs to be right and therefore needs to make somebody else wrong. So he did something to me.

A big drama develops out of that. And you don't, you miss the simplicity of things that there is without the story at this moment. Either he's here or he's not here.

He calls me, he doesn't call me, it's fine. Whatever the demands that are placed, you mentioned earlier, go. They don't understand, he doesn't understand me.

He should, but he doesn't, it's painful. You could have a lot of pain reaction because your father doesn't understand you. A big drama, what difference does it make?

No difference. Why not allow him not to understand you at this moment or Thanksgiving dinner, sit there. Haven't you, you're still not, you haven't found a good job yet.

You still haven't made money. You're still engaged in all that spiritual nonsense, wasting your time. Allow him to, nothing personal, just certain belief systems and mental positions.

And then you can sense who that being is underneath the belief systems and mental positions. Because you've, in yourself, you've gone beyond that. And then you meet your father who doesn't understand you.

And you have then the screen of belief systems and mental positions. And you don't mistake that screen for who he is. That is the true meaning of forgiveness.

In which you realize there's nothing to forgive. There's simply human unconsciousness, it's collective. And so to be able to look beyond that screen in another person, which you can only do if you've gone beyond that screen of mental positions and story in yourself, that is the transformation of human relationships.

That is liberating. You free yourself and you free him. The only freedom is freedom from identification with mind.

And so that's the opportunity in every encounter. Are you interpreting the encounter through the condition patterns in your mind, including the pain body? Are you thereby feeding those patterns in the other person?

Or are you able to allow human unconsciousness to be there because that's the evolutionary stage that humans are at on this planet. Yes, we are moving out of it. We are still trapped, half humans are half trapped in it and half out of it.

It's like coming out of an egg that's broken. The chicken is emerging, we're still half in the egg and half out. The shell of ego has given way and it's a birth.

One could almost say a new being is arising on the planet, but don't make too many concepts out of that. It's a new, almost a new species is arising, but be very careful when I say that because the mind may be looking for something to identify with. And then it might say, think of itself as a new species.

Although when I say that there is a truth in that, but when you get trapped in a concept, you can easily notice that by noticing the unconscious mind movement that we call comparison, because then you'll be looking and saying, is he part of the new species or not? And you will feel superior. That is a sign that mind has come in and you have a new concept of yourself because any feeling of superiority means there's comparison, there's this ego, and there's a new concept.

But yes, a new species, it is very much like that. And it's time for that to happen. That's why it's happening.

We've had precursors before, humans who have already pointed the way, but never on a large scale hasn't happened. This is the first time because it has to happen. So the truth is so simple that it doesn't need to be memorized.

Words have happened here today, not memorable, only as little pointers, not as explanations, only pointers. Pointers to a deeper dimension of consciousness in yourself. If that dimension were not already arising in you, the pointers would be completely meaningless.

Their truth would not be recognized. It's only because the truth is already in you of unconditioned consciousness that the pointers can be recognized and something within you is recognized. Yes, because you know that already.

So there's nothing outside of you that can give it to you. Little pointers can be helpful and that's all. And increasingly, you will become an agent of transformation as you move out into this world.

Because as the new consciousness begins to operate in you, through you, whoever you come into contact with will become affected by that. Even if you don't say anything about it, because the greatest transformative power is to be there as space, not as somebody, but as space. That is the simple truth.

And in this conference, many pointers will be given, perhaps very different ones, but the core truth is that they all will all point you ultimately to that moment of stillness, the stillness that has been here throughout the afternoon underneath the words, in between the words. The stillness that is the space within you and the space that ultimately is who you are.

2015 Eckhart Tolle with filmmaker 23-year-old-Sean Mulvihill for documentary film Living Luminaries Serious business of happiness

When I had been in my darkest moment, I happened to read The Power of Now. What Eckhart Tolle had to say about happiness had been the impetus to go on this journey. I was in Vancouver to meet him.

[Speaker 3] (0:32 - 0:39)

You were there on a park bench for two years, and you slept on the park bench?

[Speaker 1] (0:41 - 0:48)

Rarely, but I did spend most of the days on park benches in parks, different parks in London.

[Speaker 3] (0:51 - 0:52)

Did you eat three meals a day?

No, no. One meal a day if I was lucky.

[Speaker 1] (0:57 - 3:27)

As you sit here, is it possible for you to simply watch what's happening around you without adding any interpretation to it? To just be present with what is, and you get a taste of what it's like to be on a park bench with nothing further needing to be added to this moment. The sounds, sights, people, sound of the water, the light, just allow it to be as it is.

With that comes peace. You don't get continuously drawn into events and thoughts and emotions and reactions. You're the wider space in which all these things happen.

You're the awareness behind it without which none of this would be here. It would just be atoms and molecules in space. You are the awareness that enables this entire world to be.

And so knowing that that is who you truly are, not through a concept, but through the actual realization of stepping back and allowing the phenomenal world to be as it is at this moment. Allowing this moment to be as it is. That takes you deeper into yourself.

And you may notice there's a certain peace in the background that happens. An alertness is required for this. You need to stay alert to what is, to sense perceptions and the energy behind sense perceptions, which is the consciousness.

The alertness is there. Without the alertness you will drift off into thinking. And then you think about the next what's going to happen to me tomorrow.

There is a place for making plans, but not right here on the park bench. This isn't the place for thinking about tomorrow because you miss all this beauty and aliveness around you.

[Speaker 5] (3:30 - 3:34)

And you're in your cold. You don't even think about it as a cold.

[Speaker 1] (3:34 - 4:11)

No, it just is the sensation of it. You don't even need to call it cold. And then that's okay too.

It's okay. The reactivity goes out of life. Always against something or wanting to clutch at something.

What about the search for meaning? Now you notice that just a moment ago you were in that state of alert presence. And it never takes long for another thought to come in and ask a question.

[Speaker 2] (4:11 - 4:28)

Because thought cannot tolerate the state of presence. So it will always come in and say, yeah, but what about, I don't quite understand yet. Can you tell me what does it all mean?

So it wants to add something.

[Speaker 1] (4:28 - 4:33)

It wants to control in some way by understanding what this all means.

[Speaker 2] (4:36 - 4:40)

Now, if you can let go just for a moment, not for the rest of your life.

[Speaker 1] (4:40 - 5:04)

Just for this moment, let go of the need to understand anything. So that you're truly present in this moment. So you don't need to do it for the next hour or the next ten minutes.

Just right now. Just what is. But don't forget yourself because you are the consciousness behind it.

You are the space.

The presence.

[Speaker 1] (5:28 - 6:21)

Can you feel that your body is alive? So stay with that feeling and then perceive. It's easier to perceive without interpretation when you can feel that your body is alive.

You feel the inner aliveness throughout your body. So some of your attention is there. The rest is on the outside world.

That roots you in the present moment. It anchors you in the present moment. And if a thought comes into your mind, you can watch that also.

Just the same way as you watch a dog walking past. You can watch a thought arising in your mind and you don't have to follow it to where it wants to go.

[Speaker 2] (6:21 - 6:35)

So you simply watch the thought that arises in your mind and let it go in the same way that the dog walks past you. Or if you choose to, you can follow the thought and then you can say, I just thought of another question. You can do that too.

[Speaker 1] (6:37 - 7:05)

But to see the possibility that also in the same way that you observe the outer world here as you sit on the bench, you can also observe the inner world, the world of thoughts and emotions. Thoughts want to arise continuously and that's fine, that's what they do. But there's no need to get drawn into each thought that arises and immediately go with it to where it wants to go.

Otherwise you're always following every thought. Like a dog following the scent. Does it matter which?

[Speaker 1] (7:15 - 7:26)

No, it doesn't matter. You can experiment. You can experiment with thoughts.

You can follow some thoughts and you can watch other thoughts. You find out for yourself.

[Speaker 2] (7:26 - 7:42)

You can play. You can see that you are bigger than your thoughts. You don't have to be dominated by your thoughts.

Because thoughts create lots of problems too. Unnecessary problems.

[Speaker 1] (7:42 - 7:55)

And they can obscure the aliveness of life at this moment. There are many people walking around here who are thinking about other things. They're thinking about the next one.

They're thinking about tomorrow.

[Speaker 2] (7:56 - 9:01)

But this is not the place for that. There is a place for planning and thinking about tomorrow. But why spoil the beauty of this and the aliveness of this with thinking about the next moment?

Is that going to be better than this one? This is it. It's not going to get that much better.

This is what could be more beautiful than this. It's the awakening of something within you that is deeper than thought. That's really the main thing.

And that's already there.

[Speaker 1] (9:01 - 9:33)

You just didn't know it. Why didn't I know this? It's a deep-seated habit of being totally identified with thinking.

It's the human condition, which could be described as lost in thought. Because up to now evolution has been unconscious. It was automatic.

But now evolution is consciously chosen by a species. And that's a revolutionary thing. And you are part of that.

I can still make movies. I can still have a girlfriend.

[Speaker 2] (9:45 - 9:55)

Yes, it's beautiful. It's a playground. You play around with the world.

You take action. You relate.

[Speaker 1] (9:56 - 10:00)

But you're not lost in it. Most humans are lost in it.

[Speaker 3] (10:04 - 10:09)

What about pain? I mean, physical pain or emotional pain of losing someone?

[Speaker 1] (10:10 - 10:37)

Most of the human pain is psychologically created. There's an enormous amount of psychological pain. Suffering, I call that.

When suffering goes and there's a possibility for humans now to live without suffering, that is a possibility, there may still be some physical pain. It may be that you get toothaches or bodily pains from time to time. Suffering is another level that lies on top of the pain.

Suffering implies a story.

[Speaker 2] (10:38 - 10:43)

A little me that is unhappy. A mentally constructed entity.

[Speaker 1] (10:44 - 12:06)

A little me that has an unhappy story that is its identity. And that creates an enormous amount of suffering. Not only do you make yourself suffer, you make people around you suffer.

To be at one with life is to be at one with the present moment, because that's the only place where life can be found. You cannot leave the space of now that stays with you, whatever you do and wherever you go. Your life has never been not now, and will never be not now.

Are you making the present moment into an enemy in some way? Internally? Through thinking about something that has nothing to do with now, I need to figure something out.

Well, first of all, be here fully, and then whatever is needed in your life comes. It comes out of the power that dwells in the present moment, that most people overlook. There's an enormous power here, which is the power of life itself.

And most people look for something and ignore this. And the power of life itself is inseparable from who you are in the depth of your being.

[Speaker 2] (12:07 - 12:27)

Many times you will forget, but the moment you realize that you forgot, there's a possibility of saying, Ah, yes, I lost the present moment. And there's a possibility of choosing to re-enter the present moment. The first thing that happens when you re-enter the present moment, you become more aware of sense perceptions.

[Speaker 1] (12:28 - 12:58)

There's a greater alertness. And then you become more aware of the aliveness in your body. You feel the life within.

It's like the entire vibrational frequency of your body shifts when you become present. It's a different state of consciousness. Ah, more alert, more alive.

And many times you will lose it. And then you'll remember, Ah, that's good enough.

[Speaker 2] (13:00 - 13:25)

Now, they don't believe the mind when it tells you, Oh, you can't do it now, you've got too much on your mind, you can't be bothered with the present moment. Those are just thoughts. There's no need for you to follow those thoughts, just to watch them.

They are thoughts that the mind throws up. You don't need to believe in them because they're not true. When the mind tells you, You can't be present now because you've got too much on your mind, then, okay, you can say, Okay, let's see if that's true.

[Speaker 1] (13:26 - 13:57)

Then you feel, There's an aliveness in my hand. There's an aliveness in my body. There's beauty all around.

And you become present again. Alertness, the alertness returns. And when there is time to think, then you think.

Then you sit down and say, Okay, let's think. What plane am I going to catch tomorrow? What time do I have to go to the airport?

What do I have to do now? Pick up the phone, make a phone call? Fine.

It's beautiful. You're not losing yourself in future.

[Speaker 2] (13:57 - 14:07)

It's practical matters. And once you've done the practical matters, you've thought about, you've planned your next week, then you come back to the now.

[Speaker 1] (14:10 - 14:26)

The inner transformation is not really about finding lots of answers to your questions, but finding a new relationship to thought, where not every thought seduces you anymore.

[Speaker 2] (14:29 - 14:38)

And if a beautiful girl runs past and you find yourself following her, you don't have to think, Oh, I shouldn't be watching this girl because I'm not interested in her. I'm spiritual now.

[Speaker 1] (14:39 - 14:54)

No. If you can let go just for a moment, not for the rest of your life, just for this moment, let go of the need to understand anything so that you're truly present in this moment. Just right now.

[Speaker 2] (14:56 - 14:57)

Just what is.

[Speaker 1] (14:58 - 15:04)

But don't forget yourself because you are the consciousness behind it. You are the space.

The presence.

[Speaker 1] (15:49 - 16:04)

Life wants to support you, but first you need to be open to life. So you've probably come here with lots of questions, but let's start off with me asking you just one question and then you can ask yours.

[Speaker 3] (16:04 - 16:05)

Okay.

[Speaker 1] (16:06 - 16:07)

May I ask how old you are?

Yes, I'm 24.

[Speaker 1] (16:11 - 16:22)

Not that it matters. So 24 means you've already had quite a few life experiences. You've been to school.

You've fallen in love.

[Speaker 3] (16:22 - 16:23)

I think so.

[Speaker 1] (16:23 - 16:24)

Fallen out of love.

[Speaker 3] (16:25 - 16:25)

I think so.

And have had all kinds of experiences, perhaps in different places, meeting different people, different circumstances. The body probably has been well most of the time, but you've also experienced maybe one or two illnesses. Now is there in all those things that you have experienced so far, which is a continuously changing flux of things, is there any ingredient in there that was always not the same, that didn't change?

I'd just like to ask you to see if you can find any ingredient in all the things that you have experienced so far that's always been the same. We could start perhaps by asking, could it be the things around you? Obviously not, because the things around you change continuously.

Could it be your thoughts? No, because the thoughts that go through your mind also change continuously. Could it be your feelings or your emotions?

No, as you know, they also change all the time. So what is it, if anything, that hasn't changed, that doesn't change? Is there one ingredient in all your experiences, good or bad, up or down, that's always been there?

I think I've been in here, I've been inside.

Now when you say I, what does that mean? What is that I? Now because we've already seen it can't be your thoughts, because they change all the time.

Your feelings or emotions, they change all the time. Your sense experiences, things that you perceive around you, change all the time. So wherever we look, there's change.

So when you say I and point to the I as that which doesn't change, it cannot be what happens to you. It cannot be the thoughts that go through your mind. It cannot be the emotions, the feelings that you experience.

So what is the nature of that I? What does that word mean or point to?

[Speaker 3] (19:11 - 19:18)

It's the listening. It's what's here, what's behind.

What's behind the thoughts? What's behind the sense perceptions? What's behind all the experiences and the feelings and so on?

So the question that I'm asking does not really require an abstract answer, but I want you to actually feel or sense inside yourself that which doesn't change. No matter where you go, no matter what you do, or who you're with, or whether the body is well or unwell, when I ask, you said it's I and I've asked what's the nature of that I? And now you may be stuck for words, but you said one word and that was listening.

Now, when you're truly listening, there is a certain alert spaciousness, because otherwise you're not truly listening. And so if that had to be expressed through a gesture, it could be, you could raise a finger gently and say, listen. So I say to you, listen.

And you listen, there's a moment of spacious awareness, and there's no thought in it. So when you said listening, you're actually getting very close to the nature of who you truly are underneath all the circumstances of your life. And circumstances includes thoughts and emotions.

If you don't find that, who or what you are underneath all the circumstances, no matter how many questions you ask and how many good answers you get, won't help you very much and there will be no end to the questioning, because every answer generates further questions. So we're talking about becoming familiar with a different state of consciousness. Not that that has never been there.

It's always been there because it's the I, but it's always been overlooked because the circumstances, things that happen to you and your thinking and your emotions have such overwhelming pulling force that they always pull your attention in completely. And so attention is that which is there when you're truly listening. And in the moment of attention there's no thinking, but there is an aware presence.

So, the answer that you gave is absolutely right. Not everybody would have put it this way, but listening points to who you truly are underneath all the things that continuously change. Now I'd like you to, as we speak, this is not an intellectual discussion because if this were intellectual you should have gone to a professor of philosophy or some intellectual at a university.

I've been there. And ultimately you get many answers, but all those answers will always make you end up with more questions because they don't get you to the core of who you are. So let's start off with that.

And what we are pointing to is a sense of I, of beingness, that is deeper than anything that happens in your life. It's always there, has always been there, right now. And that is closely related to the state of attentive listening, to get in touch with that, to sense it.

Underneath it all there is a timeless presence. Even in 50 years' time, in 60 years' time when this body is getting old and this body, the cells, it won't be the same body. The cells of the body will have been renewed many times.

There won't be a single cell materially. There won't be a single thing that's left in 50 years, even though you may still be alive. There won't be a single thing that's left materially, that's here now.

Every cell will have been renewed. And so the body will have grown older and yet something timeless, deep within, will still be exactly the same as it is now, untouched by time. I.

I before it becomes this or that, because the moment you say I am American, I am this or that, I am a professional, or I am a jobless person, or I am a millionaire, or I am a homeless person, those all form identifications with changing circumstances. And so people look for something there to provide permanency in their lives. They want to identify with something that they finally can say there, that's it, I found it.

What they really want to say is I found myself finally. So they look for themselves through external possessions, through acquired knowledge, through an accumulation of experiences, or sexual encounters. Some people derive their sense of self from that.

The more women you can conquer or seduce or have sex with, the more you feel I'm getting somewhere. Of course, after a few years you realize it's not getting you anywhere. Nothing will get you anywhere, which means to yourself, if you are looking for yourself in any experience.

And that's the fallacy of most people. They look for themselves in changing circumstances. They look for themselves in their thought processes.

They identify with their thoughts and opinions and their judgments and this and that, and it changes. Your opinions may change. You may be a democrat now in 50 years' time when you have become a solid citizen.

You may become a republican. You have a completely different set of opinions. It's just a different set of opinions.

And then you feel like the thoughts have changed, but the underlying I hasn't changed. So can you go through life being in touch with that, being in touch with that in different situations, different circumstances, different places, so that you're not completely lost in the things. I sometimes call it the thingness of life, one thing after another.

There's nothing wrong with that. But if you haven't found yourself yet, you don't know what that I is, then you're looking for the I in things. And things include your thinking, because every thought is also a formation.

It has a certain form, a thought form. It comes and then it goes. Every emotion, it comes.

It's an energy field inside you. It comes, has a certain lifespan, and then it subsides, and then another one comes. That's all the thingness of life.

It's forms that come and go all the time. The only thing that doesn't come and go is I, that which underlies all that. And that's not an intellectual thing that I'm trying to convince you of, because that would not be helpful.

The question is, at this moment, can I sense the presence that I am, that is prior to anything that happens to me or has ever happened or can ever happen? Can I sense that right now? Yes, you can, because if you couldn't, you wouldn't have said listening, because listening, you already knew.

It came from that deeper place of alert attention that in itself has no content. The content comes when things happen, but in itself, the I that you are, one could describe it as space. It's not lifeless, it's full of life.

All of life comes out of that, but in itself it is spacious. Buddha called it emptiness, and it's completely misunderstood by people because the university professors look at the word emptiness and then say, the Buddha's teachings are life-denying. The total opposite is true, because Jesus called the same space the fullness of life, because at the same time, it is life in its fullness.

To be able to sense that, at first it's very subtle in the background, but as you become familiar with that dimension, it's always there somewhere, no matter what you do, even when you meet a beautiful girl and you're talking to her. From there, you can listen to yourself talking, and it's fine. You're not totally lost in your experiences.

There's always a sense of aliveness and peace in the background, and that influences how you live your life. That sense, the I, the timeless I, because on the surface you have the time-bound I that grows older, it's identified with thinking and emotions and things happen to it and so on, but underneath it is the timeless I. Now, the word I is probably the most frequently used word in the language.

Whenever you listen to people, they say, what's the word they use most frequently when you listen to a conversation? Probably, you'll find it's the word I. Now, what they refer to is not the timeless, because they haven't found that.

They refer to a superficial sense of I, identification with things, with thinking, with emotions. I am angry. I am American.

I am this. I am that. Identification with something.

So, that I is the greatest delusion, because there is no substance there, nothing permanent.

[Speaker 3] (31:11 - 31:14)

So, if I'm not something, am I nothing?

[Speaker 1] (31:14 - 37:30)

Yes. I would pronounce that differently, though. I would say, you are no thing.

Now, there's a difference between no thing and nothing. Nothing is simply denial. But no thing means there is a presence there, but it has no form, nothing that you can grasp.

It has no shape, and no form, and no name. The ancient Chinese call it the Tao, which cannot be named. There's a beautiful, it's 3,000 years old, Chinese book of wisdom, the Tao Te Ching.

I recommend it to everybody. And the first line in it is, the Tao that can be named, or spoken of, is not the true Tao. And so that there is the presence that you sense, a presence that has no form.

In ancient language, Christian, Hebrew, there's the word spirit. But I don't use that word, because it's been used for hundreds of years and misunderstood. So if I used spirit, people would immediately have some image of what it is, some form, or call it the Holy Spirit, and there's hundreds of years of misconceptions of what spirit is, so we forget about the word spirit.

But in its original true meaning, that's what spirit points to. The essence of who you are is formless. Now we could use the word consciousness as the essence of who you are.

And you can sense it, but you can never grasp it, and you cannot really know it. You can only know something that is not you, an object, anything that becomes an object of consciousness. Once I look at this plant, and I know it by looking at it and by having a thought, a name for it, I say I know this plant.

This plant is an object that arises in consciousness. And I look at you. I see a shape, and a form, and obviously what I see, nobody knows whether what you see out there is actually there, because the image that you have in your mind of your surrounding environment, there's an optical, the eye, like a camera lens, they send a picture into the brain, the picture is translated into nerve impulses and chemicals that reach the brain, and the brain decodes what I see and then reassembles the picture.

And then suddenly I see you. Nobody knows what's actually out there. But let's just leave it.

Here we have, looking at you, this is an object that arises in consciousness, in the space that I am. Then I look away, and another object arises in the space that I am. Or I listen to something that arises in the space that I am.

A thought comes that arises in the space that I am, the presence that I am. But the presence itself, you can't know it in the way that you know a plant, or you know a person, or you know a sound, or you know a thought, because it would have to reflect back on itself. You cannot make it into an object, so you cannot make yourself into an object of knowledge.

You can only be that presence, but you can't know it, because you would externalize it. And this is the mistake that humans have made over thousands of years. They made themselves into an object.

And they talk about me and my story. I'm sure you have one. The story of me.

And so when you make yourself into an object, you live with yourself. Some people love themselves one day, and they hate themselves the next day. And the following day, they're not quite sure.

And then you have some other, and then you have feeling guilt. People have relationships with an image that they have in their mind of themselves, me. People talk to themselves in their mind.

Well, that wasn't very good. You didn't do a good thing. You shouldn't have done that.

Who is talking to whom? There's a voice in the head that talks to yourself. The mind has split itself in two and is talking to itself.

And out of that continuous talking comes the story of me and identification with that. And the questions that you are going to ask probably have a lot to do with the story of me. To find out more about it.

About my life. Because, after all, that's what everybody is most interested in. You are here because you are the main character in the story of yourself.

And the main character in that story has quite a few things that he feels puzzled about and doesn't understand and wants questions. And the story, in some ways, it's worked and in other ways it hasn't worked. And so, the character in the story has come here and wants to know how to make the story work better.

Isn't that so?

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (37:32 - 54:21)

Now, whatever answers anybody can give you of how to make the story work better, there are things you can make the story work better, but all that doesn't really help unless you get to the bottom behind the story. The I behind the story. Then, if you are in touch with that throughout your life, the story will unfold with much greater ease because there is a deeper dimension that is there.

But if there's only the story, nothing will ever satisfy the main character in that story. You. If the main character in that story, you, has never known the deeper I, the timeless presence that is the consciousness that you are, the attentive, spacious.

Can you feel that your body is alive? Because when you feel the aliveness inside your body, I call it inner body, the usually hyperactive mind slows down. Now the hyperactive mind is extremely repetitive.

You might have noticed that ninety, probably ninety-nine percent of your thoughts, you've had them before, they are repetitive. So new thoughts are relatively rare when there's only the hyperactive mind. It's just the old, same old things going through your mind again and again.

The moment you feel the inner body, in order to be able to feel the aliveness here, some of your attention has to go from the head within, into the body. So you're removing some attention away from thinking. It doesn't necessarily mean that thinking stops totally, but it subsides, slows down.

There may even be little spaces in between one thought and the next thought. So thinking slows down because part of your attention is in the inner energy field, the aliveness that most people never feel because they're so absorbed in their thoughts they don't even feel that they are alive anymore. So thinking subsides, or even little spaces in between thoughts, and then it's much more likely that thoughts that come then are new thoughts, sometimes they are insights, they are new ways of looking at things, sudden realizations.

They can only come if you are able to calm the mind, but not as something that you feel I need to calm my mind, but simply by diverting attention away from it, not by making some effort to calm your mind. All you do is you take attention away from it, and so then there is more spaciousness, not just one thought after another. And then your thinking actually improves, which means it's more alive, more original, it's more powerful, you have better ideas, and the way in which you interact with people is more real.

Because the real comes not from the accumulated stuff in your mind, that's all the roles that you play, not just you, everybody. Everybody plays their roles, they've been conditioned to play certain roles. You have an image of who you are when you meet a beautiful woman, you play a certain role, you want to have the best possible image, you present the best possible image, and she does the same.

You can observe it when two young people are attracted to each other, they meet the first few days and weeks, they look different from the way they usually look, because they present an image that wants to attract the other, and it's unconscious, it's a role that they play. It's only after the honeymoon, when everyday life begins, that gradually, the image, and you believe that that image that you see in her is who she is, and she believes that you don't know that you're both playing roles, but you cannot keep up the roles indefinitely, so after the honeymoon gradually, they wear down the roles, and then there comes becomes some discontent arises, and suddenly the mask slips, the role is, you can't play your role continuously, the role of me, the attractive one, so that's, to get out of the role playing that otherwise you're stuck with for the rest of your life, you have a certain role for your partner for a while, you have another role for your work situation, you have another role for wherever you go, you slip into subtle differences in the way in which you behave, when you talk to the chairman of the board, or the Dalai Lama, you will behave in a certain way, and then you might notice when you talk to the plumber, there will be subtle differences in the way in which you talk, you play a different role, you think, oh, this is not appropriate here, it's only when you stop playing roles, when you observe the Dalai Lama, how he behaves, now you might have thought, well, the Dalai Lama probably plays the role of the Dalai Lama, but he doesn't, there's such simplicity, openness, and genuineness in him, he talks the same way to everybody, whether he meets the plumber or the Pope, makes no difference, because he doesn't play conditioned roles anymore, and that is only possible when you access a dimension within yourself that is deeper than the mind, and we just did it, or we're still doing it, simply by taking attention away from thought, and direct it into the aliveness of the body, that means suddenly there's some space between thoughts, and then you can relate to other human beings more genuinely, and you don't need to prepare things that you're going to say next, you don't say things in order to manipulate that person, you don't say things in order to create an effect, they simply, spontaneity comes out of that place, the spontaneity doesn't come out of the accumulated stuff in your mind, the spontaneity comes only to the extent that you can access the dimension that is deeper than mind, which we may call the deeper eye, which we may call alert stillness, that is always there, alert spaciousness, access that, so mind subsides, then you live differently, the more you access now at the moment, these are only glimpses for you, but that's good enough, a glimpse later becomes a wider space, so that is something to remember not as a memory, but to remember to do in your daily life as much as possible, wherever you are, whatever you're doing, whoever you're talking to, or even when you're alone, go within sometimes and feel that the body is alive, there's life in my hands, you're not imagining anything, you actually feel that there is an aliveness here, and then once you can feel the hands, you can feel the arms, the feet, the legs, you are inhabiting the body, and the body loves that, it loves your attention, most people don't give their body attention, even if they look after the body extremely, like you go to a gym every day, or you use all kinds of stuff to put on your body, you might think that these people are looking after their body, but all they're looking after is the external of the body, they are not necessarily present within, they cannot feel the aliveness, some maybe they can, but most not, they're only concerned with the external body, here we are concerned with the inner, and it doesn't matter the inner body has nothing to do with what the external body looks like, whether you're 80 years old, or 20 years old, whether you have a young body or an old body, the sensation of the inner body is always the same, it's alive, and the body loves your attention, it's a bit like when you don't give enough attention to a child, after a while the child cries because it wants to attract your attention, the baby does it, and then finally you give, because attention is energy, it's enormous energy, now most attention, attention is consciousness, most attention for most people is continuously absorbed by thinking, you can see it when you talk to them, they're not there, they're thinking, they're looking at you, but they're thinking about the next thought they're going to ask, as you sit there maybe you're thinking about ok, what's my next question? and that's normal, it's not a personal fault of yours, it's normal to lose yourself, and then you lose, that means you're not really present when you're thinking about the next thing, so that's normal, so you don't have to beat yourself up for that, it's normal, but there is another way to live, and that's the way to be present, to give attention not just to your thoughts, to give attention to your body, if you don't give enough attention to a child, of course a child can also become addicted to attention, but that's a different matter, there needs to be a balance, but a child does need attention, it's vital, not an excessive amount, but enough, because attention is energy, and the body loves it as much as a child, it wants to be noticed, it wants your attention, and if it doesn't, it cries, it might become ill, that's the crying of the body, you're neglecting it, you're not you're not you're not inhabiting it, you're inhabiting the uppermost loft in your house, you're in a big house, and you live always in the under the roof, you never go downstairs, there are lots of floors, you have no idea what's going on there, so that's a vital thing, and it is a way of also accessing the space within, that is the eye that has no form, that is the consciousness, that is also intelligence, we think of intelligence as the mind's ability to accumulate knowledge and to solve problems, that's probably what we consider to be intelligence, but that's an extremely narrow view of what intelligence is, what people can measure in IQ tests, is an extremely narrow view of intelligence, I cannot solve the simplest of IQ tests, so I've never done a total test, but I'm sure my IQ would be extremely low, because that is not how this mind works, solving little puzzles, I've never been able to do that, but intelligence is a much vaster thing than the ability to accumulate information, and then regurgitate it, or analyze it, or cut it into smaller and smaller pieces, what they do at universities, research projects, the pieces are getting smaller and smaller and smaller, the PhD subjects are getting more and more and more specialized, because so many people are working on things, and then you have to tiny pieces, like okay, I take this piece and write my PhD about that, you can cut that up a hundred times, and then once you've written your PhD, somebody else comes and takes a tiny piece out of that and says, oh, I can cut this up even further, and that's considered intelligence, but true intelligence, the true intelligence resides in that dimension of alert stillness, if you have access to that, that's where the original intelligence resides, so anybody who is creative, and there are not that many human beings in this world who are truly creative, anybody who is creative has some access, perhaps only in the little area of their field of expertise, they have some access to that dimension, the stillness. Einstein had it, he was very slow, he was not considered intelligent at school, because he was too slow, not suitable for mathematics, and physics, because his thinking was very slow, now what does that mean? It means there were lots of spaces in between the thoughts, he wasn't at school like one of the so-called intelligent children who always, when the teacher asks a question, the hand goes up immediately, I know, I know, that's very superficial, occasionally it may be okay, but there are some children, and that is not recognized by our society, who are very deeply intelligent, but not in the way that we consider, what we consider intelligence, and they tend to be slower. They don't immediately have an answer, because they know it's superficial to have a true answer, you have to go deeper within.

But if you allowed those children to go deeper, then you would see how original their thinking actually is. So when we just went into the, you went into the body, already you noticed some new thoughts came, not the old thoughts. It only requires a tiny space for something new to arise.

Not that you're doing it in order to have new thoughts, you're doing it because it feels good to feel the aliveness within you. And the more familiar you become with that, with inhabiting your body, the more strongly you can feel that aliveness. It's almost as if you could feel every cell of the body vibrating slightly.

And it's a beautiful feeling, just an aliveness there. And that is an enormously healing thing to do for the body.

I really want to know about guilt. I feel guilty all the time for little things I'm doing or that I'm not doing. And there are things that I know I did that were mistakes to other people.

So I know that you're supposed to be free and liberated in the now, but shouldn't I feel bad about this stuff? And what's going to keep me if I'm free and liberated in the now from doing bad things to people?

So, human beings act out of their conditioning. So, every human being is conditioned by their upbringing, by the surrounding culture, by many factors. Conditioned to think and feel and behave in certain ways.

And so people do all kinds of things to other people and even to themselves without knowing what they're doing. They're simply acting out the conditioning of their mind. And Jesus knew that because he said on the cross, Forgive them for they know not what they do.

So humans create an enormous amount of suffering for themselves and others, but they don't know that this is what they are doing. People act out of conditioning. So, when you suddenly see that something that you did in the past created suffering for yourself or others or both, when you see that, the seeing of it does not come out of the conditioning of your mind.

When you become aware of certain behavior or thought patterns in you, the awareness, the presence, the deeper presence that you are, has come in. And from there you can see what you did was very limited. It created suffering for yourself or somebody else or other people and you didn't even know it.

So what was acting at that time? If you say that was me and therefore I must be bad, you are equating the conditioned mind, your conditioned mind, the conditioning of your mind with who you are. If you say, I did that, therefore I'm bad and continuously think about it, you are equating who you are with what we could call unconsciousness.

Unconsciousness means to be totally identified with the conditioning of the mind. So you just have to act it out. Now there are still millions of humans on the planet who live in that way because the dimension of awareness hasn't arisen yet.

So they never know what they are doing. They continue to inflict suffering on themselves and others, to act unconsciously, but they don't know that this is what they are doing. They cannot do otherwise.

So the moment you realize, this is what I did, who you are is the awareness that sees that. Who you are is not what you did. What you did was the conditioning of your mind playing itself out.

So you become, you trap yourself in an illusory identity if you feel that I did that. No. Who is speaking?

Who is I? Are you the conditioned patterns of your mind or are you the awareness that sees, that's the spaciousness within the deeper eye, that sees what the mind is doing, it sees what the mind created in the past, it even sees what the mind is creating at this very moment. If you are aware of the things, the thoughts that go through your head, how you speak to another human being, you may be acting out a role and suddenly there's an awareness that you know that you are acting out a role.

And then comes the possibility of, instead of being the role, being the awareness, and then act in a truly genuine way, with enhanced intelligence. So, the unconscious action was unintelligent action, because it was action created by the conditioning of your mind, which has nothing to do with who you are. So there's a tendency for the mind to personalize the conditioning and say, I did that.

And that creates guilt, and that keeps you trapped in a very narrow sense of self, because you have equated who you consider to be yourself with conditioned patterns that you acted out at the time. It wasn't you, it was unconscious, human unconsciousness. No more.

And now you see it. So you see it and at this moment you would not act in this way, because the awareness is there. Maybe the awareness will stay, and this will never happen again.

It is also possible that the awareness becomes obscured again, and the same behavior pattern happens again, and you don't know it except afterwards, when the awareness comes again. Oh, I did it again. And this can happen quite frequently.

So it's important. It's good to be aware afterwards if you do not misuse the mind, don't allow the mind to misuse the awareness, and make some identity, manufacture some identity out of that for yourself and say, that was me. It wasn't me.

That's the main thing. Who are you? You are the awareness.

Anything else is forms that arise, thought forms, emotional forms, behavior patterns. So your destiny and your purpose in life is to increasingly be the awareness rather than the conditioned pattern. But as long as the conditioned pattern is there, it's there.

It's good if the moment of transformation comes if the awareness is there while the pattern plays itself out. That's the beginning of the end of the conditioned pattern. So if it's a certain kind of behavior, perhaps with women, you do essentially the same kind of thing, and it happens again and again and the awareness comes afterwards and one day the awareness comes in the middle of doing it.

In the middle of it you see what you're doing. There's a seeing of it. And that's the beginning of the end of the pattern.

Then it may just one or two more times the pattern may come up in a weaker form and it will then collapse. So in other words, you're making what was unconscious conscious. And that changes it.

So you do not have to manipulate yourself and try to engineer inner change. I have to make myself into a better person. That doesn't usually work.

It just creates conflict because you have one image of yourself as the good person that you want to be or that you would like to think of yourself as that or you'd like others to think of you as a good person and then you have unconscious behavior patterns that completely contradict that image of a good person. And then for the rest of your life you live in that conflict. The good person can talk to the bad one in your head.

It's just two thought patterns. So that doesn't work. What works is to be the awareness, to see it, to be awake enough, alert enough, and that when the present moment comes in, to see are you present in this moment to what happens in this moment, not only externally but internally also.

And are you allowing it? Don't reject anything. If you feel a thought comes in, an emotion comes in, and maybe it's not a good thought.

Maybe your mind says after the thought has come in, your mind says, oh that wasn't a good thought, I shouldn't have thought that. But they are both just thoughts. The so-called bad thought was just a thought, and the next thought that said that wasn't a good thought was just another thought.

Now, it's possible that the bad thought made you do something bad. That's possible. But the good thought cannot prevent that.

The only thing that can prevent that is to be conscious, so that the thought does not control you. The conditioned mind doesn't control you. Be there as the witness to your thoughts.

Just don't reject anything. So don't go wrong there. I know you're concerned about your mind and certain thoughts that go through your mind.

And you would rather be a good person and have good thoughts all the time, but it's not happening. And I can assure you it's not happening to anybody. Somebody is just having good thoughts.

Because the human mind is the human mind. It has polarities of good and bad and high and low. So don't try to bring about on that level the perfect me.

It doesn't exist. Allow yourself the imperfections. Allow the thoughts to be there.

They come. If you fight them, you make them stronger. People who have the worst problems with thoughts are people who are spiritual, so to speak.

They see themselves or are seen by others as spiritual. They have to live the role, for example, the vicar, the priest. They have to live the role of a spiritual person.

And they cannot admit to themselves that they have bad thoughts. So they suppress and they have bad emotions, anger, resentment. And they say, no, I'm not having bad emotions.

I'm a good Christian. They can't even admit to themselves and that makes it even worse. And then suddenly very bad behavior comes out of them and they don't know where it came from.

So all you have to with thoughts, all you need to be concerned about is to be the awareness. Allow the thoughts. Then they actually have less power over you because you are not don't look for yourself in any thought that comes into your head.

It's not who you are. They're just thoughts. It's not who you are.

If you have bad thoughts for two hours, it doesn't make you into a bad person. It just means that so-called bad thoughts are going through your head and then you watch it and as you allow them, there is a deeper space, the eye. From there you watch thoughts are like clouds passing.

You don't have to follow every thought and then thoughts can become very tedious. You can have one repetitive thought pattern going on in your mind for hours or even days. You don't have to follow every thought when you're aware.

You watch the thought. Then it comes what you're going to do to this obnoxious person. I'm going to kill this obnoxious person.

Comes the thought and then the thought drifts out and the awareness remains. And then it's lost power already. It's nothing.

So you find a spacious relationship with your thoughts that you are nothing that arises in that beautiful space of who you are, the consciousness that you are, which is spacious intelligence. None of that is who you are. They are forms.

They come and go. So thought is not a problem. Be there as the witness to what goes on inside you.

Then change happens by itself. The mind will always have good and bad, up and down. It has polarities.

But that's not who you are and you don't have to act on it. Increasingly you act from the state of aware presence. Action can come from the limited mind and it's not usually skillful action or action can arise out of the state of aware presence.

So that's the end of guilt.

What's the test? I mean, how do you know that this is out of the awareness after the fact? If you could go back and look at your actions and go, yeah, that was out of awareness, but that wasn't.

How would you know?

[Speaker 1] (1:08:21 - 1:11:30)

Well, you know, awareness doesn't create suffering for yourself or others when it comes out of awareness. So you know when you look at action it has a totally different quality to it. It's not self-serving.

The action did not happen because you needed something from that person. Awareness is not needy. When action arises out of awareness you do not need to use the other human being for some purpose, ulterior motive.

But when you act out of the conditioned mind, the egoic mind, you're not only trying to use the present moment because you're hoping to get to some better moment. You make the present moment into a means to an end. You also make other human beings into a means to an end because you want something through them.

So that's where you want to be with this beautiful woman because you want to be seen with her or you want to conquer her and so enhance your self-image. Or you want sexual pleasure from her. But you want something.

If you're acting out of awareness, the acting is not under the law of wanting. It's not that you want anything. And that's also where loving action can only arise out of that because love does not want anything.

True love does not want anything. So that's where it's totally selfless action. And when you look back on it, you can see very clearly whether there was self in the action.

You wanted something for yourself to enhance yourself or whether that was truly action totally free of self. And that's the most effective and the most powerful action is when the self, the image of me, the thought structure of me, goes out of the action and action arises that is totally selfless. That action doesn't create problems.

Such as the Buddhist monk said when he was asked, What's the meaning of Zen? Zen Buddhism. What's the meaning of Zen?

And the monk said, Oh, that's easy. No self. No problem.

That's it. So you begin to live and act without the mentally constructed self. You live from the aware presence.

But for a while, the two are there. And the awareness often comes in after something has happened that was unconscious. And you see it.

Don't beat yourself up. It's only the human condition. But whenever you see unconsciousness has just happened or happened the other day and now you see it or you see it in the middle of it, it's good to see it.

The more you see it, the more awake you become. Don't personalize it. It's nothing.

It's not who you are. That's the main thing.

So, can the now make me rich, powerful, free, happy, smarter, more loving, more loved?

Yes. All of those things. Rich?

Yes. Let's start with rich and then we'll look at the next one. Can the now make me rich?

Yes. Now what does it mean to be rich? Rich means it's not what people think it is.

It's not to have lots of possessions. That may be one aspect of being rich. But rich means to be in touch with the fullness of life.

And the only place where you can find the fullness of life, the intense aliveness that you sense when you are present to now, is here. When you are open to the present moment, what comes in is a gratitude for what is, no matter what it's, a little plant, the air you're breathing, the light that's coming through the window, the sound of a bird, whatever it is, there's a goodness to it. And even if it looks bad, even if it's a dead animal or a dead human, when you're totally aligned with the present moment, there's a peace that comes into your perceptions.

And with that peace comes a gratitude that is very deep. And so you're experiencing really life for the first time when you become present. And so to be in a state of gratitude for what is, is really what being wealthy means.

The present moment is always enough. And so the definition of wealthy, really, is to be, to have enough, to feel already the fullness of life, an expression that Jesus used, he said, I want you to have the fullness of life. And people didn't quite understand what he meant.

Was Jesus talking about shopping malls? That you have 500 shops in one huge shopping mall and you have thousands of things to choose from? Was he predicting the arrival of shopping malls?

Is that the fullness of life? You can walk around and you have lots of money and credit cards and you can buy anything you like. Now there are people who can do that.

They are not happy. So he's not talking about many, many things when he talks about the fullness of life. It's not, he's talking about the one thing.

It's to feel the intensity of being alive. And you can only feel that intensity of aliveness when you're in the present moment with your attention. One way of being in the present moment, as you know, is to feel the inner aliveness of the body.

To feel the aliveness that is in every cell of the body. Ah, it's alive. And the more you go there, the stronger that feeling becomes.

And once you are connected with that, you feel that the world around you is intensely alive too. It was alive before, but you didn't see it because there was too much thought stuff going through your mind continuously. The world became dead because everything was immediately labeled mentally.

That's a tree. That's a dog. The moment you label it, you don't look anymore.

It's not alive anymore. Everything gets deadened through mental abstraction when you go around the voice in your head immediately calling things, calling things names, giving things names. So when you become more present, there's this alert attention with which you meet your surroundings.

Once you know the fullness of life that is already here now, and then gratitude arises for what is, no matter what it is, then living in this way, eventually, that fullness that in essence is an inner realization rather than outer, that's the foundation for wealth, is to feel the fullness of life within. And then, if you live in that way, in connectedness with that, eventually, the fullness of life will also manifest for you externally in various ways. Meaningful activity is a form of wealth.

To know that what you're doing is helping other human beings brings an external fullness also into your life which is a form of wealth. And wealth may also come in the form of things coming to you, more conventional things, home or car or whatever it may be. Those things also come much more easily when basically you already feel the fullness even long before it comes externally.

So basically you feel already wealthy when you live fully in the present moment. You never feel really poor. I perhaps spent ten years of my life at least living what people would say below the poverty line.

And I never felt poor. I always felt rich although for a long time I had nothing. No external possessions.

But life was so fulfilling to live every moment fully present to the moment that I felt wealthy. Abundant. And much, much later did actually external abundance come into my life to some extent.

And that didn't make me feel better. I feel just when now I have a car during those years I used a bicycle mostly or the bus and I don't feel better now because I have a nice car. I feel exactly the same.

But it's nice to have a nice comfortable car with air conditioning in the summer. But it makes the fullness hasn't changed. It hasn't done anything to change that.

So the foundation is to be fully alive in the present moment. And then it is much more likely that external wealth will also come to you as an outer manifestation of an inner reality. If you feel wealthy already.

But if you feel poor and feel that you really need to make money now even if you achieve it, you will be unhappy with your wealth. Because it comes out of the unhappiness. So there are many people who are creating wealth these days.

They build up a big business or enterprise. But it comes out of a deep dissatisfaction with what is. It comes out of an enormous neediness to show to the world that you are somebody or to prove to yourself or the world how good you are.

And that is not conducive to true happiness. There are many wealthy people who are unhappy in their wealth. And they are not really wealthy.

And they are basically still deprived. They are deprived of the fullness of life. And they have perhaps five or ten houses in different places.

Houses, cars, yacht. And yet they are deprived of the fullness. And so they need more and more.

And it doesn't help. So here we have living in the present moment brings you into the fullness of life now and then eventually it will also manifest in different ways externally for you. Power was the other thing.

Will it bring me power? Yes, but not power to the ego. It will make your life more empowered.

That what you do much greater power flows into what you do. Because what you are doing, the action that you are performing, whatever it is, in the present moment, the only place where you can do anything, the action that you are performing in the present moment is not a means to an end. For most people they are active because they want to get there to that point in the future.

They want the end result. Their eyes are on the end result. So they may be busy building up a business because they want to become wealthy.

But they reduce the quality and aliveness of the present moment because they are reducing the present moment to a means to an end. They give it inferior status. In their minds the future is more important because that is where they are going to be wealthy.

But then the pattern remains inside them and even when they have the money they still have the same basic psychological pattern which means they need the next moment. And always they reduce the present moment to a means to an end. So the action is not of high quality.

It does not contribute to happiness. They don't make themselves happy and they don't make others happy with what they do. So that's not truly empowered and it is low quality action.

High quality action comes when you don't reduce the present moment to a means to an end. That's truly empowered action. Only when you no longer reduce this moment to a means to an end can you give your full attention to whatever it is that you are doing now.

Some great artists do it. Sportsmen do it. When they perform they are totally present.

It is not a means to an end. They are totally in the now. So high quality action comes out of that and this is empowered action.

So living in the now brings power into your life. True power. Not the pseudo power of the ego.

And then whatever comes out of it, out of that action will be good in one way or another. It will not be, one could say, I call it, it's not karmic action, which means karmic action, it's an eastern term, karma. Karmic action creates more unhappiness.

It comes out of unhappiness and creates more unhappiness for yourself and others. But out of presence alignment with now comes non-karmic action. It does not create more suffering on the planet.

Because so many people are very, very active but a lot of that activity ultimately creates more suffering on the planet. So that's the power. What's the next thing that the now will bring you?

What was the question?

I really want to know about guilt. I feel guilty all the time for little things I'm doing or that I'm not doing. And there are things that I know I did that were mistakes to other people.

So I know that you're supposed to be free and liberated in the now, but shouldn't I feel bad about this stuff? I mean, and what's going to keep me if I'm free and liberated in the now from like doing bad things to people? Because that's a fear I think.

[Speaker 1] (1:24:11 - 1:38:16)

The only place where you can be free of the conditioning of your mind because freedom is not an external thing, it's an internal thing. You can be in prison and you can be free. People have written to me from prison and they've read The Power of Now and they said they now feel free.

What does that mean? True freedom is freedom from your mind, from the conditioned, all the conditioned thoughts and emotions that otherwise control you. Freedom is the freedom to step back from the conditioning into the deeper I, the awareness that you are.

It's freedom from thought ultimately so that not every thought controls you. So it's the freedom from conditioning and basically it's the freedom from the past. So you're no longer determined, your behavior and your thinking is no longer determined by your past.

It's also freedom from future because most people have a desperate need for the next moment. I call it psychological future. They need the fulfillment that they think the future will bring them.

It won't. So this is something for you to be aware of because I know that pattern also still operates in you. Believing that something in the future will bring you greater fulfillment than you have now.

But it won't. If you don't have it now, you won't have it then. You have to access The Power of Now regardless of your external circumstances.

You can have that now. You can't wait for the future because once you're in the waiting mode, you'll always be waiting for the next moment. Even when you become a famous actor, it won't feel quite right.

Maybe you're already famous, I don't know. But it won't feel quite right and there will be many things when you're very famous. I've met one or two famous actors and they come to this teaching.

Why do they come? Don't they have everything? No, they've realized they don't have what really matters and suddenly they discover the spiritual dimension because they've achieved everything else on the worldly dimension.

So, go deeply into the present moment. Become deeply aligned and at one with the only thing there ever is in your life, the present moment. And that is where true power resides and that is the only place where you can be truly free.

What's the next thing that you want? Happiness. Can happiness come in the future?

When I achieve this or that, then I'll be happy when I make it. But every situation that you go into will have a downside. If you're expecting circumstances to make you happy, they can do that for a while and then you find, oh, it's not quite what I expected and there's always another side to it.

And very often the very thing that makes you happy, if you have an external thing that makes you happy, that very thing will also make you unhappy. An example, a woman comes into your life who makes you happy. One, two, three years later, the same woman makes you unhappy.

It's the same thing. Or a job, a great job is offered to you and it creates so much stress that you make yourself ill. It makes you happy first and it makes you unhappy.

You become famous and then you see the downside of fame. You can't go out in the street alone anymore. There's a riot the moment people see you.

You're a prisoner of your house. You can't go out without two or three bodyguards. Is that freedom?

And you thought you would be free when you become famous. I've met one or two famous people who can't go out alone. It's too dangerous.

And people stop them all the time and they gather around them. They have to stay inside. Everything has to be organized.

They have to jump in the car with tinted windows and bodyguards. Is that freedom? Are they happy because of their fame?

No, they have experienced the downside of fame. It doesn't mean that you should not pursue goals. There's nothing wrong with being famous.

But don't expect it to make you happy. The true happiness has to be found, it comes from being aligned with life internally. And where is that?

Now, here. A complete openness and yes to the present moment that takes you deep into the present moment. True happiness comes out of that.

And then you can go on and do things and see if you can become famous. Why not experience that? Experience as much as you can without hoping that some experience, or when you've accumulated enough experiences, you'll finally feel fulfilled and fully yourself.

That won't happen. There's no end to accumulating experiences and achieving this or that. You cannot find yourself there.

You can only find yourself in the present moment. For everything else you need time to achieve success in your career, to learn to play the piano, to learn a foreign language, even to meet a woman. It takes time.

You have to walk somewhere where beautiful women hang out. It takes time. Everything takes time.

And so the mind thinks okay, finding myself who I truly am will also take time. It thinks when I've added enough to who I think I am, maybe recognition from other people, fame, possessions, put all these things in the back, my back, and when I have enough things accumulated, then I will be full. And that moment will come at some point in the future.

It doesn't. Because the back, no matter how much you put in, it'll never feel full besides from the fact that also often things fall out of the back. You put something in here and then something else falls out.

You suddenly get wealth and then you're unhappy in your marriage. Or you're happy in your marriage and suddenly the job doesn't work anymore. Or you're...

There's always, there's nothing stability isn't to be found in the external world. It's in constant flux. This universe is not stable.

People have this absurd illusion that they're living in a stable universe and that they can achieve some kind of stability in their lives. They are shocked when suddenly big disasters happen and you realize how unstable really everything is. So if you look, that doesn't mean it's to be rejected.

Play in the world and enjoy the play. Play as much as you can. But don't expect anything out there to truly make you happy or fulfill you.

Happiness is to be found directly within yourself. It comes from being connected with who you are. This brings us back to where we started.

To be in touch, to feel the deeper I. And there's enormous joy in simply feeling the beingness that you are. To feel the I am that is deeper than this or that.

I am. The very life that you are. To feel that.

To feel alive. Out of that comes true happiness. And then you can play around in the world and you acquire things and then you lose things and you acquire some more and then you lose some more and in the end you lose everything that everybody does.

You lose the body. In the end its form dissolves sooner or later. But it's finding something that is deeper than any form inside yourself.

That's true happiness. Love also comes, true love comes only out of the true I. True love cannot come out of the pseudo I that says I the actor I the good looking actor, I the famous actor, I the American, I the poor one or I the wealthy one or I who is good with women True love doesn't come out of that I.

That's a pseudo I. That's what most people refer to when they use that word that's so common, I. But the true love comes out when you're connected with the deeper I.

The I that has no form. The one thing that never leaves you. The one ingredient that's always there no matter where you are what you do, what you experience that never changes the I.

The consciousness that you are. When you live in connectedness with that aligned with that, that's where true love comes. Because when you meet another human being you can sense in them also there's a depth of same I that is your identity.

You recognize yourself in the other and the other as yourself. And you feel a deep connectedness much deeper than anything that you can say or think with the other human being. And that's true love.

Love is to feel that you're ultimately not separate. You're one. It can only come out of the spaciousness that is part of the now.

The now is space. What happens in the now is form. Don't confuse the two.

The reason why people think there are many many moments in every day, in every in your lifetime, in every hour because what happens changes continuously. The forms around you change continuously. The thoughts that go through your head change.

The emotions that you feel change. The people around you change. So people think every time it's a new moment.

This moment and another moment and another moment. If you look more deeply you see it's not another moment. It's always now.

But the form that appears in the now changes continuously. But it's always now. And ultimately now is who you are.

The space of now is the space of I. And then things happen in it and they change continuously. So there are two ways of saying when they ask you, what is it that never changes?

What is it that's always there in your life no matter where you go and what you do? You can say it's always I. The deepest I.

Not the superficial I that changes the thoughts, the emotions, who you are in the world. But the deeper I that's always the same. And so another way of looking at it is to say it's always now.

And now never changes. And then you find the miraculous thing. They're actually one.

The space of now and who you are in the depth of your being is consciousness itself. Before it becomes something. The very foundation out of which all life comes.

You could say God. God dwells in the depth of your being. Not as some entity but as the formless one life itself.

That is the deepest meaning of what now is. And that's why the now can never leave you. So I am the now in essence.

I am not what happens. I am the space in which everything happens. That's your true identity.

And when you live one with that, knowing that, your life will be fruitful and a great and wonderful adventure. When you don't know who you are, then no matter what you do, what you achieve, where you go, who you meet, it won't satisfy you. That's how simple it is.

2016 Eckhart Tolle - Enlightened Relationships The Ultimate Training Ground for Practicing Presence

This is Audible. Welcome. I was sitting in the green room 10 minutes ago, and was lucky enough to pick up a leaflet that was left there that told me that I'm speaking about enlightened relationships tonight.

And the arising of the new consciousness. The arising of the new consciousness is, of course, why we are here. And this could be misunderstood.

We are not here because we want a new consciousness to arise. When is it going to arise? We are here because it is arising.

And you wouldn't have come here if it were not arising in you, if you came voluntarily. And even if you came voluntarily, which I hope 99% at least of you did, even if you came voluntarily, not dragged here by your husband, wife, partner, friend, even there, it is possible that the arising new consciousness, which drew you here, which enabled you to recognize the truth, for example, in The Power of Now, A New Earth, or any other spiritual book that was written from and out of the awakened consciousness, yes, you recognized that because it's only the awakening consciousness in you that can recognize the truth when it's spoken that points to awakening. Otherwise, if somebody talks about awakening, it's no more than a mental concept, maybe interesting for a few minutes, and then you would quickly lose interest because it's not that interesting to the mind.

So even though the new consciousness is arising in many of you, it does not mean that it is continuously there yet. Many experience shifts between almost two dimensions, the mind-obsessed or the mind-possessed state, the thought-obsessed, mind-possessed state, which is the normal state of consciousness on the planet, has been for thousands of years, and the liberated or awakened state of simple, alert, spacious presence. And as you sit here, you may actually, or some of you, may experience moments when you're fully here, and then you may experience your mind taking you over, and you start thinking about what's going to happen tomorrow, or you start thinking about your problems, which are of course not here now, which have no reality at this moment, but the mind loves to dwell on those things because it keeps it going, it gives it renewed energy. And then perhaps, suddenly you wake up again, and you're back here in the room, and you're alert again. Or your mind may come in and tell you that it's better to go home now because you can't stand listening to this anymore.

And at that moment you have, well, at that moment, depending on whether there is some awareness that this is your mind talking to you, is there, that determines whether you have a choice. If you're totally identified with that thought, you will get up and go home. If you know that there's a thought arising that says something, then you can be there as the awareness behind the thought, and realize you don't necessarily have to do what the thought says, or even believe in it when the thought says, what the hell is it talking about?

I don't understand it. Because you can't really understand it from the conceptual mind. So let's see what your mind does.

Just be there as the witness of your mind, if you can. And as Tammy pointed out at the beginning, we have, I don't know if she pointed out, we have the words that you listen to, and we have an energy field out of which the words come. And the energy field out of which the words come, we could call presence or the awakened consciousness.

And there's nothing personal in it. It's not mine. It's here because the me got out of the way.

I have not achieved it. I don't possess it. So that is the energy field, and that operates here also.

And the same energy field in you may respond to that. And then we have here, to some extent it's arising already, a collective energy field of presence arising. That is very helpful to spend some time, which conventional language, it's only always the present moment, in this energy field, the collective energy field of presence.

So there are the words, they may be helpful pointers, but the most important thing is that which underlies the words. The arising new consciousness, often people have asked me and are asking me, how do you know that there is a new consciousness arising? Don't you, well, well, I must admit, there were times the last few years when I found it a bit difficult, when I was looking at world events, to answer that.

Because I knew the new consciousness is arising, but it is not it or it was not yet so visible in the outer manifestations, where the old consciousness was still operating. Now in the recent past, we had several events that are indications that the new consciousness is just beginning to reach the manifested structures of our civilization. We know that because some of the structures are beginning to dissolve.

And of course, if you believe too much in the media, you will think this is a dreadful thing. What's going to happen? You should be fearful, the media tells you, it's going to get worse and worse.

And of course, yes, it may be challenging for many people, huge shifts happening. The old structures that were created a long time ago by the old consciousness, dissolving. As I mentioned in the New Earth, it happened to communism.

Within a few years, two or three years, this rigid system one would have thought would never dissolve, at least not for a thousand years, gone. Of course, it was very challenging, and they followed times of upheavals in Russia. And in East Germany, I remember reading, many, many, many people needed urgent psychotherapeutic treatment, because their worldview that had been indoctrinated into them had collapsed.

It doesn't make sense anymore. And many of the structures nowadays that we believed in, the huge banks, massive power and money, suddenly they're not that stable. They're not as solid as they looked.

The buildings looked so solid. Huge structures. And the people who were running these organizations, they looked so confident.

And for many years, I was saying sometimes to groups, this is a very meaningful gathering tonight, as is this one. And I also sometimes added, but it's not going to be on the news tonight, because the media isn't interested in that. That was true until very recently.

And a good news is the good news and what is usually the bad news. It is on the news. Last night, ABC filmed part of our talk.

ABC News. It's unbelievable. It's an undreamt of a miracle.

How is that possible? And CBC News came to interview me. It can't be.

So it's, yes, there are signs that a shift is happening. Another hopeful sign is where there's a new man in the White House who, relative to some other world leaders or his predecessor, can be considered, if not a Buddha, at least a bodhisattva. And of course, the change is not going to come from one person.

He's not going to change the world. He is a manifestation of the change that is happening. Yes, he hopefully will be part of that change.

Yes, he will make mistakes, of course. But these are signs that these things could not have happened even 20, 30 years ago. The arising new consciousness.

What are the signs of the arising new consciousness? A lessening of, on the inner level, a lessening of mind possession, the normal state. Thinking no longer dominates your state of consciousness.

Thinking no longer gives you your sense of identity. You no longer derive your sense of who you are from what your mind tells you about you. The story of me and my life.

And you don't impose mental labels on others. There's a, not immediately, perhaps a complete absence, but there is a lessening of this compulsive conceptualizing, labeling, interpreting of the reality around you and yourself. Thought still operates, but your sense of who you are, of identity, does no longer, no longer comes from the movement of thought.

To experience that is one reason to experience more fully. That's why we are here. Who am I?

The mind will tell you who you are. I am this, this, my past, my history, my problems, my position in the world, whatever I identify with becomes part of my sense of self. And as presence arises, who you are deepens.

You suddenly realize there's a depth in that still alert space between thoughts that is here now. Very simple. A still alert space between thoughts.

And that alert space is just, if we want to call it anything, consciousness itself. And increasingly, that is where your sense of identity comes from. Not from some story that you tell yourself about who you are.

Now you will notice that in that clear space, you're not defining yourself anymore. In that clear space, we could even say, and this is frightening to the mind, you no longer know who you are in the sense of conceptual knowledge. And that is frightening to the mind.

But it is a beautiful state where you realize the essence of I, that until then had been mixed up always with thought forms. Now you go to the essence, the pure essence of I, no longer mixed up with, first you thought of I am this, I am that. And now you realize the simplicity of I am.

No definitions are needed. And you are, this is why I say, you are never more truly yourself than when you are still inside. You haven't gone to sleep.

You have not fallen below thought. You have risen above thought. You have transcended thought.

You have not returned to the realm of plants that are also very still. You haven't returned to that. You have gone through thinking.

You have transcended thinking. And then thinking becomes a helpful tool and a beautiful tool that the arising consciousness can actually use as it's doing at this very moment. It's using this little mind to express something that can't really be expressed in words.

And yet the mind is somehow managing to express that which is beyond definitions. So you find that space inside yourself. It's there.

And your personal history becomes, as far as your sense of self is concerned, your sense of who you are, is no longer important. One could almost say your personal history, as far as your sense of who you are is concerned, becomes irrelevant. What a liberation.

What a liberation not to carry around and mistaking the story in your mind, the story of me, the unhappy one. If it's happy, just wait a little and you'll turn unhappy. The story of me and my problems and my sufferings and my complaints about the world and other people and what they did to me and what I did to them and what shouldn't have happened but did happen.

All the continuous stream is no longer giving you your sense of illusory identity. But from the point of view of the conceptualizing mind, you have entered a very dangerous place. Ooh, don't go.

You don't know who you are anymore. Who am I? I have to remember my past quickly.

Oh yes, I remember now my childhood was very unhappy. Of course, people have suffered in the past. Some of you suffered more than I.

My suffering was moderate as a child, just mostly I was unhappy, but it could have been worse. And then it became more acute in early adulthood, but that also could have been worse probably, and some of you probably had worse sufferings than me. And if while I speak now you detect in yourself a slight irritation or anger because I am not acknowledging enough what you have suffered in the past, then that is helpful to know what is that that irritation or even slight anger that I'm not acknowledging your suffering.

Oh, there must have been some identification with my suffering. I'm not saying your suffering was not dreadful, but do you want that to be your sense of, form the basis for your sense of identity for the rest of your life? Or even if you have an illness, the illness is there, but the conceptual thing of saying, I am a sufferer of whatever it is, that also can be very seductive and in some cases becomes the main, the foundation for your sense of self.

And that's, it's, and once this has happened, you don't want to let go because there is a fear that when you let go of that sense of self, the unhappy sense of self, that perhaps blames, if you can blame somebody it's even better, blame people and you hang on and that comes a huge chunk in your mental, emotional structure. Okay, that's me. That's what happened to me.

That's why that, what they did to me. Yes, of course they did, but you are much deeper than that. There's a depth to who you are and at that level of depth and you begin to touch it in the space between two thoughts, where there's simple presence, that was never touched by your suffering.

Now that you may not have been aware of that because you were not conscious, there is a place in you that was never and can never be touched by suffering. And that is the pure I, the pure consciousness. So yes, of course you remember your story still, but your sense of identity is taken out of that.

And then you will be able to tell your story without the heaviness of a sense of self in it anymore. I sometimes talk about being a very unhappy child, but I don't feel the unhappiness still operating in me. I remember it, but I could, I no longer say, I was dreadful as a child, what my parents did.

My parents acted according, they did what they could do according to their level of consciousness. What they did reflected their level of awareness, their level of consciousness. And beyond that, there's the beautiful being underneath it.

So, the story, the past, the future also, not only does the past become less important, the future also loses its importance because in the egoic state of consciousness, which is the unhappy story of me, the mind forms with which you are identified, the future is extremely important because the unhappy me hopes to reach a state of freedom from unhappiness or fulfillment and satisfaction when this, that, or the other happens at some point in the future.

It looks to the future for fulfillment, release, completion. The always incomplete story of me, the always unsatisfying story of me, it didn't go the way it should have gone. It didn't go the way it should have gone.

But there's still the possibility that the story will complete itself in the future and finally I will arrive at some point of fulfillment. The only problem is the future doesn't exist, except as a thought. When it comes, it's the present, which I have, and if I habitually run away from the present, deny it, and look elsewhere, then I'm condemned to continuous dissatisfaction.

So, accessing the space or the stillness within now. You don't know anymore. It's a state of, from the point of view of the mind, you need to become comfortable, which from the point of view of the mind is a state of ignorance.

The absence of interpretation or definition. Not knowing. That's the place where the, for example, I embrace that when I come on to give a talk.

The becoming comfortable with not knowing what words are going to come out. Entering the space where, now what is that space that we are now pointing towards within? Entering that space of seemingly, seeming ignorance, where you don't, it's a place of no thought, but alertness.

Out, that is the place out of which all aliveness, all creativity, anything that is ever new, is born. It is not only emptiness, as it is called in Buddhism, it is also fullness, potential fullness. It is pure intelligence.

It is pure consciousness. It is the source of all life. The formless source of all life.

And where do you find it? At the center of your being. And at the center of your being, you actually find the center of the universe.

Because you're a microcosm. I mentioned last night these, the black holes at the center of galaxies, which I had written about, but was never published. And now I'm reading that scientists are saying, yes, there probably is a black hole at the center of each galaxy.

And they're almost certain there's a black hole at the center of our galaxy. There's an empty space, there is the empty fullness, the plenum void, as it's sometimes called by some mystics, the empty fullness at the center and the core of your being. Find that, and you have found the core of all, the source of all life.

Find that, and you have found yourself, the essence of who you are. Find that, and you have found the timeless dimension of pure consciousness, that which underlies all life. You have found the life.

Being is another word for it. Being before it becomes something. Being before it becomes existence.

Existence means to stand out. Being is the inner dimension, the uttermost innerness. Find that, and you have found what all humans have been and are actually looking for.

And most humans are looking for it where it cannot be found. In the phenomenal world, in mind forms, in the future. That is, we can call that stillness, we can call it space, I sometimes call it the inner space, you can call it consciousness, being, or you can call it sat-citta-nanda, which is the Indian term meaning, consisting of three words, being, consciousness, bliss.

Bliss means it feels, it is blissful to be connected with that, or to realize that as the essence of your being. And all that's needed is temporary cessation of thought. And once you have that, and you, then the spaces between thought become longer, and you can go about doing and experiencing life, at first tentatively, tentatively you may experience going towards the door across the room in the state of a large spacious presence.

And every step is, you'll find you're present with every step, and I'm not saying I'm going to do a walking meditation now, but it's a more natural thing, you may find yourself opening a door, and not making it into means to an end, while you're in the elevator, you're pressing a button, and you're going down in, you're just alert, a field of alertness in the elevator, not a person. And then when you need to use your mind, it'll, of course, if you're in that state, and somebody asks you a question, and immediately an answer comes out of you, I'm, let's say it's a question that is somewhat deeper than where is such and such a street, some other question, somebody asks you a question, and the question is received in the state of simple open presence. And there's a moment of a little gap, time gap, and then you will find a meaningful, powerful answer comes out of you.

And often you may find you didn't know that until it came, because it comes out of that, out of presence. This is how I began to be a spiritual teacher. I didn't know I was a spiritual teacher.

I was already, I was answering questions. People casually came, and said, asked some questions about life, or their problems, and I was just listening. I didn't know anything.

I had hardly understood what had happened to me. I'd hardly understood that state that is free of thought, and peaceful, and alive, and present. There was just listening to the question, and then I said something.

The answer came out, oh, that's interesting. And then the person said, wow, you are very wise. Well, I didn't know that I knew that, so I, and then they told a friend about it, and then the friend came and said, wow.

And then somebody came and said, oh, you, I wanted to talk to you, because I'm told, I was told you're a spiritual teacher. Oh, is that what I am? But this operates on all levels.

You just, if action is required in a certain situation, if you can become still for one moment, and then right action happens. Buddhists talk about all this kind of thing, I can never memorize these. Right action, right this, right that, right speech, right action, all these things come out of that state of consciousness by themselves.

And your thinking changes. The obsessive thinking, especially obsessed with negative thinking and so on, subsides slowly. Yes, you will still be overtaken by waves of thought occasionally, that's okay, and then you wake up again out of the wave of thought.

And the great test for the arising of the new consciousness, of course, comes in relationships, and which are also a great challenge. Relationships will reflect back to you your predominant state of consciousness. And that's why they are so useful.

And so if you are a hermit, then it's very easy to fool yourself as to your state of consciousness. If you avoid contact with other humans because it's just, you just don't want to know anymore, it's just too unsettling, then of course, yes, you can probably be in sustained states of, if you're lucky enough, somebody brings you food, you don't, you can be in sustained states of presence and believe that you have finally arrived, but it will not yet be deeply rooted within you because it has not been tested in the fire of relationships.

As a monk, I knew years ago, a Buddhist monk was telling me that he was in the east somewhere and he was a westerner, but he had become a Buddhist monk. And his teacher, the abbot of the monastery where he was, allowed him to go up a mountain and sit in a little hut for half a year. And somebody would bring him food every day, and he had nothing to do but meditate and sit.

And after a few, the first month was dreadful, unbearable, because he was sitting there with his mind. Torturing him on the inner and the mosquitoes torturing him on the outer level. And then gradually he was able to let go of that and become more and more presence was arising.

And he then said, and then in the last month or so, presence was almost continuous and he was convinced that he had reached the state of liberation. And then a message came from the monastery, which somebody had realized that your visa has expired. And so he had to travel to the big city and stand in line at the consulate or whatever it was.

And it took hours. And then he was in the wrong line and said, I've just been standing here for two hours. No, this is the wrong lineup.

You have to go to that one. And that was the wrong one too. And when he finally got to the official, he was hitting his table, I've been here for five hours.

And then he suddenly became aware. And he realized all that beautiful presence was gone. That's relationships.

And that was an easy relationship, just an official relationships. Now there are many kinds of relationships. We will talk about that.

But the essence of relationships, the question is always whether relationships are working harmoniously and beautifully, or whether they are conflict ridden, is determined by whether there is space in your relationship. And that applies to any relationship. The question is, is there space in this?

What does space mean? I don't mean space in the sense of distance between people. That's another aspect.

I mean inner space. There is a line in Khalil Gibran's Prophet, which talks about space, but this is not what I mean. This is also true, by the way.

He says, let there be spaces in your relationship, which means don't be clinging to each other all the time. Occasionally go your own way and then come back together. That's also true.

But what I'm talking about here is inner space in the relationship. And what that is, you probably know already, and we will come to that now as we address the different kinds of relationships that you encounter in life, and see how the arising new consciousness can be sustained in those challenging situations. Because there is no doubt that human beings are very challenging.

The others are the human beings. So you have, of course, the first thing that comes to mind when you talk about relationships is the intimate relationships, which usually start off as romantic and then become something else. This is what usually comes to mind, what many films are still about, movies that you see, a large part are still about that.

And it is what many people's lives are preoccupied with, is what people look to for their sense of fulfillment and happiness, and at the same time, those intimate relationships are one of the greatest sources of unhappiness. So a little contradiction here, of course, people look to it for their fulfillment and happiness, and in many, many cases, the opposite happens. And in many, many cases, the people experience a shift from the very person that was going to, was supposed to make me happy, now makes me unhappy.

That's the normal course of relationships. I read the other day, I don't know who said it, and he said there is no marriage in which a week after the wedding, there is no marriage in which one week after the wedding, you cannot find grounds for divorce. And the secret is in continuing to find grounds for marriage, he said.

Before we, let's put this aside, because that is the most problematic. But you are engaged, we will come to that, of course, but you are engaged throughout the day and throughout your life in many kinds of relationship, different types of relationship, you have relationships with your children, if you have children, you have relationships with your grown-up children, you have relationships with your parents, relationships with siblings, family members, relatives, you have relationships with friends, you have relationships, casual, brief relationships when you interact with people to do this or that, to buy something, to ask for information, on the telephone. These are all relationships, and they're all part of, if there is dysfunction in you, egoic dysfunction, that will manifest in all relationships.

Let's start with the simplest relationships, and that is where you don't know the people very well. Makes it a little easier, perhaps. Somebody, you go to a shop and you buy something, you are asking somebody for information, you're getting a ticket behind a counter, there's somebody giving you a ticket.

Now, all these, the supermarket, the cashier, all these things at the hotel, the porter, the bellboy, whatever, whoever it is, the waiter, the waitress, these are all people that continuously come into your life, usually is not given much attention, because those kinds of relationships and the people who represent, are part of those relationships, are usually considered a means to an end. Because, of course, you're only interacting with this person because you want to buy the newspaper, whatever it is, from this person. So the person becomes a means to an end.

Or you're asking for information, and the person is a means to an end. What you want is not the relationship, you want the information from that person, you want that person to do something for you. Yes, of course, on a functional level that is true, but it is also true that you are reducing a brief interaction between two human beings to something that is actually dehumanized.

When you interact with humans in that way, where you make another human being into a means to an end, and of course, the ego does not only do that in these brief functional relationships, the ego does the same thing with other more closer relationships would come to that. But you observe it to see what is the quality of your relationship, the casual relationships that happen throughout the day, that are brief encounters with other human beings. So there comes the first opportunity to bring in a little bit of space, so that you then have two dimensions to that relationship.

Let's say you are buying something. You're buying a book. You go to the bookstore, you buy a spiritual book.

You hand the book to the cashier, and now we have the beginning of a relationship. Now, and of course, the cashier, of course, has also a relationship with you, but what the cashier does is not your concern. Whether the cashier is treating you as a mental concept called customer is not your concern.

Whether the cashier sees you as a human being or sees the being behind the human is not your concern. Your concern is your state of consciousness. Your, is there some space while you interact?

Yes, you need this person because this person is going to take your money and give you the receipt. No question about that. Is that all there is?

Or have you missed a valuable opportunity for relating and connecting to another human being? And how do you do that? You do that by looking at that human being and not thinking anything while you look, in, have space inside you while you look, hand over your money, and take the book, and say, thank you.

During that interaction, there was a moment of stillness inside you, alert stillness. Let's do it again. He says, he or she says, okay, that'll be $16, or usually books cost like $15.99. Okay. You take the money out and you look. Very simple. Not that you want something, not like you say, I want something deeply meaningful with you.

But it, there is a human being there and you are a human being. Is there a, is there a meeting? Is it what in the Course in Miracles is described?

Is it a holy encounter? It says that potentially whenever you meet somebody, no matter how briefly, it can be a holy encounter. That means that which transcends the person, that which transcends the temporary function, that which transcends the label, customer, employee, shop assistant, that which transcends those things suddenly comes into being, emerges.

And it emerges because you were there as primarily as space rather than as a function or as a label, a concept. Now it is quite possible that you will get no response at all from the person serving you because it is possible that the person serving you is totally identified with the concept that you are a customer. You're not a human being.

You are a customer and you are treated as a customer. Okay. Thank you.

He may not even look at you. And of course you're not saying, please look at me. It's, it's a self-sufficient thing.

It's, you don't expect anything from him or her. You do it for yourself. But if you do that, you're offering space, one could say.

You're offering that person space, but they don't have to take it. You're offering a spacious, brief, spacious relationship. But the miracle is that often you will find, if they are not totally identified with their mind structures, a little opening in them.

And they look at you. And for a moment you connect as on the level of consciousness beyond the function, beyond the labels. And that is a bit, it adds a quality to your life.

If you just do that in ordinary, brief relationships already adds a depth that before wasn't there. And it can be a beautiful, I've had, I have many beautiful encounters with people that I meet very briefly and there is a, suddenly there is a depth to it that would have been completely missing if I had reduced the human being to a function, which is what the mind does. The mind has a label and it, and the mind makes, if you're only in the mind, everything is a means to an end, including human beings.

This is what the egoic mind does. It transforms the present moment, whether the, whether a human being comes into the present moment, or whether some action that you do in the present moment, whatever it is in the present moment, the ego transmakes it into a means to an end. It looks to the, it wants to get there and it uses this to get there.

So it's, the ego uses the present moment and people in the present moment, because the only place where you can meet people in the present moment. I've never met anybody not in the present moment. So if the egoic consciousness reduces other humans to a means, to reduces the present moment to a means to an end, it reduces anything and everything that comes into the space of now to a means to an end.

Dreadful way to live. And then you can see when, when that operates, human interactions become quite unpleasant. Dehumanized, desacralized, you could say.

So this is a beautiful practice. And if the other person shows no response, it's fine. You have, there was a space of presence in you.

So you're, you're the giver of space. And so you begin in all those, and sometimes you'll forget. Don't beat yourself up if you forget.

After paying at the supermarket, you realized you weren't, there was no awareness that there was another human being there, because mentally you were already in the car. Because when you're stuck in your mind mentally, you're always one, two, three, or four steps ahead. You're never here.

You're just here enough so that you don't bump into things. And so that is, well, I would say perhaps the easiest, as far as relationships are concerned, that's the easiest practice. And even that some people don't find easy to remember, to actually be present when you are there with another human being.

But then, of course, you don't have to spend a long time with them, so it makes it easier. Then you have relationships where you meet people at work, family members, friends. Now, many people real notice, for example, some friendships survive because you don't get together too often.

The longest lasting friendships are people who live a long way away, and you perhaps see them every two years, and you email occasionally or talk on the phone. Not too problematic. But spend a holiday with them.

Vacations are the end of many friendships. Why is that? Because the longer you are together, the more likely it is that the ego and its dysfunctional way of interpreting other people and being in the world, its identification with mental positions, will come in.

And so, after a few days together with another person, you realize that this person has sides that you had not known about. There are aspects to that person that, wow, I never knew he was like that. You might get a taste of their pain body.

And that's interesting. And they, of course, think the same of you. I had an interesting...

When I was living in England, I lived in a little cottage in the country for a few years, and since my income was very low, I rented out two bedrooms, usually two people who were there for a while. In that town, there were many people transient passing through. So in a period of three years, I probably had about 12 people or so coming as lodgers.

And with 10 out of the 12, there were serious forms of dysfunction that only came out after a few weeks or a few days in some... Or after one day with one person. And two people were free of that.

I had two out of 12 people. 10 people actually, by dysfunction, I mean not just some quirk of behavior or something, but causing themselves and others considerable and unnecessary suffering, causing suffering for themselves and others. That is what I mean by dysfunction.

So whether it be deep mood swings, some obsessive preoccupations with non-existent problems, needing to talk to me for five hours a day. Two people did not manifest it. That was beautiful to experience.

And the others were also interesting to experience. I was just there as a listening presence, listening to what they had to say and watching and being there. And one or two also experienced a shift, a certain shift in consciousness.

Interesting observation to be with people live so closely together and see how some people go through enormous shifts in mood and inner states. So much that you don't know when they come down from the upper floor from the bedroom. You don't know who is coming down the stairs for breakfast because you don't know what state of consciousness they are in.

It could be dreadful. They could be aggressive and shouting and all. It could be in a state of chaos.

Everything is fine. Close friends, family members, and so on. Here also becomes more important even to be, are you able to be there not as a reactive entity?

Especially relationships that have a lot of past in them. The more past there is in the relationship, and that for example applies to your parents, relationship with your parents, your grown-up children, relationships with relatives you've known your whole life. A lot of past means there's usually a lot of patterns have accumulated in the relationships.

The patterns play themselves out whenever you come together. And in some relationships when you visit your parents, when you visit those relatives, you can almost play the record or a CD of what happened last time you saw them. The same kind of comments, the same kind of irritations, provoking the same reaction in you, the same, the same responses, the same, just play the record.

You don't even need to see them. You can say, I'm not coming to us to the Thanksgiving dinner. I'm just listening to last year's conversation.

So if, but if you go there in a state of alertness and presence and then suddenly you see your father, your uncle talking to you and making the same kind of comment, disapproving of your lifestyle, for example, or whatever it may be, or showing irritation with what you're, who you are, and then you can be there as a, as a, this requires more alertness, more intensity of alertness than with the person selling you a newspaper. So it's, start with a newspaper person and wait a little and, and be in your room, do it with flowers, be present with a flower.

The flower almost asks you to be present with it. It says, please recognize my beauty because I recognize my own beauty through you. It's asking you, it wants to be recognized and seen.

It's, it's, if a flower can't do it, then what can? Well, maybe your dog can. All those are easier ways of being, of sustaining that state of alert presence, spacious presence in the face of another being.

And then finally say, okay, I'm ready now to visit my parents or I'm ready to see my grown up children. And then you go and then they start acting out the same. The important thing is that you are no longer run by your mind.

You are there as a presence. Hang on to your inner body. I recommend that highly.

By that I mean, have some attention in the inner energy field of the body as you listen to your child or your parent while they talk, ask you questions and also be rooted in here. Feel the aliveness throughout the energy field. And while you listen to your, whoever it is, your uncle, dad, grandfather, and they talk and then you give an answer out of, let it come out of that moment that's brief, the stillness, alertness.

Can you, and while you meet them, can you be free of thought in the moment of giving them a hug, if that's what they do? And be there. And then observe that that's not who they are.

The irritated comments they make about you, the accusations, perhaps they're keeping the past alive that they share with you in their minds. Well, you did that five years, 10 years ago, 20 years ago. Do you remember what you did?

I'll never forget that. Yes, I did. You're right.

Or if they may not be right at all, they might be wrong. And then you say, is that what I did? There's no need to say, I never did that.

I never said that. Yes, you said that. No, I didn't.

And immediately you're trapped in mind against mind, mental position against mental position. But all you need to say that is, I did. Is that how you remember it?

Or say nothing at all, even better. Oh, well, okay. Now, the amazing thing is, if you do not fight another person's mental position, it weakens.

So you're doing something wonderful for them. You are not strengthening their mental positions. Mental position means I'm identifying with a certain thought form.

And that's what I derive my sense of I. The sense of I is lodged in the thought form. So that's this identification with a mental position.

And if nobody resists it, it thrives on resistance. It thrives on opposition. Without opposition, the egoic mind form becomes weakened.

If nobody contradicts, what's going to happen? And they'll make another attempt to get some kind of contradiction. And again, they simply, oh, well, okay.

And it gets weaker and weaker. It's quite upsetting for that person. But you're doing something wonderful.

You're actually, there's an opportunity now for the mental position to dissolve. And sometimes this happens when you are able to be there as spacious presence. And this is close to a miracle.

But the important thing is, you are not doing it in order to change them. If you're doing it in order to change them, you're not there. There is a second motive, a hidden motive, and it's your mind coming in.

You're not really present. Or if you have, again, a little danger I need to point out, the mind may use the arising of this new consciousness and make a conceptual self out of it. And then you have a new self image, a concept of who you are as somebody who is superior to most of these people, like your relatives.

And so, and that can be confused with the state of presence. So then you go to the gathering of your family or relatives with that unconscious mental image of yourself as a superior spiritually advanced being. And you will notice that sooner or later, because then you will get irritated because they are so unadvanced.

And if you make a little comment to them that you will understand where I'm at when you are more conscious. So the mind is very cunning. It can use even presence and make it into a concept.

Of course, then you've lost presence. But I have seen people who think they are present without realizing that they've made presence into a concept. Presence means just the simplicity of inner space, not identified with content, neither the content of your mind, nor the content of somebody else's mind.

Be there as the space for the content, the content, external content, inner content. Don't be one with the content. Don't have your entire life run by content.

Be the space, be the space. That's the practice. And the more past there is, the more alertness is required.

As I said, Ram Dass, you remember what he said? If you think you're so enlightened, go and spend a week with your parents. That's the test.

Or other relatives. Or your ex-husband or your wife. If you have children still, I'm now talking about children rather than grown-up children, if there's such a thing.

Your relationship with your child, let's say your actual child. What is it that you transmit to the child? What is the state of consciousness that gets transmitted?

What is your habitual state of consciousness? That is what you teach the child, not what you tell the child. Your habitual state of consciousness.

Is your life one damn thing after another? Is that how your family lives at home, as many modern families do? What's the next thing we have to do?

Next thing. We're always hurrying to the next moment. You haven't done your homework yet.

Come on. What do you have to do? Go do this.

Do that. Continuous restlessness in the energy field. Of course you have to do things.

Yes, nobody's saying don't do anything. We're talking about whether you are lost in a continuous succession of doing and thinking and doing. When your child comes, first question, are you able to listen when the child speaks?

Listen means, true listening means you're there as a spacious presence. What the child is saying isn't so important. Are you giving your child space?

That is the question. Are you there as space? Not if you can't do it the whole day, it's fine, but occasionally when you interact.

Is the only time you interact with your child when you want your child to do something? Or when you have something to say about or stopping the child, don't do that. Is that the only interactions you have and you think you're responsible because you do all the right things?

You tell your child all the right things to do and not to do. You're a responsible parent. Well, not really, because the most vital dimension is missing.

The transcendent, the being. The consciousness, that which is beyond the personalized dimension. That's missing.

Life is missing. And your life is consumed by your life situation. And you're missing life.

Life is now. Life is beyond the content of your life. The content of your life, whatever happens in your life, the experiences, the events, that's all life situation.

But are you acknowledging life in the midst of your life situation? Or is your life, which includes your family life, is your life consumed by your life situation? By all the things that need doing, that need thinking about, that need one thing after another.

The life situation, past, future. What do we have to do next? Always, vital thing for any, not just relationships, for any sane life is find the life in your life situation.

And their life is not the forms of life, because the forms of life are always part of the life situation. I'm talking about the life prior to form that is the space of consciousness, of stillness. That is life.

That is eternal life, timeless. And that needs to be there. And then otherwise, the world is going to eat you alive.

It's going to eat you up. That's what it does. If you don't get your attention, your consciousness into the, find the space.

The world, your life situation, which is the world, is going to consume you, all your attention continuously. Every situation says, give me your attention, I matter. Attention, please, attention.

Every thought says, I matter, give me your attention. Every thought wants to proliferate into other thoughts. An insane way to live, but normal.

It's called normal. So the vital thing, where is the life in my life situation? And if you find the life, which is in the now, now is the entry point into life.

Okay, let's imagine then every one of you has a life situation as I have. Some of you have a life situation that is perhaps pretty bad, considered from the point of view of the mind. Many things have just gone wrong.

And a few more things are likely to go wrong, says the mind. Or you have a heavy burden of things that have not been solved in your life. Of course you have.

That's the life, your life situation. But if you are here and carry that with you, then you wouldn't really be here. So if you're here carrying your life situation with you, you would, your thoughts would continuously drift to your problems and what you have to do, what you fail to do, what has happened to you, what might happen to you.

And you would only occasionally hear a few words, a little, catch a few words, catch what, present moment. Okay. Space, consciousness.

Okay. But you're going with, you're here, you have your past and your future going, carrying that. Okay, where's the life now?

Here. Your life is the consciousness. Consciousness, space, whatever you want to call it, allowed stillness.

That is the fullness, the full emptiness, the unmanifested. Have a little space in the midst of your life situation, just a little, a little space opens up. I'll just do it here.

Just this, just this. That's alert, present. And suddenly you feel, ah, this moment is actually okay.

This moment, life now, because you're getting deeper into this moment, you're not just seeing the surface of this moment. You're getting into the essence of the space. This moment is the space for what happens.

This moment is actually okay. And you can have that test at any stage, when you feel the burden of your life situation, see, if your mind tells you your life is very problematic and chaotic or bad, then you find out if that applies to this moment. And then you find, well, this moment is actually not that bad at all.

And the deeper you go into this moment, the more life you feel, present, clear. Where's your life situation? It's not there unless you remember it.

Oh yes. And then attention back. That's where anything new comes from.

Otherwise, your life situation will just, one thing will lead to, there will be no true change. One damn thing will lead to another damn thing, and another damn thing, and another problem. And when you solve that problem, two new problems raise their head out of that solution.

That's karma in Eastern terms. One thing leads to another. Action, reaction, action, reaction, action, reaction, no space, no freedom.

But if you find the life, as much as possible, make space. And then that space even affects the externals. If not immediately, sometimes immediately, you will find changes taking place in the so-called life situation, because you have gone into that place out of which all life arises, anything that's new.

If you don't touch that in yourself, all you ever experience is a repetition of the old in your life. Sometimes it pretends to be new, it looks new on the surface, and you go into another relationship and say, now finally I've found, but you haven't accessed the unconditioned in yourself, and you find, oh god, it's turning into the same, my marriage is turning into the same marriage as my last one. Oh my god.

So we're all, we're at the, we're getting to the essence of this now, which you will need in your close intimate relationships. It is vital that you are there as space, as much as possible, that you're able to listen and be the space, because that's where true listening arises, to your partner, listen, be aware of the mind and its positions. Remember President Obama's spiritual advice, he says, if you disagree, you don't need to be disagreeable.

That sounds simple, but it's actually quite profound, because he's saying you don't need to be identified with your mental positions. You can still have mental positions and opinions, and as the Zen master said, you don't need to seek the truth, just stop cherishing opinions, and the truth emerges. What does that mean?

Stop cherishing opinions. Opinions are the mind, they are positions of the mind, of rightness, this is how it is, and you identify with the positions. That causes endless conflict, because the other person does the same, two mental positions fighting and strengthening each other.

So you don't need to be disagreeable when you disagree, means you don't need to be identified with mental positions, and how are you not identified with mental positions? How do you do that? By realizing that you, who you are is not the arising thoughts, who you are is the space behind your thoughts, and you come, you are, you are, that's who, that's, you are the space for your thoughts, you're not your thoughts.

Then you're not identified with the positions of the mind, and that means you're then not, if you're identified, you defend your mental positions as if you were defending your life. That's the, that's the absurdity. People, some people even get into physical fights, they start arguing, sometimes it's family members, you read these articles in the paper, two brothers, or father and son, they started discussing something about sports or politics, and then one person took a knife and killed the other one.

It happens for, what happened? They were defending, they were so identified with their mental positions that when the mental position was attacked or questioned, it was unconsciously considered an attack on their very life. And that is how you can observe it in others, and preferably in yourself, when you become emotional, when your discussions start, and you're defending your viewpoint, you're, you're defending your position of rightness, and you're feeling, you're getting upset.

It could even be something spiritual, and you're saying, the now is all there is, I'm telling you. Why do you never believe me? It requires, you can see it more easily in others, and then requires a little bit more alertness to see it in yourself.

But a good sign is getting upset when you start discussing something. Oh, I'm lost in a mental position. I've lost the space of now.

And then there's an opportunity to return. Then you can listen, you can talk about something. Listening, perhaps, is the greatest thing you can do for your partner.

And it's not so much what the partner says that has its place and importance, but to be there and connect on the level of awareness. And should you, listening implies that there is an open space. The words are received in that open space.

Partners evolve sometimes at different speed, the evolution of consciousness, and some may not evolve for a while at all. So it's possible that suddenly the awakened consciousness comes into you, into you, and your partner remains where he or she is. And you go into enormous presence, and aliveness, and newness, and you still see he or she is still no change.

And then wait a little, and see it is quite possible that your state transmits itself, even the slightest degree of readiness in the other. The fact that you do not strengthen his or her mind anymore by opposing his or her mind, the vital thing, don't oppose the mind. You can express your viewpoint without opposition.

Something may happen, an opening may happen. Or it is possible that you may have to separate, and it may be that the other partner will leave you, because it is no longer satisfying to live with you without the drama. The pain body, of course, many of you know about the pain body, and hopefully not only know about the pain body, but have direct knowledge, immediate knowledge of your own pain body.

The pain body, of course, is the favorite place for the pain body, which is the old accumulated pain, which is an energetic, almost an entity that lives in you, that lives on emotional suffering. It loves its vibrational frequency. It thrives on relations, close relationships.

That's where it gets its food, most of its food. There isn't much you can do with, if your pain body needs food, it can't do much when you go to the supermarket and only see the cashier for half a minute or one minute. Even there it could happen.

I've been standing here for 10 minutes and you've been talking to this customer instead of serving me. But favorite place for pain bodies to renew themselves are families and intimate relationships. That's their place.

And so you will know your partner has a pain body which occasionally takes them over and makes them say and do things that one could say they're completely out of character. Well, yes, it's unconscious. It comes as a surprise when you've started living with a person and you've experienced their pain body after perhaps two or three weeks for the first time.

And that used to be the big surprise when people got married. Nowadays often people live together for a while before they get married so they already know that the other has a pain body. It's good.

And you haven't committed yourself yet. You can still get out. But what a dreadful thing when you have to, when you marry somebody, start living with that person and two or three weeks after the honeymoon a totally different person is suddenly there.

A person who's in a deeply negative energy field, says hurtful things, misinterprets what you do. You say, who did I marry? And you think this must be the real person.

Maybe I married, this was all a disguise. The real person is coming out now. That's of course not the case.

It's not the real person, it's the pain body. And where's yours? Oh.

Your partner's pain body wants yours, wants your emotional reaction. Pain body is an emotional aspect of ego. It's part of the egoic consciousness.

Pain body needs to be recognized in yourself and the other as it arises. It's not usually there all the time, that would be dreadful, but it comes periodically. And then you go back to normal for a while and then it comes back.

And so you need to recognize it, be there as the space for it, be the presence in the other and in yourself. Perhaps the most destructive thing in relationships is the pain body that people carry around with them, that takes them over and makes them, even sometimes people who are already awakening, they still get periodically get taken over by their pain body and completely lose consciousness and then completely identified with that energy field. It uses their mind.

It rises up when the pain body needs to renew itself, feed on somebody else's reaction, it moves into your mind and every thought you think is the thought of the pain body. It completely, the emotional energy field takes possession of your mind, which is probably, if you're not conscious, is probably problematic enough as it is even without the pain body. But then the pain body rises into your mind and then if you observe it in your partner, because if it happens to you, you can't observe it anymore, the presence is lost, but you can observe it in another more easily.

Every word they say to you is the pain body speaking through them as if an entity, and in a way it is like that, has taken possession of them and is now using their mind and speaking through their mind. You need to know that so that you do not react as if that were who they are. So that is where a degree of compassion comes in when you recognize that they are being possessed at that moment by this entity called pain body.

That helps to know it, but this entity is very cunning and knows exactly how to get an emotional reaction from you. It will accuse you, blame you, mention, it knows your weakest points and it will go in there and press all the right buttons until you finally go, and your own pain body has awakened and you're in the grip of it and you start shouting and whatever form the pain body takes. Or you may be present enough and so that you don't get taken over by your own pain body.

But even being in the grip of the pain body, if you're awakening, if the new consciousness is arising, there is a good chance that at the back there is still an observing presence and you are able to say to your partner, I think my pain body has just come up. I can feel it. There it is.

And if your partner's pain body has not come up yet, then he or she can help you to stay present with it. You can address it, see it. It happened just at this moment when you said that or that happened, that and now I can feel it.

Okay, let's stay with it. You may also point out to your partner that the pain body has come up when you observe it. And if you're lucky, there's still enough awareness there to recognize it.

But the pain body is very cunning. It may even be that your own pain body is coming up and you're accusing your partner that their pain body is there. Whoa, very cunning.

And of course, the interesting thing is if somebody says to you, there's your pain body. If there's a reaction, then he or she was right. What do you mean my pain body?

If there is an open looking, you say, that's my pain body. Okay. Okay, let me just feel into this.

Then probably wasn't. My pain body. Well, that's strange.

Didn't feel like a pain body, but maybe. Space, space, space. Is there space in this relationship with your child, with your partner, with your relative, with a newspaper person, with anybody?

Is there space? That is a vital question. So relationships is where your degree of presence is being challenged.

And it's your opportunity for the deepening of presence and intensification of presence, because you will need it in relationships. The hermit doesn't need that intensification of presence. The hermit is not being challenged by the human mind in others.

Maybe challenged by his or her own mind. That's maybe big enough as an obstacle for some, but being challenged by other human minds around you, that is the challenge. So your relationship, the degree of conflict or absence of conflict in relationships is a reflector that tells you where you are at as far as the arising consciousness is concerned.

Otherwise you could fool yourself so easily. So there, see what is the quality and depth of relationships? The quality and the depth, that's the same thing really.

Is there a depth in it? That's what I mean by what space is. Space is the dimension of depth.

Without space, inner space, all you have is the horizontal dimension of life. Which is past and future and the stream of thinking. That's the horizontal dimension.

Most people on this planet still move exclusively in the horizontal dimension of life. Their life has no depths. Their relationships have no depths.

They have a pseudo-depth. When the ego falls in love with someone, it looks and feels very deep, but it isn't really. It is an intense clinging, a wanting to take possession of, saying to the other, be with me, I need you.

Play the part that I have assigned to you and I play the part that you want me to play. And that looks deep for a while. When you are in love, you feel, wow, it looks so intense.

You can observe people that I have only met recently, how they look at each other with that intensity that says, you are so special and I will play the role that you want me to play. You play the role that I want you to play. And then they sit in the restaurant looking at each other.

It's a role. It's clearly a role that you play, but it looks good on film. And everybody's doing it.

You can see it in the movies. And then one year passes and then that stage is over. And then they just sit there in the restaurant.

Horizontal dimension and the vertical dimension. The vertical dimension is the dimension of depth, which has nothing to do with the content of your life, which exists in the past and the future, but ultimately only in the mind, because that's where past and future are. Find the vertical dimension of depth in your life.

Find the life underneath your life situation. No matter how burdensome or problematic your life situation seems to be, and particularly there in difficult life situations, the more difficult and burdensome your life situation is, the more vital, the more important it is to find the vertical dimension, the life underneath your life situation, which you can only find by accessing the power of the present moment within. A refusal to dwell mentally on past and future.

As much as possible, bring attention to this, the depths of now. Not just the surface of now, which is what's happening, but the space in which all this is happening. That's the consciousness that's here.

So the depths of this moment, the surface of this moment is this room, the voice, all your sense perceptions, whatever you feel, any thoughts that come into your head, they are all part of the content of now, the surface dimension. And the surface dimension is happening where? In you.

This entire room, the people in this room, is happening in you. Where else? Philosophers have even questioned whether, what the correspondence is between external reality and the inner.

They have questioned if there even is such a thing as an external reality, and some have considered that we are all engaged in a dream. So you need to consider the possibility that you are dreaming this room. You need to consider the possibility that you are dreaming this voice, talking in your dream.

Have you had a character ever in your dream that says to you, maybe this is a dream?

I'm not saying this is a dream, but I'd like you to consider the possibility that it is a little bit like a dream, because just as a dream, very soon this situation evaporates, dissolves. And then you look back tomorrow and you say, there was this room and there was a man talking about the now.

Was that a dream? Or perhaps for a moment after you wake up, you can't remember whether it was a dream or did it happen. Not that much different, because this, every situation dissolves just like a dream.

And so some people will tell you, yes, it is like a dream, and yes, it is, but even if it is a dream, you can still find the reality that underlies the dream. Because even a dream could not be if there were not the space of consciousness in which the dream appears. Otherwise it wouldn't be.

For it to be, there needs to be a field or space of consciousness. And in that light of consciousness, the dream appears. Otherwise there would be no dream.

So at the bottom of the dream, there must be something that is not, that is real. Even if everything else is unreal. And in some ways it is, compared to the absolute reality of that which underlies this impermanent world of form.

Compared to the absolute reality, compared to the absolute reality, yes, the whole thing that we experience here is a dream-like thing. And that's fine. But where is the reality?

The reality is that which makes the dream possible. The light of consciousness in which it appears. And where is that?

It's you. So you are not the form of you. You are not the name, or your job, or your past history, or your future, or this or that.

You're not the person. Ultimately, the person is part of that dream-like thing. Go to a cemetery and look at the gravestones.

They were all persons. And they've dissolved. If you go to an old cemetery, nobody even remembers who these people were.

They're just names. They've dissolved long ago. Dissolved.

Even that maybe the last people who remembered them were their grandchildren, and then they died long ago. And so it all evaporates very quickly. And yet, what is the reality behind all that?

You are the reality behind that. Not the temporal appearance of the person, but the consciousness in which all this happens. And that consciousness is timeless.

The now is always the now. Never not now. And you go this next morning, tomorrow morning, the same now, the same space, something different appears.

So there's dwell there rather than lose yourself in that. And then the world of form is actually quite an interesting place. No longer a veil of tears.

It's a veil of tears if there's nothing else. If you don't know the reality that underlies it, then it becomes suffering. You lose yourself in the character that you play in this life.

And you lose yourself totally in it. And then you believe all the other characters you meet are absolutely real. Don't realize that their reality is only relative.

They have a relative reality just as your character. I'm talking character in the sense of somebody in a play. And so we see the absolute, and then we can deal with the relative with much greater ease.

We are not lost in the relative. We are not lost in the surface world, in the world of form, not lost in time, the world of past and future, not lost in the continuous stream of thinking, which is all the same thing. Just all that's needed is for you to become acquainted with the dimension of depths, and then realize that's your home.

That's who you are. And you can't define it in any way. There's no definition that you could find for who you are.

There is a not knowing in that from the point of view of the mind, and yet anything you need to know will come out of that. Anything that you truly need, not just need to know, also anything that you truly need comes out of that. Seek only that.

All else will be given unto you. It changes even the externals. Seek that and not just seek it, be it.

Realize you are it, not a person, and then play with the person. The kingdom of heaven does not come with signs to be observed, he said 2,000 years ago. And when he used that kingdom of heaven, he pointed to us.

So if it's not with signs to be observed, means it's not outside. Oh, there, there, there. It is within.

It is your innermost reality.

2017 Eckhart Tolle Becoming A Teacher of Presence Audiobook

[Speaker 1] (0:00 - 2:33:50)

To have an intimate group again after quite a long time. I can look at everybody. We can exchange hugs.

Just got back a few days ago from a week-long retreat in New York with close to 400 people. In some ways, one could say that this little retreat is experimental. The form of it is experimental.

It seems we're going to address questions arising from working with people, having groups, working with individuals. That's the form or the content. And that's new.

What is not experimental is the essence of this retreat. And no matter whether this is the only one of this kind that is ever going to happen, or whether this particular form of retreat is the first of many, or whether it will develop into something else, the form is always secondary anyway, because the form is the content, whatever we talk about. Helpful, yes.

Helpful pointers. And yet, that's not the essence of our retreat. The essence is the state of presence.

If you can dwell in presence, whatever you need to know will come out of that. And more important than any of the things that we may talk about tonight is to recognize the depth of the state of presence and what it is that keeps you from living. In presence as a continuous state.

Because the moment you live in presence as a continuous state or predominant state, you are a teacher, as the Course in Miracles calls it, a teacher of God, whether you have formal groups or not. You cannot not teach presence when you live in presence. Teach in a wider sense.

Because whoever you meet is affected by presence. And we are here also to recognize what it is that keeps us from living in presence. And that is our belief in thought.

Not recognizing the relative nature of all thought. And completely believing in whatever thought arises in your mind. So we are here also to become aware of our relationship with thought.

Particularly this weekend. And I'll be reminding you of that. The non-recognition that every thought that arises in your mind is a perspective, a viewpoint from one angle.

It can never encapsulate the whole. It always is a fragment of the totality. Not seeing that, you become identified, drawn into, trapped by a fragmented way of being in the world.

Your sense of self clings especially to long-held thoughts and thought patterns. Like a bulldog not going to let go of this one. Because you derive a sense of self from identification with that.

Not recognizing that it is a perspective. No more. You could move a few steps, metaphorically speaking, and you would see the same reality from a different perspective.

I believe it was in the 70s, early 70s, a young girl called Patricia Hearst got kidnapped by terrorists. And after spending a few months with them, being kidnapped, and they must have spoken to her, she suddenly took part in bank robberies, and so on. She became one of them.

They explained to her their perspective, their viewpoint. And they explained, no, your perspective was totally wrong. The system is actually evil.

It's not us who are evil. It's the system that's evil, can't you see? And then it gives you the reasons, moi the system.

It's not difficult to convince you that the system is evil, easy. It's a fragment of the truth. And if you get drawn into a fragment, that becomes you.

Especially those ones that you've bitten into, and their long-held beliefs, or whatever it may be, on politics, diets, men, women, money, power. And then this is absolutely true. Stepping back from thought internally, one or two steps back, and their thoughts, quite useful sometimes, useless at other times, and seeing that not one thought could encapsulate the whole, the totality.

And you don't have to work out some kind of answer in your mind that explains the totality, the whole. Some kind of system of thought. They tried it.

A system of thought that explains it all. And communism became, was something like that. It could explain everything, everything you could explain from that particular perspective.

Any event would suddenly make sense, you would explain it. And then you try to impose the system on reality. So the greatest freedom is the freedom from thought.

Which first of all means not recognizing the relativity of thought. You're not free. Never being able to stop thinking.

That's the essence of bondage. And your effectiveness, as, for lack of a better word, as a teacher, depends to a large extent on your relationship with thought. And your non-identification with thought.

You don't need to demand that you should be free of thought from now on. No. Just step back from it and see its relative nature.

And anything that you cling to in the realm of thought eventually will obscure your ability to teach, to hold presence. And sooner or later, at some point, it'll come up and you'll be defending yourself. Defending your viewpoint.

Defending your position. And it's quite something to separate yourself from that. Enormous.

You can notice a clinging, yes, okay, I'll let go of, but not that one. Not this one. Surely that's right, what I believe about this situation or this person or that.

Surely that's right. Another way of putting it is that no thought is dreadfully important. But as I sometimes put it, don't take your thoughts too seriously.

As you sit here and the rest of the weekend, it's just thought. You're so much vaster than that. Tonight, this is just a meditation.

It doesn't look like a meditation, but it is. A meditation takes you out of identification with thought. And then tomorrow we'll be ready to use thought when it comes.

Maybe occasionally recognize that we have identified with a position, a mental position. It's become, a thought has become a me, has become a self. And then emotion comes in.

It's energized by an emotion. That's, I am, that is me. I must defend myself.

And watch that. Tonight, we are simply stepping out of thought. It's just a step back, one or two steps back.

Perhaps you can sense your body as you sit here, the aliveness in the energy field of the body. And it's easier to step back. And outside of thought, there is no problem.

And you have no problem. All problem is thought. So the moment you step out of thought, identification with thought, is also the realization that you have no problem.

Ever. Now. It's a collapse of a problematic sense of self.

It dissolves. And what's left, when there are no problems, are occasional challenges. But only in the now.

They cannot be anywhere else. Now, this moment, what's, is there a challenge? And you will recognize a challenge, that is.

And with every challenge, your alertness rises. You wake up a bit more. More intense presence.

And you may all be at this stage already, where that is possible. Instead of a challenge pulling you into more complete identification with thought and all the mental, emotional, reactive patterns, all strengthening a false sense of me, of self. Instead, the challenge, something goes wrong, you lose something, a difficult person, whatever form a challenge takes, if things are not going the way they should be, that's a pseudo-challenge, because the mind has created how things should be.

And then it's, if it's a true challenge, you face it. And there's an alertness in which it happens. And there's no reference to thought as to how am I going to solve this challenge, what am I going to do about it.

There's contact with an intelligence greater than thought. Alert stillness. No working out.

And out of that arises insight, realization, or right action. No longer right action, trying to figure out right and wrong, what's right and wrong, through the mind. And the mind can justify anything.

The state is right, the terrorist will justify this is right. Easy to find justifications, further thought to substantiate your position of rightness. So trying to figure out right and wrong through thought is impossible.

In the Koran it says, thou shalt not kill, but unfortunately the sentence continues, except for a just cause. Hmm, well, then thought comes in, of course I have a just cause, let me tell you why. And you lose the feeling of aliveness, because while I'm telling you why mine is a just cause, I get trapped more and more in a world of mental conceptualization.

I can no longer sense that which is beyond concept. Life, the aliveness in each human being, completely deadened through that. And I'm explaining why this is a just cause.

So the terrorist does that in an extreme form. He deadens the group of people through putting labels on them, concepts, and totally identified with them. You can no longer sense their aliveness, and you don't sense your own aliveness anymore, because the moment you trap other people in mental labels, you've trapped yourself.

You can do anything and you don't know what you're doing anymore. But everybody has that to some extent, that identification with thought. In a smaller way, nobody in this room would go out and blow up a hundred or a thousand or several thousand people.

Nobody is that unconscious. And everybody in this room is already moving out of that, and yet the root patterns which are at the core of human unconsciousness have been for thousands and thousands of years. The root patterns of that are in everyone, and it's only in you that it can be dissolved.

And what you've done then is immeasurable, not just you haven't done it for yourself. The whole of humanity, one human being becoming free of that, has an enormous effect on the rest of humanity. So to see that, and one label, if there's only one label left in you that you completely believe in concerning a situation or person, that one will keep you trapped.

And it looks harmless enough, but it'll keep you trapped in thought. It'll be that area where thought clings to you and you cling to thought, and your sense of self clings to thought. The deeper meaning of forgiveness, which is a spiritual term, is no longer clinging to thoughts, because every thought ultimately is a judgment.

And wisdom is not judgment, but the relinquishment of judgment. And what then emerges from within you is so much vaster than thought. The state of pure awareness that's already in you would be not quite right to think that is something that you need to attain.

One could say it's already there underneath thought in you, and never recognized by thought. Thought cannot understand it. And maybe arising in you far more than you realize when you start thinking about whether you live in presence or in awareness or not.

No, I don't remember being aware at any time. The mind doesn't understand it. Of course, you can't remember it through thought.

And yet, you may have walked from the door to where you're sitting now in the state of simple, clear, pure awareness. There's nothing spectacular about it. Or you may have put some sugar in your tea or honey, and there was no thought involved, and not absentmindedly either.

Just simple action without the involvement of thought. There may have been the state free of thought when you were listening to somebody sitting next to you at dinner, talking, and pure listening. Perhaps, perhaps not.

It is a wonderful thing when you catch yourself, so to speak, in that state, although the danger is that immediately the mind comes in and claims an attainment. I'm there now. I can do it.

But to catch yourself, it means to become aware directly of awareness. We all know spiritual traditions speak of the state of attention. Buddhists call it mindfulness.

But the most wonderful thing is when you can become aware of that field of a large stillness. And it's not that there's any dualistic relationship here. You are not becoming aware of it.

It's only language does that. It becomes aware of itself. And that is that which gives satsang.

Not you. Oh, that's a relief. I don't have to do it.

You don't have to even learn how to do it. You couldn't. Satsang is, means, sangha, company, something like that.

Sat means being, being in the company of being. And no person can give satsang. But only when there's the absence of the person.

And what is a person other than identification with thought and thought structures? So to be a highly effective teacher of presence, just don't be there as a person. The slightest clinging to any thought, especially the favorite ones, it keeps you there as a little person.

And for a while it may not interfere. There may even be some, and it'll always catch up in obscure presence. You will never feel ready to teach.

Or if you see, I'm ready now, that's the greatest delusion. And because it's the mind-made self that says, now it's time to teach. You will always feel inadequate as the little me.

But the little me doesn't need to teach. And so you come to love that state of not knowing. Not knowing even how to teach.

Not coming from another position that says, I know, or I know the answers. The most powerful teacher doesn't know and is happy with that. And I don't need to know how to interpret this moment.

And it might be a teaching situation or any moment. Increasingly, being able to live in that way that simply allows to express totally what is to be, don't need to interpret in any way. Especially human beings.

And your task while you're here is not move away from now. Then thought is superfluous. And while you're here, and quite a few times you may miss it, make nothing into a means to an end.

No movement thinking that the result that I want to achieve through this movement is more important than this movement. And now is not a means to a future end. It is completely for it.

So while you walk from here to there, you can be there in every step. While you drink, take off your shoes. Life consists of that.

There's lots full of little things like that. That's all of life, really. You're always sitting, standing and lying somewhere and doing something somewhere.

But the mind is saying big things about it. There's a huge, vast story that you don't really, this isn't the right moment. The story is going somewhere else.

But it's always all the many little things. That's all there is. And something deeper is there in the little things.

When you give them the fearful attention. What is that something deeper when you're just taking off your shoes? Isn't that insignificant?

Putting on your shoes. Surely there are more important things than putting on your shoes. What is the deeper thing about putting on your shoes when you give them your full attention?

It's the attention. In which it happens. That field of bare, alert, still attention.

In which a seemingly insignificant thing happens. But compared to the vastness of that field, everything is insignificant that happens. So it doesn't matter whether you encounter that when you put on your shoes.

Or they give you the Nobel Prize for something. As I saw they have advertisements for a certain watch. I can't remember what watch.

And they call it significant moments. And I don't know what they can express. Particularly those moments you look at your watch when you get the Nobel Prize.

But those come quite rarely. They come occasionally. Big things.

Ultimately no different from small things. And it's not the things, all the little or big things that you do that matter that much. There's something deeper there.

And never getting beyond the surface appearance of things. What a life. And always thinking, well, the next one surely is more important than this one.

Because I know that this one isn't important. Nor depth to life. Surface phenomenon.

The whole of life becomes a surface phenomenon. And you yourself become a surface phenomenon. And then you die.

What happened? I must have missed something. Yes, you did.

You missed the whole thing. So the importance is not in what happens in your life or doesn't happen. That's all relative importance.

Relative importance, yes. But not, one could say, what really matters is to whom it happens. One could put it like that.

Who are you? Who is this happening to? But there's no answer to that in the head as a concept.

So you're putting on your shoes here. Getting ready for breakfast. And honor this moment completely, fully.

Be there. And you don't need thought. You might have noticed to tie your shoelaces.

Thought is not required. So usually you would be thinking about something totally different. Just quickly get this done out of the way because the mind is already there.

And instead be with this. And it won't be long before you notice that everything that happens there is a dimension of depth. And everything that happens happens in that dimension of depth.

And that depth is an inner field of stillness. And it's very much alive. It's still.

And there you put on your shoes. And then the next thing. Nothing is dreadfully important ever really.

And another thing. And instead of losing yourself in the mind in the next thing, lose yourself in the world. And it's never significant enough.

That's why you always need the next moment. Maybe that one will be more significant than this one. And the completeness is already here.

That out of which everything arises. The ground of being is your essence. And it's here.

And it's so much greater than anything that happens. Vast. It holds.

It encompasses everything. So you know it at first as the alert still attention in which you look at a flower. It could be an action or it could be simply a perception.

And there's not just the flower there now. Because if you don't know the field in which the perception happens and know yourself as the field in which it happens, then all you know is the form that you see. And the tragic thing is it's not going to last very long.

And so that's sad if you don't know that which is beyond form. And then one day you sit there and you've invited a group of people into your home. And there's just that.

And you may look at people unless they are, you know they're not comfortable with it. People, so many people are not comfortable with being looked at. Because they think when you're looking at them, you're thinking something about them.

They don't know that when you're looking at them, there's just stillness. And that's a transmission of presence. And that is teaching beyond any form.

Anything you look at, to just use that particular perception, undergoes changes when you place pure attention on it. Anything. Especially humans.

And you're not doing anything. And you don't have to do it in an obvious way. So you gaze for five minutes.

It could just be a few seconds. And they may not even know it. There's simply a field of stillness around the perception.

And you don't have to wait for a formal teaching situation to teach. When you look at the supermarket cashier putting things through the computer that reads the barcode, it could be there. That's stillness.

And that's just the looking. And there's a transmission of presence. And you're not doing anything.

There's not me doing anything. The shortest interaction. And a lot of our lives is to do with brief.

We meet many people during the course of the day. Brief interactions. Can you bring the field of stillness into each interaction?

Or are you lost in mind? And so two minds are interacting, thinking they are human beings. Can you bring the field of stillness into each meeting, each encounter?

And be there predominantly as the stillness and not as the person. It doesn't mean you cannot use your form identity when it's needed and speak. But you are there as the essence of who you actually are.

Not the pseudo self, the little me. You are there as the field of stillness in any human interaction. And they may try very hard to pull you out of that.

Their mind says, don't you see that this matters? Come on, feed me this thought. Can't you see that this thought matters?

Come on, let's feed thought together. So the mind will try to draw you into the mind frequency. You know what he did?

And you know what he said then? And then, oh, and it matters. The most beautiful teaching situations are not recognized as teaching situations.

Teaching in the deepest sense, through the simple encounters. And it could just be two seconds, three seconds. And many of you are doing it already and you may not even know it.

I should use the word doing. It's not a doing, but it's like languages like that. Three seconds of stillness while you say hello.

And there's no thought. There's just a depth. That is true.

Healing, one could say, in the deepest sense. You give them their own reality and you haven't given anything. You reflect back to them their own reality and they may not even know it.

And of course, as you know, the essence of our gathering here is not what we talk about, that we do that anyway. But the essence is to know yourself as the stillness underneath the noise. To know yourself as that.

That's the essence. Otherwise, you can forget about having groups or anything. Know yourself as that.

And the practice here is to simply sit. When I'm not speaking, is there anything that you need to add to this moment? Is there anything that needs to be worked out through the head?

The mind might say, I'm not getting enough out of this. He's not, it's not enough. What's the next thing?

Okay, with stillness, yes, I understand that now, but what's the next thing? Now, to make that practice a little easier here, I suggest strongly that between the end of our evening session here tonight and the beginning of our morning session tomorrow, that we don't engage in talking. That makes it a little easier to be still.

Later, it's not required anymore. You can talk and you can allow others to talk. You don't need to demand that they should be still.

But initially, just because we're here to deepen stillness, to know it more fully, be it more fully, it helps occasionally to have a period of non-speaking. And then you can look at things and people and there's the form of that person and there's a stillness in which you're perceiving that. And if there's not the stillness, there's no need to condemn yourself and say, I can't get to the stillness.

I want to perceive people through the stillness, but there's always some noise going on in my head. I just, it's not working for me. I might as well go home.

What to do then? Whatever mental noise is happening while you perceive another human being or anything, you don't take it too seriously. You don't believe in it completely.

It's recognized as thought. Thought is still happening. And so there's the perception and there's thought.

And so the quickest way out of that, it's not even trying to get out of it, is allowing the fact that there is mental noise and not completely believing in it. That allowing creates a space even around the mental noise, that spaciousness, that stillness. So the spaciousness or the stillness can be around to the perception, but it can also be around, even around mental noise or even about emotional ups and downs, wave movements of emotions.

Even there, the spaciousness, which is another point for the stillness, another same thing, can be there around an emotion or around mental noise. How can it be there? How can you know the spaciousness around?

Mental noise seems to be the absence of spaciousness, the absence of stillness. How can you know it even with it there? And you won't know it as if you knew an object, there it is, because it's the nature of spaciousness, that it cannot be pinpointed or grasped.

Allowing it to be, because it is at this moment, you allow this moment and whatever is in it to be, and there's the spaciousness. At first, it's just not a complete involvement in the mind streams anymore. And that's the beginning of the arising of the spaciousness, the still spaciousness around the world of form, anything, external forms or inner forms as thoughts or emotions, external forms as situations and people.

So you cannot lose yourself completely in mental and emotional forms if you allow them to be. Allow, and this you may forget. And you get back home, and the moment you get back home, all patterns may return.

And the only thing that you forget there really is the allowing. The allowing refers to this moment. Allow it to be as it is.

Not even demand that you should be still. That can lead you astray too. If you're not still, you allow that.

It is. That's how it is. I'm full of mental noise.

That's how it is. It is, noise, and there's a spaciousness. And when that is there, even the mental noise will change.

You don't have to do anything. It then subsides because you're no longer involved that much in it. So you could perhaps put a few until it becomes a normal way to live.

You could put little stickers in every room and on your dashboard. Allow this moment. When you go to bed tonight, thought is unimportant.

Be in the body. Lie there on your back. Enter that field of aliveness.

Not much to think about there. Just that aliveness that is there in every cell. And if you wake up in the middle of the night, uh, uh, hmm, uh, my, me, my problems next week, there's, uh, uh, immediately go into the body.

Be there. Lie on your back. Inhabit the body fully.

And first thing in the morning, you wake up. Instead of going into here, and if you look more clearly, all that, if you go into here, it'll be connected with some, some, after two or three minutes, the first problem will be there. And another, and another.

Go and be in the body. And lie there. And so you, that's a practice.

You go to sleep from there. If you wake up, immediately you go into the body. Intensely.

Hold it. Hold that. And first thing in the morning, lie in that field, that energy field, and then get up.

You find yourself getting up suddenly. And then the alertness that is then there goes with you when you have a shower. And you feel the sense perceptions.

And then you have breakfast again. People won't be speaking, so it will be a little easier to be there. In presence, in stillness.

Now tomorrow we will speak, of course, when we meet. But we'll always go back into stillness. Always back.

You become very intelligent in that way. Because the stillness is pure intelligence. And that's only one aspect of it.

But whether or not you become better at solving IQ tests, that we don't know. It's not that kind of intelligence. It's deeper than that.

There's far greater depth to intelligence than the ability to solve little puzzles. Creative intelligence. I don't want to offend anybody who is good at IQ tests.

So a few reminders. Being in the body. Especially when you lie in bed.

And when you sit here also, of course. It's very helpful. Recognize that no thought is that important.

And it's always only an aspect of the truth. It's not the truth. If that small aspect, small fragment.

And often the opposite is also true. And to know the total truth, you'd have to hold them both together. So not a means to an end.

Any little activity that you do, do it fully. So that it's not serving a future goal. Because that next thing is not going to be that much bigger than this thing.

Be fully in every step. Of course, you'll miss quite a few times. But it doesn't matter.

And you notice a strange thing when you do that. You notice how your relationships, Thiele talk about relationships and they always mean it's relationships, intimate relationships with other humans. But the most common relationships are the relationships in the world of objects.

Nobody would ever pay much attention to that. You're always relating to some objects because you're sitting on them. You wear them, you touch them, handle them.

Continuously, there's a world of so-called inanimate objects around you. And it's completely ignored mostly unless some very spectacular object suddenly comes into your life and somebody gives you a gold bracelet or whatever. But usually you don't pay much attention.

It's a means to an end because the present moment is a means to an end. The world of objects are means to ends and they're handled in that way. And then a strange thing, a shift happens when suddenly the moment is not a means to an end.

Then the world of objects becomes more alive suddenly. It has beingness, it has presence. Every object has beingness and presence as the great artists knew who sometimes painted the most insignificant, seemingly insignificant objects that nobody would have looked at twice.

And now you have to pay $15,000 to buy the painting of an old chair. And somebody looked without the interference of mental labels and thought, truly looked at the most insignificant possible of you can think of, an old, cheap, rickety chair and looked and saw a depth there far beyond the form that appears. Of course, the depth was also in him.

And somehow that got on the canvas, the essence of that realization, the essence of perceiving in that deep way without the interference of thought, somehow God is still there in this work of art. So to see when you handle the world of objects more consciously that every object is alive too. You will almost feel as if it had its own rudimentary field of consciousness.

And you'll notice that the world of objects has a relationship with you. Ultimately, you're not separate, you're one. And ultimately, it's not outside of you anyway.

Let's just pretend for a moment that it is. I've observed a few people who are totally immersed in their mind continuously. And they're always at odds with the world of objects.

They break things, they lose things, things break down for no apparent reason. There's always something that goes wrong for them, as if the world of objects even were against them, let alone the human world. It's the antagonistic relationship to life that is even there in your relationship to objects, let alone human interactions when you live in that way.

So here, be aware of when you, it makes a noise, there's a little noise when you touch something, the shoes, whatever. And so there comes a loving, not love, I would say, a lovingness also towards the world of objects, no longer a fighting attitude towards the world of objects, but a lovingness. As long as you deny the now, you're in a fighting relationship even with the world of objects, let alone humans.

By becoming friendly with the now, the first, you also become friendly with the so-called inanimate world, and it's not really inanimate. And it's a beautiful thing when you see that objects are also treated with loving care in that, not a means to an end. So here, be conscious of your interaction with the world of objects.

I do strange things occasionally. Sometimes I pick something up, it just happens, a knife, a fork in the kitchen, or mug, or a pen, and just hold it and look and feel. And sometimes even a can with something in it, a metal can with baked beans in it or something, and you, oh, it has a presence too.

So there are all these little things here, little practices, ways in which to be, to interact. Attention, now. I know for sure, although I can't tell you how, that when you give attention in that way, full attention to an object or person, it changes, it does something.

Physicists realize that the first time when they notice that the observer who conducts the experiment influences the experiment. The very fact that you're observing changes it. And if you had a stone here and you give it attention, and you have it in your home, and you occasionally look at it, if you could examine the molecular structure, you would notice changes.

It's just a little aside. Don't need to believe that. No need to believe anything here, that's a good thing.

So we will keep, as the Buddhists say, normal silence, stay alert. What we are moving beyond is a personalized existence. And we realize that neither the unconscious state of identification with mind and ego, emotions, nor the state of presence that is arising is personal.

There's nothing personal with being unconscious, and there's nothing personal with being conscious. And that's a great liberation. There's nothing personal in it.

Not a me. The essence of the unconscious state is to look for me, the person, either to look in it, in its future projection of me as the one who is going to be enlightened and seek an enhanced person in that, or to make all movements of thought and the emotional fluctuations that go with it into a personal thing, not recognizing that anger is human anger. It's basically the same vibration, no matter in whom it appears, fear, sadness, any other emotions to do with mental machinery, jealousy, this and that.

They are human emotions. It's not a person. Complete identification with that causes the illusion that there's somebody there, an entity.

So in the unenlightened state, your life becomes difficult because you personalize the flux of emotions and the stream of thoughts, because thoughts are again human thoughts, the human mind, and identification with the thought stream as me, that's nobody's personal problem. That's the human condition. So it's great to see that there is nothing personal in it, neither here nor there.

And also see that there's a tendency in each one to perpetuate the personal sense of self rather than being a greater opening into life, a manifestation of the one life that expresses itself through this form, which nature is beautifully. Then we create an enclosed sense of self, what about me? That tendency can come up, you observe it in yourself.

Many times to personalize. Somebody wrote a book that's been on many bestseller lists. I've only looked at a few pages, and I only saw one page.

The book is called The Four Agreements. I only remember one of them, and that's take nothing personally. Expressed very simply there, he doesn't go into the detail that, although what I'm saying is not complex, but he doesn't even explain with all that.

He just says simply, don't take anything personally. Because when you personalize, you immediately enter into a reactive relationship with life. The personal selfhood strengthens itself through reactivity, and you gain a stronger sense of self through it, stronger illusion, stronger person.

It feels better for a while because you have fortified the illusion. So as you identify with the reactive force, on one level it feels good, to the illusion it feels good because it has strengthened itself. And now your identification with a position, a mental, and then emotions energize that, and you think you're defending some great truth, which is mental, and there's no absolute truth in the mental realm, but you believe at that time you're defending a great truth, and of course you're defending an illusion.

That's the reason. And it feels good to the illusion, not to you, but you don't know that. That illusion, which sometimes we could call ego, always confuses pleasure and pain.

And the wonderful thing is, as we are stepping out of that, you are no longer identified with mental positions. A me is no longer in, you can still have opinions, but they are not energized by a personal sense of self. You are not in it anymore, and you realize the relativity of every opinion, and then it's fine to have opinions.

And you could even listen to somebody else's opinion, contrary or opposite of yours, and say, oh, yeah, that's interesting, that's another perspective on it. I still prefer my perspective, but that one is valid too. The Buddha talked about this.

He used the expression, I believe the translation is, the thicket of opinions. And it's often emphasized in Buddhism to let go of opinions. But it really means to let go of identification with opinions that give you a me position.

If you hold the space of presence, and there's a group of people, if you start speaking, sharing, some people will express mental positions, perhaps. And just as you recognize mental positions in yourself, you recognize mental positions in others, and allow that. You don't counteract it with your position.

And other minds, there's only one mind, but it looks like different minds in different people. The mind will try to draw you into positions and reaction. When you facilitate a group, the alertness, the alert presence, that does all the work, will almost automatically rise as you hold the space of a group, and there's no body doing it, the dimmer switch, the degree of presence rises, just as it would if you were challenged by a critical situation, a danger situation.

The intensity, the alertness rises, and you feel it throughout the body, a more intense aliveness. And that is the state in which, as one could say, you're holding the space of presence. Presence is doing it, but we're just using language.

You're holding the space of presence. The easiest way to hold the space of presence is when nobody is speaking. So the easiest way to have a group is to have an agreement that nobody's going to say a word.

That's one way. That avoids many problems. But even there, the qualitative difference of that group, there'll be a great difference in the energy field if there's only one person, even if it's just one person who is able to remain in the state of thoughtless awareness, of just being here.

That has an enormous effect on that. And many others can be drawn, if only temporarily, into that state. And then to listen to some tape or for a little while can help also to deepen that state.

And after listening, return into some stillness and again, you will see others are drawn and then the field of presence becomes a collective field in the room. And that has an enormous, it gets an enormous help to enter the collective field of presence. It has nothing to do with emotions or as you sometimes find in meetings, often religious nature, we generate an emotion.

Of course, as you know, it has nothing to do with emotion. So to a pool, when humans meet in the state of presence, there is a pool, one could say, all language is limited, but a pool of presence. And each apparent individual can draw on that and contributes to that.

It's a two-way process. That is also the sacredness of groups that meet in that field because the field of presence is sacred beyond religion or belief systems. When the mind interprets it, you could say, there was strong Christ presence there.

Yes. Or Buddha nature, just different names. So just the simplest gathering of that kind has a powerful effect, not only on those people that are gathered, but also on the totality.

And that it was no coincidence because everything is connected. Everything is part of a larger whole that we had our gathering with almost 400 people for one week last week. And it happened to coincide in space and time, both space and time.

It happened to coincide with the extreme expressions of human insanity that were taking place not far from there, not far in space and time, very close. There was, it seems, an intensification of the insanity and almost simultaneously an intensification of something else arising. And that was almost 400 people for one week.

It was perhaps the most powerful retreat we've had. And before I didn't know, does a retreat work with almost 400 people? Can that still work?

And the answer is yes, it worked beautifully. So the collective pool of presence that then not only draws out that unconditioned consciousness that is beyond the conditioned mind, but also feeds it. It's a growth happens there of an arising and then it emanates.

And many who are even slightly open to it will benefit from it, no matter how distant they are in space. Slight openness and it makes it easier for everyone in whom presence is already arising through this form. It's like, always use that expression, the flowering, the flowering of consciousness.

Something, a new dimension suddenly coming into this world. So the simplest group already works, meeting in silence, listening maybe to a talk, more silence, and then everybody goes home. That's one way.

And if you facilitate it, you may notice that as people arrive, your alertness rises. It intensifies. It's not a social occasion.

Just as it can at this moment, as I point this out, what does it mean alertness rises? If suddenly this door opened and a bear walked into this room, your alertness would rise or it would fall and you would start screaming and probably do the wrong thing. Completely wrong.

Or the alertness rises. Or you're driving a critical moment, suddenly incredible alertness, no fear in it. I sometimes call it the dimmer.

It's like a dimmer switch. The degree of presence can be just in the background or it can become intense. And that is the intensity that Zen masters point to.

And that's the intensity of just this. And if you move away one inch, I'll hit you with a stick, says the Zen master. So it arises.

It's not consciously willed. It's an opening rather than you cannot try to be present because all trying means you're trying to reach some point in the future. That's the nature of trying.

I need to become more present. But there's not trying in presence. Presence is now.

It's rather all mental noise subsides and that arises. And there comes the bear into the room and you look and you're completely in a state of not knowing in that. At least nothing that the mind would call knowing, words or concepts.

That alertness would be there if you were looking at a stunning scenery, very spectacular. And there's this expression, the word is awe. Maybe that comes because people say, so there's actually a word now, onomatopoeia, whatever it's called, A-W-E.

The state of awe is that state of openness is presence. There's no mind in that state of that openness. And that intensifies when you are in a group situation.

The space, the spaciousness. Now, later I'm going to ask for your, from your experience, what you have learned already from groups, mistakes you have made, if there are mistakes, what worked for you, what didn't work. The next level is, perhaps at some point, words are coming out of your mouth.

Without being drawn into mind identification. So that thought is only giving form to that which arises from beyond thought. No old thought, your viewpoints or your opinions or your beliefs.

And I'm going to tell you what's right. Or facile explanations. That all comes from the accumulated knowledge of the mind.

And that applies even people who have suffered tragedy, people in recent events or in their personal lives, so-called personal. Some mental explanation that, but he said they're all in heaven now, there's nothing to worry about, all those people who died. That may be true, but it's a belief.

And is he really meeting those people who are suffering? I'm not going to give you any methodology or what to do in groups. It needs to arise organically out of presence, but just a few pointers.

What you do will arise, what works will arise from within organically. So not applying some method, you don't need that. It would be an alien thing imposed.

And when there's presence, that's not needed. If you speak, my suggestion would be that the first words direct people into the body so that their attention moves from the head to a deeper level. So you lead people into the body and there may be some people who are new and who've never been in the body before.

They've for 40, 50 years, they've never been in the body. And it may be meaningless. They feel the inner body.

They say, where? Doesn't make sense. I can't work that out.

What do you mean? The easiest device getting people into the body, and I've used it a few times and it works, even for people who've never been there, is you can do this with anybody, your grandparents, your grandmother, any little child. No understanding is required.

To just say, and some of you have heard me say that before, hold up your right hand or left hand, close your eyes. Is there any way you can know without touching anything or moving your hand or opening your eyes, without any of this, is there any way you can know whether your right hand is there, still there? Is there any way you can find out without moving it, touching anything, or looking at it, whether your right hand is still there?

You ask that question. And that question will direct their attention, after a little while, into the inner feeling of right hand. So it'll take their attention.

First, they'll try to work out mentally. Is there any way I can know? And then you ask that question again.

Perhaps you can find out. And so the attention then, for some people, it's a revelation. For the first time, they can feel that something in the body is alive and they feel, yes, there's a subtle sense of aliveness where my right hand is.

And they feel a very subtle flow of aliveness there. And then you will point out, right, you've entered the body. That's the beginning of it.

And that is, for some people, it's a beautiful revelation. And they are surprised that there is actually aliveness there. They had never even thought that there could be aliveness in the body.

They might have been concerned with their external physical body and how it looks, but never felt a deep inner aliveness there. And there it is. And then, so you can see if you can do it with the other hand, find out if that's still there.

Oh, that can then help work more quickly. And then bring the two together into one feeling, feel them both at the same time. Oh, and at first, it works beautifully.

And the strange thing is, feeling your hands immediately sensitizes you more to feeling other parts of the body, even if they're not specifically pointed out. So by entering your hands, through your hands, you could be the entry point. It's very easily felt for most people.

Already there's greater aliveness, even in those parts that are not specifically addressed yet. And particularly, if you've done this for a while, you can enter the body from anywhere and suddenly the aliveness is there all over. You can use any entry point.

And so that is for, this is a beautiful thing you can do for people who come and then gradually take them into the rest of the body and feel it. Can you sense also that your feet are equally alive? Equally.

And so gradually develop this ability to sense different parts of the body as one. There was a teacher called Jean Klein, who I believe he used that expression, a global sense of beingness or aliveness, global presence, meaning all over. And a few pointers are then needed to point out the significance of feeling the inner body, because otherwise the mind will dismiss it and say, this is not important.

Yes, it feels good, but I've got other things to worry about. So if it's not understood, the mind needs a little bit of understanding, then it's easier to see why, what is the significance of being in the body? And so you explain the vast intelligence that undoubtedly is in the body, in every cell, in every organ, in the DNA, so vast that no human mind and not all the computers put together could coordinate the functions of the body, not even a tiny percentage of it.

So you are connecting with an intelligence that is greater than what you had thought of as intelligence, which is just the human mind, not separate from it, but vaster. So the vastness begins by entering what looks like this limited little thing, the body, but it is only the doorway. So the entry point into that vastness is through that doorway and realize you're now connecting with that greater intelligence that dwells in there.

And you can also point out that you may notice that when you sense the inner body, less thinking is taking place in your mind, because you cannot simultaneously be in your body and have a lot of thought activity in your head. Because your consciousness is either consumed by thought, in which case consciousness continuously is being born into forms, or you can have your consciousness, instead of going out into form, returning back into the formless and the formless one life, one consciousness of which the mind is only an expression. So it's a reversal.

So you point out, people will notice that the mind becomes stiller as you enter the body. And people are not becoming less intelligent, but more intelligent because they connect with that greater intelligence, that vastness. And you just need to point that out that it is also the beginning of the inner realm of stillness as they enter within, out of which all great creations have come in this world.

Artists, some of the creative scientists, all created out of the decisive moments of realization were always stillness, preceded by stillness. And probably an aliveness in the body, even if they didn't know it, they were sitting there. That is the creative state of total openness and receptivity.

Boredom, there's no such thing in that state. Boredom is the mind trying to look for the next thing and not finding it. That's boredom.

Boredom means you're in your mind. If you're sitting here and you're bored, it's a clear indication you're in your mind. There's nothing wrong with that, just know it.

Because sitting here is not boring, but it's boring because this vital aliveness to this gathering. But if you cannot feel your body as you sit here, you'll be bored. There's not enough for the mind.

And the same, also that when people come to a gathering to point out what boredom is, because the mind can easily become bored in a gathering. And to point, what does that mean? Boredom means the mind is looking for the next thing to get born into, identification with the next thought or the next external interesting thing or the next thing it could react to.

And so be born, it seeks rebirth in Buddhist terms. The mind seeks continuously to be reborn into some new form. And that could be a reaction.

Okay, that's the egoic mind. Or it could be a thought it identifies with, which is where I'm going to be tomorrow. You flow into that.

Reaction's our favorite one, of course. It's a strong rebirth. Every time you react, it's a very powerful rebirth of me.

So the mind seeks that continuous rebirth. Or it could be an emotion that you identify with as me. That happens.

And it could be anger or heaviness. And it becomes, you're born into, you identify with that, it becomes personalized. It's a me.

It fuels further thought, which more form identity. And so if you point those simple things out that enable people to become aware of their basic inner processes, and this has to not just be pointed out once because the mind will forget it, obscure it, and maybe not even listen. Almost at every meeting, you may need to point out what the mind tends to do.

At this very moment, you may be in a state of boredom. You may be in a state of restlessness. And if it is, if it's the case, simply to observe that.

What does it mean? You're in the mind and looking for another birth. Maybe you already found another birth.

You found something to react to right here and now, in which case, congratulations, you achieved another rebirth into a stronger sense of me through the reactive force. Great, it worked again. And that is the deeper meaning.

In Buddhism, in popular Buddhism, when they talk about the end of rebirth, they think it's a grand, it's a cosmic thing that you finally achieve, perhaps in 2,000 years time, or another 100 incarnations, when you finally achieve the state in which you will no longer be reborn with the deeper meaning of that is immediate, to recognize the deeper meaning of rebirth, identification with form. So rebirth happens at this moment. And you're seeking rebirth at this moment.

And freedom from rebirth is possible at this moment. Now, this is the essence of truth, and it can be pointed out very simply. You may have to do it every time people come, because the mind will forget it and deny it.

Oh, yes. And then you can watch that process in yourself. And as you teach, you learn.

It deepens in yourself, because learning and teaching are not really two. You teach and you learn at the same time. That's the beauty, because you're not ultimately separate from those beings.

It is a single process, teaching and learning. What comes out of my mouth is always determined by the energy field of the group. If the group didn't draw it out of this form, nothing would happen.

And sometimes what comes out of the mouth varies. It depends on the collective field of the group. This form is not separate from those forms.

It's one. The ancient saying, the teacher and the torch together produce the teaching. It is not, and again, not falling into the illusion that you, that you personalize your function, the function of this form, and you personalize that, and then you see yourself as a teacher.

Then you get trapped again. There's a new rebirth of me in the head and an image identity of me in the head, and you have now become a teacher. Congratulations.

Another rebirth. It worked again. And that is a subtle trap for people.

Anybody who temporarily performs the function of facilitating that, you identify with the function and it becomes another self sense of self. And then in a very subtle sense, you feel that you are teaching and then you're walking to the supermarket and you're no longer a simple human. You are now a spiritual teacher.

And you carry that around with you. And if you become very successful as a spiritual teacher, then other people will project a form identity onto you. Because truth flows through the form, so they perceive the form as special.

Not realizing that truth is one and it's equally in everyone. It's only a question of to what extent it is obscured. That's all.

But there's an equal amount of truth in everyone. And as I put it last week at the retreat, nobody is closer to God than you are. And the illusion that somebody else is closer to God is another egoic illusion.

So that's a beautiful realization. But if you become successful, and you may, because there's an enormous longing for truth now. And before you know it, there may have been a great opening in you and suddenly truth flows through you.

You emanated as peace and aliveness and presence. And the words that you speak come out of that also. And then, of course, the beautiful thing is challenges always come.

Then your challenge is, people will project an image of you. For a while, you keep yourself clear of images. You remain in the state of openness.

And the moment people leave, you're not a spiritual teacher anymore. It's only a function, not an identity that you carry around. So when you go to the supermarket, you go as simply a field of presence, walking, floating, looking at the shelves.

That's no, you don't carry the burden of an identity, but people will project the identity. The more successful you become as a teacher, so to speak, the more powerful the teaching is. That means people will project some form identity onto you and you get bombarded by that, perhaps.

And after a few years or a few months, suddenly you are somebody again. It's happened to some teachers. You can sometimes see in some teachers, even the change from the earlier photos, where they are so simple, and the later photos when they've become successful gurus.

And that can happen quickly these days because there's such, so much coming through now. So before you know it, some of you could have turned into gurus. And so that's another beautiful challenge to recognize the projections of a form identity, not to hang on so that the openness remains.

That's, on one hand, you may never feel ready to teach the truth. The mind says, no, I'm not ready yet. Not yet.

I'll just wait a bit more. I'm not ready yet. And you'll never feel ready.

That is one movement of the mind. Not good enough. I'm not good enough yet.

Don't know enough yet. What am I going to tell them? I don't know that much.

You hardly need to know anything. There were some very great spiritual teachers who knew almost nothing on the level of knowledge. And even Jesus, each person in this room, I'm sure is more highly educated than Jesus was.

It's obvious. There wasn't that much knowledge around at the time. And according to all accounts, wasn't even highly educated, even according to the standards of the time.

You don't need more knowledge. That's for sure to become a teacher. But the mind will say, I don't know enough yet.

I need to know a bit more to be effective as an instrument for transformation. This form becomes an instrument for the transformation of consciousness to be effective. That does not depend on adding anything more to yourself.

In any realm or dimension, it is not an adding to who you are. Neither knowledge nor great firework spiritual experiences that come and go, but that you could remember and then add to that. Or just life experience, even that don't need.

It's not an adding. It's that the truth is already shining as the stillness that is underneath thought. The sun is already there.

What can you add to that? Nothing. So it is not true that you need to acquire anything more to become an effective instrument of transformation.

So one movement of the mind says, no, I just need to wait. There may be another movement of the mind that says, I really want to be a spiritual teacher. At the same time, it says, but I'm not quite ready yet, or maybe I'm ready now.

Again, the desire to be a spiritual teacher. Oh, there was one master who announced he already had followers and said, I've detected in myself a desire to be a spiritual teacher. So I've stopped.

I'm dissolving our group, our gathering. This is it, go home. So it's a very subtle thing.

But on the one hand, you never feel ready, not good enough, wanting to be great and good. I want to become that. Nothing is needed.

No further understanding is necessary to be effective. No further understanding, of course, in miracles goes so far as to say, there's nothing that you need to understand. And it says, your understanding is not a powerful contribution to the truth.

So what is it then? It is simply the state of presence. And you don't need to understand more to be present.

It's a letting go of even what you think you knew. And then the opening is there. Now, I've heard from some people who teach and they already become an instrument for transformation.

But occasionally in their private lives, they get drawn back into rebirth. They are reborn into reactivity. They are reborn into a mental image.

They are reborn into identification with their pain body. They are reborn into identification with mental noise and the heavy me. And then they think, oh, I must be a fraud, because I'm obviously not living it.

There I am. And then here I am. I'm not living it.

I must be a fraud. And somebody that comes to your gathering may even catch you. In a state of rebirth.

And say, oh, I thought you were free of that. Shouldn't you be free of that? You can still be effective as a teacher, even if your entire life is not yet an expression, 100% expression of absolute continuous presence.

It's not a requirement. You would have to wait a long time. But what will happen is that the moments of rebirth will be shorter.

They will not be a long, drawn-out rebirth, like hanging on to one reaction, to one belief structure or pattern. Or one emotion. Hang on.

It goes on and on. It'll be short. You will find shorter and shorter rebirth.

And again, not creating. Again, because the egoic thing is so subtle. It comes in.

You've discovered. You've seen how it works there. And then it comes in from here.

You've just looked at egoic mind structure there. Oh, I see it so clearly. And there it is.

I read the other day this beautiful joke about there's a priest and a rabbi praying in the holy city of Jerusalem. And the rabbi is overcome by the presence of God. And he falls to his knees and shouts, There's only God.

I am nobody. And the priest suddenly is also overcome by the presence of God. And the priest also shouts, Yes, there's nobody.

I am nobody. And a few steps away, a street sweeper stops sweeping the street and looks at them. And the street sweeper also falls to his knees and shouts, I am nobody.

And the priest looks at the rabbi and says, Look who thinks he's nobody. That's how cunning the ego is. But some people who have gatherings engage in prolonged eye contact with people called gazing.

Some people love it. Other people think it's weird. And you can turn off many people who first come to you if you do that.

So what is the significance of gazing? And is it necessary? Or what does it do?

Well, in some groups, it becomes an automatic thing. Whenever you meet somebody, you feel almost compelled to gaze. And if the perception of the other person happens in the field of stillness, in other words, while you're gazing, there's no thought arising.

That is quite a beautiful, actually a transmission of presence, but maybe you don't feel it. I am giving you presence. And yet, first of all, it is a transmission, but it awakens presence in the other because you look through the mental emotional screen in the other person.

You're not even interested. Even if you could read their minds while you look, some people can. You wouldn't because it's not that interesting.

It's like listening to gossip. You might listen, you might put your ear to the door, there are people next door gossiping. And then after a while, at first it sounds, you realize it's not really that interesting.

And so the human mind isn't really that interesting. So you look through that. And there's a deeper connection that is a deep knowing of the other person, and you might not even know their name or their history.

And you know the other person more deeply. Nothing that you would know about this form could add to the depth of knowing, and that knowing is beyond the mind. And that knowing is not separate from the state of connectedness, that is love in the highest sense, not the egoic love.

And that is the true meaning of gazing, is there is presence flowing between you. And even if the other person's mind is not still, and it may not be, it is enough if one person's mind is still and the gazing happens, and there's simply presence, complete stillness flowing through. And that awakens that in the other, or one could say almost it draws it out, something responds.

Now, that's a beautiful thing. When it happens, and it happens spontaneously, not necessarily as something that you always feel you need to do it, it happens when the moment is right. And gazing can be not necessarily so prolonged even that it becomes noticeable.

I pointed out last night, you can gaze at the shopkeeper or the supermarket cashier while you hand over your money, and all that it means is there's stillness. There's complete presence in this moment, and there's a field of stillness in which the perception happens, but in which also that connection happens, a deep inner connection. And it's unlikely that the shopkeeper or the supermarket cashier will be aware of that on a conscious level.

He or she may just feel good about you and feel you're such a nice person, or feel good about him or herself for a moment. Or there may be so much mental noise that even that they can't feel, and that's fine too. And yet, there's always something that happens within through bringing thoughtless awareness into your perceptions.

That's teaching. Really, that is the essence and core of teaching, is you bring thoughtless awareness into whatever you perceive around you. That is the deeper meaning of, there's a Course in Miracles lesson which says, my holiness envelops the world.

And the word my here goes beyond a personalized existence, personalized sense of self, to realize that, yes, that is a sacred space that we share at this moment. It is a sacred space. And our encounter is a sacred encounter.

If that were all you knew and that were all that you're teaching ever were, to realize that every encounter is sacred with another human being, that would be enough to transform the world if you just knew that every moment. But you cannot know it as a mental belief. There needs to be the reality of sacredness, not just the belief that it's sacred, it's nice to believe it.

If you only believe it, it's not enough to live it, to have a mental belief that it's sacred and you'll get drawn into reactivity five minutes later. But to hold that spaciousness of presence. And then gazing can be powerful.

And at some point you may have to explain if people come to you what the significance of it is, and the stillness that is the essence of gazing. But the most beautiful gazing happens when it's spontaneous and the other person doesn't even notice it as gazing, and you're not doing anything, it just happens. It basically happens with me whenever I'm with someone, whether I know them or not, names I forget very quickly.

And yet there's always a deep sense of knowing, even if I've never seen them before, a deep sense of connectedness beyond the story of the person or the idiosyncrasies of that particular form. That's only a temporary formation, a deep, and that is love. And that is what transforms the world, just knowing that.

So be careful with in groups so that it doesn't become automatic. People get turned off by it. You do it at first, it may happen just a few moments, and then at some point you may explain what it means.

Many people find eye contact threatening, and they believe that you're thinking something about them while you're looking, or they're afraid they could read their minds. Gazing at a human is exactly the same as looking at a flower in the state of thoughtless presence, which the flower responds to too, but you don't know that. The flower loves it just as the human loves it.

All of nature loves it to be recognized in their essence. Each form of life to be recognized in their essence is to be recognized in their essence. That really is you're saving the world, and to use an old-fashioned expression in that way.

Each form ultimately, through your recognition, recognizes itself. Two people gazing at each other, and both of them engaged in mind activity, doesn't do very much. But it's a beautiful thing for people who live together.

Partners, occasionally, to just sit and be and look at each other, and perhaps be in the body, and become still, and then look. That's also the state of listening. The state of gazing is the same state as the state of open, completely non-judgmental listening.

We may talk about that in the afternoon, when you're with one person, to be in that state of... Again, the sense perception, when you look, it's visual. When you listen to what the other person is saying, auditory sense perception, the sense perception is happening in and through a field of stillness.

That's teaching. What do you need to know in that? It's happening in and through stillness.

You look through the stillness. You listen through the stillness. It is being received by the stillness.

It is known, but not conceptually. You know, but from the point of view of the mind, you don't know anything anymore. You bring the greater intelligence to your perceptions.

The next step in groups is when people share. This is both a beautiful thing, they talk about their experiences of how presence, how they were present or not present in certain situations, or how they can bring presence into a certain situation. And that's a beautiful thing and requires very great alertness, because it is at that point where most easily the mind can take over.

And then, presence is lost and it degenerates into people expressing their positions. Or one people trying to tell somebody else what's right. You should, or whatever.

Or getting drawn into a story. You will have, perhaps, already have some experiences of that. A little helpful hint here, because you may find yourself speaking too, you contribute.

And you can point out to the others in the group also this little hint, that whenever they have expressed what they want to say, a thought movement to step back, take one or two steps back, so to speak, internally, and step away from that thought movement. Let it come to an end and step back into simply an alert beingness or presence. Otherwise, thought proliferates and you can find in a group that the collective thought suddenly goes, and all you have, the whole group is then being dragged along in thought streams, opinions, and this and that.

Sometimes you can see it in one person. It can happen, people who talk and talk, and one thought leads to another and another. No gap.

So when you have expressed a thought, not to continue in the stream of thought, to step out, you've said what you have to say, and then you step out of the thought. Your attention relinquishes the thought back into presence. So you don't hang on to that incarnation for longer than necessary.

And stepping out, always back into stillness, back into presence. After a thought stream is to notice the ending of thought streams is very important so that they don't proliferate, that is, mind. So because when you start speaking, this is a great challenge.

When you start speaking to another person, a group, shares this or that, words come, mind comes. So to then not lose the field of presence requires you not to get drawn into a mind stream, so you can always step back and out. And the ability of, you can point out to people also, they can do that also, so that they don't get dragged along by their mind stream.

And the ability of people, while one person is speaking, the ability of all others present to listen in a completely open and receptive way. And not to immediately counteract or react mentally to what that person is saying. And while that person is speaking, you're already formulating, which is a normal way, you're already formulating in your mind what you are going to say.

And you can see it when it happens in people, while they're listening to you, they have 20% of their attention on what you are saying, and 80% of their attention is in their thought processes. They're going to come out of your mouth in a second, and they're now being prepared. And your sense of self is in, of course, is in, that's what really matters, is in here, to you.

I say 20%, sometimes they're just peripherally aware of what you're saying, because what they're really waiting for is to tell you what they're preparing in the head, their position. And of course, there's the famous words between partners, you're not listening to me. Why don't you listen?

Because the inability to listen is widespread. And you can notice it even here, maybe, I don't know, maybe we'll talk again at lunchtime, maybe we won't. Somebody talks, and perhaps you can be a bit more aware of these processes that happen.

Is it possible to listen to the other person in spaciousness? With no thought being, no answer being prepared in your head. But then, of course, the mind created self feels less through that, because if no answer comes, I seem to be shrinking.

I need to put forward my viewpoint, my, and that I am somebody through that, I am someone. So I stand out, I have an opinion, I know better, I exist. Exist means to stand out, ex out, you're coming out of yourself.

And not to be in that state is, I'm disappearing. What am I going to say next? I don't know, maybe there's nothing to say.

And you may be surprised that sometimes when you haven't prepared anything, after a moment of stillness, something may come out of your mouth, and it may be much more powerful than anything that could have come if it had been prepared mentally. It may be more simple, too. But you get challenged by minds, the human mind, the collective human mind coming to you in the form of human beings, persons, and that is the challenge, whether it's in a teaching situation or in personal relationships, it's always the same challenge of the mind form pretending that it is absolutely important, that something in the mental realm is absolutely important.

My viewpoint, my position, this, this, give me, and build, raise belief that this matters. And so the spaciousness around it is lost. Well, it's not lost, but you don't know it's there.

The spaciousness around thought. Once you know the spaciousness around thought, you can even play with thought. You can say, I'm a Democrat, I'm a Republican, or whatever it is in Canada.

I can never get Canadian politics. I don't understand. It's complicated.

But Democrats, Republican is simple. Oh, yes. Identification with that.

You can have a preference. Maybe you thought that Al Gore would have been a better president than George Bush. You may be right, but you may be wrong.

Who knows? As Byron Katie says, do you really know this to be true? So the essence we've just spoken about of having groups.

The rest is, once you know the essence, that's all that's needed. The rest is how you do it in the world of form varies from group to group and person to person. If there are any, if you have groups, and here this morning, but it's just mainly addressed groups, if you have gatherings at home, if there's anything you want to contribute, you can either say what, you may have a question concerning one or two aspects of it, or you may have learned something there, something you did first, and then you learned, and it could help others to say what it is that you learned, what before you did it in this way, and then that didn't work, and then you did something else, or anything to do with groups. Some people have, before we open for questions, little cards, and you read, you know, these new age cards, but some people have cards with the power of now teachings, or something, and that is nice.

A person takes a card, and that's, then you have, it's a thought, of course, but the thought always points beyond itself. Then you read the thought, and you have a stillness around it. That's a beautiful pointer, each person taking a card, and, because some of it may yet be beyond a person's own experience, and so reactive reactivity comes in, but there's no need to be afraid of it.

Why not let people react, and hold that space? It's quite good to occasionally to be challenged, and that's the essence of why this person was there, is to learn that there is another dimension, and so the card actually pointed to the essence, but the little mind made self got frightened. Yes, so you may encounter, this is interesting, sometimes people can get angry, the pain body can get triggered in a gathering, and that's a beautiful challenge.

What is possible, then, that the whole group energy can become turbulent, and everybody gets pulled into pain body. So it's more likely to happen with people who are relatively new to the group, and thus they already, they know about the pain body, and they, when it comes up in them, they can be with it. They might even say at this very moment, my pain body has been triggered, and that it's being, there's a spaciousness around it when they point it out, and that's beautiful.

So as quickly as possible to explain certain things to people who are relatively new. I often do that in large groups, when I point out that some of you may experience, while you sit here, you may experience sudden restlessness. You may experience your pain body coming up.

You may experience strong mind movements. Point out the obstacles that may come up for them. You may experience boredom, as you sit here.

If they don't know it, they identify with the boredom, and then they can see inner states arising, and in the seeing, there's a spaciousness around inner states. So it's good, maybe a few basic points, when new people come, explain them what could happen here, how reactions that may come, and when they come, to be aware that that's what it is. It's a reaction, and it's good to be reminded, the group, you cannot be reminded often enough of those things.

As you sit here, you explain briefly what the pain body is that may come up. You explain the egoic entity, the me, with its identifications. You don't need at this point necessarily to use the respiration rebirth.

For some people that sounds too esoteric. And it also can happen, and you may have, once the group has a certain size, life does things in such a way that there always often be one person in the group that's difficult. There's always someone who's difficult.

And that could be a great teacher, that difficult person for everybody, to hold a spaciousness around that difficult person. Sometimes people who almost despise themselves feel drawn, it's almost as if they didn't want to be there, but yet they are there. Because the personality doesn't want to be there, but something deeper draws them there.

I had an extreme case of that, a woman in London I knew, with a very strong ego, and she would go to all spiritual teachers. Whenever there was a new spiritual teacher in town, she would be there, and she would always sit, and she said to me, I've seen them all, and I laugh at them all, but there was something deeper that she couldn't keep away. Her mind condemned the teachers, she always immediately found something to condemn, whatever it was, and yet she couldn't keep away.

It's beautiful to see. So let's see if there's anything, any questions that arise from groups, or something that you have already learned, or any difficulties you've experienced.

[Speaker 5] (2:33:55 - 2:36:19)

One of the things that John and I do together is we lead a non-denominational worship service at the county jail every week, and most of the men that are drawn to this are from a more fundamental Christian perspective, even though we bring in Buddhists and Taoist teachings and so forth, but they have a fairly simple faith, and so part of what we are concerned with is honoring where they are, because most of them it's their faith that has caused them to say, I can live in this world in a different way.

But I learned something very profound from two of these men. One was, he had just had a born-again experience, and he was, he just saw truth in a very narrow way, and I think he needed to, because that was the way he was making a choice. And I was trying to just come from presence in every experience with him, and be open-hearted, and one night he was really preaching kind of hard, and I was concerned, my mind became concerned that the rest of the men in the group would be having a problem with this, because some of them look kind of confused, and so I began trying to give him a broader perspective of truth.

And he was crushed that he had done something wrong, and I realized that this had not come from a place of presence in me. And then there's another young man who revealed that he sees himself as a channel for a new way of looking at the truth, and he speaks in a very authoritative way, and it was of some concern to me, because the other men were really confused. He was out there from a different place, and yet I was able to keep coming back to presence, and coming back to presence, and so one night John wasn't there.

He was away, and I was able to come back into a place of presence with it, and one of the other men asked a very innocent, simple question that just changed the whole energy. And this one young man said, oh no, this is just what I believe. This isn't something that I know to be the truth.

And it shifted the whole energy, and what I learned from that is that my job as a facilitator was to keep coming back to presence, and to allow presence to lead the service.

Yes, yes, that's very good. The moment, as you say, everything shifted, the moment he was no longer identified with what his mind was saying, no longer identified, and that is what I sometimes call the spaciousness around thought. He was no longer in the thought.

Suddenly he recognized, this is just what I believe. And the spaciousness, and that is immediately the shift in the whole energy field changes when it moves out of mind identification. And the teacher, the facilitator, whatever you want to call it, the function is never to tell anybody that they're wrong.

But to be there as the spaciousness around whatever they're saying. And never to attack the mental position. Some teachers do it, a few.

There are some spiritual teachers who are confrontational. What they do is, it looks as if they were attacking you, challenging you. Of course, what they're attacking is your mind identification, the egoic me entity, and they want to attack it in order to crack it open, so that then something deeper is revealed.

Sometimes it works, sometimes it doesn't. It's not my way. So there are certain people who are drawn to those teachers who are confrontational and who attack the unconsciousness.

I have never done that. But sometimes that may work for certain people in certain cases. It is not something I would recommend that you do.

Because it can easily also strengthen the unconsciousness. Because by attacking it, you have made it real. You've given it reality.

And you could strengthen it. It could go either way when the teaching is confrontational. You can get through the ego, cut through it, or you can strengthen it.

So it's a little risky. There's another way that is not attack, and yet is a very clear cutting through mind. Cutting through.

And there's this teacher, Byron Katie, she does that. She simply cuts whatever the mind produces as a belief. She questions that.

Can you know that to be true? And you see, after a few seconds, you see the relativity of everything the mind throws up. So it's always, the mind is always seen as not absolute.

Nothing the mind produces is absolutely true. And so you cut, she cuts through but not confrontational, more gently. So there is a, it is an old, it is a tradition of confrontational teaching has existed for some centuries.

To some extent, Zen has a little bit of that, the fierceness of the Zen teacher. But I would not recommend it unless that is your nature, and unless that's what you do, and unless that is how, then you will draw to you perhaps people who need you, who need that. What works most powerfully, I find, is to give no reality to the unconsciousness, which is mind identification, mind stuff, to look through that.

And that implies also not to believe that there's any human being that needs fixing, that needs to be fixed, put right. There's something wrong with you, I know what it is, and I'm going to put you right, is a very common egoic perspective. I can change you, I know what's wrong with you.

Who is the you that you see something wrong with? Who is that you that you want to fix? An egoic entity, how could you fix that?

The beautiful thing is that humans don't need to be, to realize that humans don't need to be fixed. Because every human being living in this world, to a greater or lesser degree, except those few already completely free, they all express to a lesser or greater degree human unconsciousness, that's all. That's what needs to be fixed, but it can't be fixed.

It can only be recognized, primarily in yourself, and transcended in yourself. That's what the world needs. And not to make an identity out of human unconsciousness, in whatever way it expresses itself, to make an identity out of that for the other person.

That is the core, and if a teacher attacks the egoic entity, temporarily he is making it real. There's nothing there to be, it's an illusion anyway. But generally speaking, not to mistake human unconsciousness for the reality of that human being, and the expression of unconsciousness.

And sometimes the extreme case is, people may do something deeply unconscious, motivated by deep unconsciousness, which is the same unconsciousness that is in everyone, just a more extreme manifestation of it, it varies in degree, and there's no person in that, it's just degrees of unconsciousness, and it's not even those who express unconsciousness in greater degrees are less worthy, or less likely to become free, they may be more likely to become free, because they suffer more.

I had recently, some people came to me, and their son had perpetrated a dreadful crime, killed several people, 18-year-olds, 18-year-old, and they saw something that the whole world had created, out of that, what he did, in deep unconsciousness, the whole world had created, of course, that's what the world does, an identity for that person. He is a murderer, even mass murderer, he's killed four people. And they say, if they could only see what is, we know what is there underneath all that, we've seen it, but nobody else can see it anymore, if they could only see what we see in him.

Of course, they were in deep suffering, it's an extreme challenge, and I pointed out that that is not who he is, and they knew it, but they were becoming, there was in them a conflict between what the world was saying, who he is, and who deeply they knew who he is, and they were almost beginning to believe, but it was too painful to believe, that the world was right about him, there was that, and so I pointed out, that is, don't make an identity out of that for other people, or for yourself, if there's anything that you did through unconsciousness in the past, create a strength and sense of self through that, and that's called guilt, and that's a favorite egoic device, to keep a false sense of self going through guilt, which derives a sense of self from something that I now condemn, that I now see as bad, and I did that, that was me, I did that, I, I must be very bad, I failed, I, you derive through mind activity that is focused on that event that was an expression of human unconsciousness, you create a continued strong sense of me around it, that's why the ego loves guilt, that's why the ego doesn't want to let go of guilt, although it's so painful, guilt means you identify with unconsciousness, and make it into a self, a me, and if you do it for somebody else, then it's called blame, you did that, that is who you are, it's exactly the same movement, and so it's being trapped in a false identity, and to see that, in extreme cases, it's not easy, some, some people, unconsciousness, they embody human unconsciousness to such an extreme that it seems hard to, not to create an identity for them out of that, but the essence of so-called forgiveness, of course, simply means to realize that that is not who they are, that's forgiveness, as long as you think you did that, that is you did that, you, you, or I did that, I, I, still trapped in an egoic identity, you make it for another person, or you make it for yourself, if you make it for yourself, you'll make it for others, if you make it for others, you're also, you're yourself trapped in it, it's amazing, so not whatever people come up with, you may, sometimes coming back now to groups, it can happen that in groups, a few people can get hijacked by a strong mind movement, as perhaps that person temporarily got hijacked when he suddenly expressed his viewpoint, and in, and they believe it's God speaking through them, or they believe it's presence speaking through them, and yet you can always feel the vibrational field around what they are saying, when it comes from an egoic mind, there's a harshness about it, there's always something intolerant, something that condemns, something that says, I am right, and they are wrong, that identifies that the position of rightness, those are all characteristics of mind-induced, ego-induced speech, they're even channelings, it might happen to you that you have a group, and suddenly somebody starts channeling, and says, I am here, this is so-and-so, and some channelings are beautiful, some channelings come from a very deep level of truth, other channelings come from the egoic mind, pretending to be big and important, and don't you dare question me, I am whoever, from that planet, and

I'm evolved, I'm 5,000 years old, how could you ever question me? But once you know, you can easily feel where, what's the, what, where it is coming from, I'm not telling you what to do if somebody starts channeling, it turns out to be an egoic channel, you know what to do in that moment, maybe you just say, thank you, thank you.

We've had, been through a couple of cycles, but there's two things that, that I wanted to say this moment.

[Speaker 1] (2:48:29 - 2:48:29)

That's your group.

[Speaker 2] (2:48:30 - 2:51:12)

The group, yes, no channelers. One of the things, one we solved pretty well, I think, by having, I've been moderating our group for a couple years now, and initially, especially after you had come to town, and there was quite a bit of interest, we had, you know, 20, 30 people sometimes come, and what I found was that there, especially many of these people were, had been in therapy, or therapy groups, or been kind of new age thinkers and stuff, and so they, they had their rap down, you know, and one of the first things I learned to do, and at that point it was very instinctual, I only understood what I did afterwards, but, was when people started to do their story. Our routine would be to listen to some tape of yours, and then we'd talk a little bit. The idea would be to talk about where people are having trouble being present, and where they're having successes, like you were saying earlier, and then we would listen to some tape again.

So we would set up the presence through the tape, at least ideally that was the idea, but we'd often have these new people would come in, and they would sort of recognize this group as something familiar to them, and they would kind of go into their routine of, this is my story, and of course, we weren't very interested in the story. So by having, by being a fairly strong moderator, I would just bring them back to how is presence difficult for you to achieve, or what successes have you had, and kind of bring them. So I felt we successfully handled that particular diversion that the group kind of always wanted to go towards, and tell people, especially with new people.

The second problem that I don't think I ever really resolved very well, was when people come who've read a lot of conversations with God, or sometimes Course in Miracles, or some of these other chanted entities that are very popular in certain groups, especially in sort of new agey stuff. And then someone would be speaking about a problem of presence that they would have, say for example, and then another person who had all this other background, would start trying to address that person's issue about presence with a lot of complex techniques or ideas that came out of these other sources that I would consider to be less simple, less pure. Those situations, I don't know that I ever really adequately resolved them, or dealt with them, because it's very hard as a moderator to ask someone, well, let's not talk about that.

And so what would happen would be, if I did say something, frequently it would antagonize the person who was speaking. If I didn't say something, it would inject into the group all this stuff that was very far away from your teaching. And what we were trying to stay focused on, of course, was that.

That's one I never really adequately resolved. Do you have any answers?

That's what I mentioned earlier, how the mind can take over easily in a group setting. Have you ever pointed, in general terms, pointed out to the group that it's not about explanations, but the essence of that group is, so that each person understands? And you may have to point out what the essence of that gathering is at the beginning of each gathering.

That could be the starting point, and it's often still the starting point when I have retreats or talks. That question often is the beginning, why are we here? So to be reminded is very helpful.

And then you're present and you explain the state of consciousness that is presence. That's the reason why we're here, not to find or to get involved in new theories or new explanations or new beliefs, whatever it is, that state of consciousness. And once you have reminded people at the beginning, then they would be more likely to accept if you remind them again in the middle, or something happens.

To bring people back to presence, once you have observed a proliferation of mind in the group, you could even have an established signal. If it's an established signal, then people won't take it personally. But whatever it may be, let's come back to a presence, or that.

That could be misinterpreted as if you were telling somebody off, but that of course is the Zen master saying, be here now, attention now, awake now. That would be mine if I had a little group. I do use it still sometimes.

So a little sign to bring the group back to presence. And if you do that, perhaps, even if the group is not necessarily being taken over by some big mental theory, but even when there's simple sharing, bring back people to know this, feel the body. Help them to step out of mind streams that I mentioned earlier, the stepping back, the stepping out.

Always, of course, you have to do it for yourself, too. You step out. Then explain those basic points that are especially important in groups.

The stepping back from a mind stream, the ending, observing the ending of a mind stream, a statement, which is still rare. Then a different quality comes into the interaction, even the verbal interaction, when it's always stepping back. You've said what you have to say, and then others will get it, too.

Otherwise, you become a, it's just a minor version of those people that we've all met who go on and on. But that's the mind. That's the human mind.

There was a novel by an Irishman in the 20s. It goes on for 50 or 60 pages or something without punctuation, without a period. And it's called Stream of Consciousness, but it's really Stream of Mind.

The satirical magazine in England called Private Eye has a regular column in each issue, which is entitled Great Bores of Today. And each time, it's a mind stream. It's like sometimes it's a taxi driver or it's a politician.

So the taxi driver starts with, well, if you ask me, and then he goes on. And there's no end to it. And at the end, there's three dots to imply that he's carrying on even there.

[Speaker 8] (2:55:48 - 2:57:05)

First of all, I want to thank you for this incredible opportunity to be here. And already, I can feel myself just dropping back into myself within a day or so, and it's quite wonderful. The question I have is around this recent act of terrorism in regard to running groups and being with my individual clients.

And what has come up for me around that is that everyone has such a strong story about it. And of course, it has activated everyone's pain body, I think, certainly including my own. Although being here again, just dropping back, it's more silence around it, which is a miracle.

But because usually I haven't found my own pain body activated in the same way my clients are, so I've had more of an emotional distance. And I'm not sure exactly what I'm asking, except perhaps maybe you can lend some perspective about how to be with such extraordinary circumstances when the collective pain body has gotten so highly activated and our mind tends to get very agitated around that.

Yes, thank you. Yes, thank you. Of course, that's one more chapter in the history of human madness and pain inflicted by humans on other humans and on themselves.

It's a continuation of 20th century history and all the centuries beyond. The same mind set has produced it that reduces another human being or groups of human beings to mere concepts in the head. And once you have reduced their aliveness to a mere concept in the head, you can inflict pain and you don't know that you're doing it anymore.

You no longer know their aliveness or your aliveness. It's being trapped completely in a conceptualized reality that speaks of the Americans, the Jews, the blacks, the this, the that. You can do it to groups of people.

You can do it to an individual person. Call that person this or that. Once you have reduced a person to a mental concept, you no longer know what you're doing to them.

You've already done the worst thing that you could do to them. You've removed their aliveness. Of course, you've trapped yourself more deeply also, but that lies at the root.

And then it is easier for the accumulated human pain that some people carry in stronger measure than others to move into the mind. And so the madness of having an egoic identity that finds its strength through creating enemies, conceptualizes groups of people, labels them as the enemy. And then that is used by the enormous amount of pain and ultimately madness.

And anything can happen then. It uses those mind structures. But first, before the pain body can become an insane terrorist, manifest as an insane terrorist, certain things need to happen in the mind of the insane terrorist.

As long as he realizes that those are human beings, the pain body cannot control this being. But the moment he reduces the human beings to mere concepts and ciphers and labels, then the pain body can move through and use those mind structures. And then a very insane entity is suddenly there that wants to destruction.

It wants more pain, which was every pain body wants. It's more pain for myself and others. It wants that destruction.

So to see what lies at the root, but see that it is common to the human mind, to do that is a tendency that each person carries, if not to such an extreme, to reduce other human beings through judgments and mental labels. And that includes things when we unconscious behavior, make an identity for them out of it, and then call that person something. It's the same movement.

You may not want to kill them, but you've already covered up the sacredness of that being for yourself. You no longer know that that being is sacred because you have constructed an identity, a conceptual mental identity, and that is what you now relate to. And it's covering up the sacredness, but you cannot cover up the sacredness of another human being without losing at least some of that within yourself of knowing yourself as the sacredness also.

And that's an amazing thing to see. So that people are doing it constantly and it's a brutal thing. And that is what the mind, it may not look brutal in its less obvious manifestations, but it is.

And it's whenever labels, Jesus, if you look at Jesus, he always, he often associated with all kinds of people that humans had labels about. And he had no labels. So he looked through and he could see the sacredness in each one.

And humans had reduced those. How can he associate with tax collectors and prostitutes and all those anti, those people? Why is he hanging out with those people?

Mary Magdalene, why is she a hooker? She's a hooker. That's not in the New Testament because it's not that brutal, but the reality of the human mind when you put a label on a person is very brutal.

That's what they actually said, but it doesn't appear in the New Testament. And he saw that suddenly the sacredness and she knew her own sacredness. But all the humans around had reduced that human being and wanted to continue to reduce that human being.

Amazing. It happens in all these different forms until, and the worst one is what we've just witnessed. But to see that they know not what they do.

That's the truth. And yet pain comes because you witness so much pain there. You witness death on a large scale.

Premature, it looks like. It's come too soon for those people. It wasn't meant to happen.

It's come too soon. That's what it looks like. There is, however, a redemptive dimension to death, whether death comes at old age or whether death comes as it seems prematurely through an accident or an act of violence.

Now, what is that redemptive quality to death? If death were totally bad, totally evil, and the most dreadful thing that there is, which often looks like that. I even read in a newspaper an article that said, death, it wasn't talking about any particular death.

I read it a few years ago. It said death is an outrage. It's one, it's almost as if you could start having street demonstrations, carrying, I'm against death.

No more death. If death were totally dreadful, we would all be in a state of continuous depression. There would be no point in anything because we are all condemned to it.

We are all condemned to death. Of course, it would be more real if you had stamped somewhere on your body your date of death. Then all you had to do is look at it.

Oh. So everybody's under a death sentence. It's true.

And it could come. Sometimes it comes after a long life, but it could come at any time. It comes when you least expect it.

If humans didn't know on a very deep level that there is more to who they are, human existence would be dreadful and it would be pointless. What is the point in doing anything? You're going to die anyway.

And joy would not be possible. You're sentenced to death. How can you be in a state of joy?

Somehow humans know there's more to death than we realize by looking at the surface phenomenon of death, which looks dreadful. A few glimpses have come to us from humans who have faced death but haven't died. They have come back either from a situation where they were extremely close to death or a situation where they actually died, so it seems, and yet only for a moment entered that realm and then came back.

Near-death experience. And a large amount, a large majority of those accounts, both people who faced the danger of imminent death but escaped, as well as people who actually seemingly entered death but came back through a near-death experience. One thing is you don't find it in all the accounts, but in a large majority, there's a strange thing that many people tell you afterwards when they survive, and that is the last few moments before imminent death, there was a shift inside them.

People report that you've had accidents but escaped, didn't die. The accident seemed unavoidable, and in that moment, the last few seconds, they experienced a state of great alertness and peace and serenity and the absence of fear. I've read many accounts of that, and they say, this is very strange, just before it happened, suddenly all fear, fear was there until the last few moments, then suddenly all fear left me when death seemed inevitable, all fear left me and there was great peace that I suddenly felt and serenity, and everything seemed to move very slowly.

And occasionally, in those cases, people took action out of that state of consciousness in which there was no longer any thought. Basically, they had already died as their psychological form identity momentarily withdrew completely as if it died. In some cases, it died completely and something emerged from beyond their psychological form identity just before the imminent physical death.

And that is always when you go beyond your psychological form identity, there's always the reality of who you are beyond form is accompanied, the realization of that is accompanied by peace and serenity and a deep sense of all is well. And they've all said that, and many people had a near-death experience, they actually saw people sitting around them weeping because they thought this person had died. And they thought, oh, why are they weeping?

This is fine. This is so peaceful. There's such aliveness here.

So even if you don't believe, because this is not, I don't want you to necessarily believe in anything, but just take those people who faced death and see the many accounts that report a shift in consciousness in the face of death. And the sudden shift from fear to deep peace, a deep peace beyond mental explanations, a deep peace, if it could speak, that would say, there is no death, all is well, but they didn't even, they didn't need that thought. There just was a deep knowing that all is well.

And so that is one aspect of the redemptive quality of death. Something opens up when the form dissolves, there is an opening. And that can happen when the psychological form dissolves of me.

Some people have died before they died. That happened to me. The psychological form of me became so painful that it self-destructed.

And there was this peace that I couldn't explain, incredible peace and aliveness. And how is that possible? What is that peace?

And the absence of fear. And that it's knowing that there is beyond, that life is not the opposite of death, knowing that life is eternal, but knowing it beyond words, knowing it directly. Death in any form has this redemptive dimension, in any form, because a small form of death is when somebody leaves you that you had closely identified with.

A small form of death is when you lose your home. A small form of death is when you lose your social position. So there are small forms of death that are to do with the psychological form.

The psychological form of me. Death in any form is a possibility, the possibility of not resisting the opening that comes when a form dissolves, whether it's a psychological form of me or a physical form. So one could even go so far as to say the most sacred thing about human life is death.

It is where the form gives way to the formless, where the formless one life can shine through, the form dissolves. That's the redemptive quality of death. So knowing that, probably many of those people who die to violent deaths, and that is just one of many violent deaths that people are dying every day.

The violent deaths that people die through traffic accidents every year, even in the United States alone, is greater, I believe, than those people who died there. And they die every day, a violent death. And it happens, there's death happening every second on the planet.

Some violent, some not. So it is always, whether it's physical death or some aspect of psychological death through some loss, something is being, instead of being added to you, is being removed from you, from the me. You die a little bit.

And every death, even a loss, a slight loss, is a little opening. When you're faced with imminent death, it's a huge opening into who you are beyond form. A little death is a little opening.

When you're ready, even a little opening could transform you. I read of an Indian man who is now a spiritual teacher in India, and he was traveling through Canada as a young man, and he was staying in a youth hostel, and he was taking a shower, and he had left all his belongings in his room. And when he got back from the shower, all his belongings, his money and passport and everything was gone.

And that's a little death. It's not a big thing, really. And yet, he was so ready that that loss triggered an inner transformation in him, and he suddenly became extremely peaceful.

Later, he traveled back to India and became a spiritual teacher. And it's strange that such a relatively little death could trigger that in those who are ready. There's another aspect to the redemptive quality of death, and that is in those who are close to someone who goes through that, who are not personally involved in that death, but are close to somebody, close to you.

And in a way, these events of two weeks ago were close to you. They were close to everyone, almost. They were closer than even Europeans felt that these events were close to them.

So they were very close, just as close as if somebody close to you were dying or had had a violent death. And then, what is that redemptive quality that also affects those who are in the proximity of death, but not directly affected by death? You're watching these forms dissolving, as all forms must sooner or later.

So there's nothing tragic, really, in the fact that a form of life dissolves. The only tragic thing that seems to be there is that it has dissolved too soon. That's what it appears like.

It shouldn't have dissolved in that way. All these lives were not complete. They should have lived longer.

That is the mental interpretation. And yet, it happened. And it continues to happen every day.

On a smaller scale, people die premature, seemingly premature death. Others die at old age. But whenever you are in the proximity of that and watch that, and you're able to either surrender to the fact of death totally or surrender to the feelings that you have about it, which may be very sad, may be very turbulent, and you allow them to be.

I spoke to a woman last year whose son died at the age of 30 or so. Of an illness. And she was sitting with him in the hospital.

She was watching him. And that's a premature death, 30 years old. Life hardly started.

He shouldn't be dying. And she was sitting there. And at the moment of death, somehow, by grace, she was able to completely be there with him and accept there was no thought even.

And she sensed enormous sacredness in that space. And he went peacefully. And the room was filled with peace and sacredness.

And she realized at that moment that this is not a tragedy. For five or 10 minutes, he remained in that state. And then she started weeping and becoming almost hysterical, as she told me.

Then the mind came back in with its interpretation. But she was able to be there and realize the enormous sacredness as the moment a form dissolves. And especially if the form does not resist it too much.

And you don't resist it, then death is like a flower opening. And there have been a few. Some people who relinquish resistance in the face of death, actually, just before they die, a transformation happens in their face.

And it's almost a light shining through in some of them, not all. It's always just a potential. And enormous peace comes.

And we don't know how many of those who died two weeks ago violently in their last moments experienced a collapse of their form identity and an enormous influx of peace. And we've read so many accounts of people who survived and experienced that. So being aware of that death is not the ultimate tragedy.

And it comes sooner or later. It's actually the most beautiful thing, but that's hard to accept. So be with your feelings.

But when you see the redemptive dimension to death, then surrender will be easier. Surrender to this. Surrender to what you feel.

There may still be a turbulence, pain body. And with that, you die a little bit yourself. And that's how, when somebody is close to death, it might be somebody very close to you or a massive death like the one we witnessed.

Through being with that and watching that, you partake to some extent of that death. That's why you will never be the same if you spend time in the company of a dying person and are really present with that person. You will not be the same person after having witnessed, truly witnessed death.

You will be transformed also to some extent. You've died a little bit with it. Now a strange thing, also another observation that people made is in New York, people seem much more friendly after those events.

Whereas New Yorkers were famous for not being friendly. And suddenly in the street, people would talk to each other. It was as if a deepening had occurred in the collective field.

Also pain, yes. But underneath it, an opening and a deepening. Somebody even suggested on television that the American collective psyche was being transformed.

It had been up to now a type A personality, the collective American personality, which probably means outgoing and getting things done. And there was a shift now through the pain, a deepening. Because from the pain, you move to a deeper level of, at some point there's some acceptance.

And so there's a shift also in the collective psyche through the suffering. Everybody has died a little bit in that. But the beautiful thing about death is that it is sacred.

And to Western world, I completely forgotten that. Older cultures still know that and they treat death with great respect. And when somebody dies, they whisper.

And then they go past the dead body and they take off their hats. They may have hated that person. But when that person is dead, suddenly that person, there's something sacred there.

And instinctively, humans know that. But only the westernized mind has forgotten that it's too much up here.

[Speaker 6] (3:24:15 - 3:24:34)

The New York Times Sunday edition had the magazine in it. And the cover was the cityscape without the two towers, the two World Trade Towers. And in their place stood only two columns of light.

Oh. Yeah. Thank you.

Thank you. Wonderful. Yes.

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:24:47 - 3:25:02)

There's something with you talking about this that has been a question for me around facilitating groups that's come up. That I'm now seeing as me either facing or not facing death in the moment.

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:25:05 - 3:25:57)

And what that is, is when I felt presence is talked, afterwards, I often don't remember what's said. And if somebody then says to me, could you repeat that? One way I've been able to explore it has been saying, well, maybe I'll talk around a different way and it will come.

Sometimes that's happened and there has been that poignancy, aliveness. Other times what I'm realizing is that it's me interfering, trying to explain it and not accepting that that moment has completed itself.

[Speaker 1] (3:25:57 - 3:25:59)

Yes. Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:25:59 - 3:26:06)

And whenever that happens, the energy in the room shifts.

[Speaker 10] (3:26:07 - 3:26:08)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:26:09 - 3:26:39)

And it may take time to get back on track, to haul the mind back in a way. And in one way, that's a very minor thing, really. But in another, I'm remembering in Hollyhock when you had used an example of somebody coming back in the room and asking a question and it didn't come back.

[Speaker 1] (3:26:39 - 3:26:39)

No.

[Speaker 4] (3:26:40 - 3:27:08)

And you used that example that it didn't come back. And so somewhere with the talk of death, for me it seemed that even in those moments to say it's not here now, what was said is gone. There's no retrieving.

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:27:09 - 3:27:28)

And that there's perhaps a humbling in it and an admission that it has nothing to do with me, it has nothing to do with you, none of us can bring it back, just like none of us can bring back what those people or what has happened.

[Speaker 1] (3:27:29 - 3:27:29)

Yes.

[Speaker 4] (3:27:29 - 3:27:40)

Thank you. And that gives me perhaps a sense of space and permission Yes. to be more accepting.

[Speaker 1] (3:27:41 - 4:33:42)

Yes, not being here as a form identity, but simply as an opening, which means you've died. You can only really be effective when you have died as a form identity. I had this wonderful thing, I was in China early this year, on a mountain, there was a something carved in stone on top of a mountain, Chinese writing.

And I asked, what does that mean? And my Chinese friend said, Buddha, that means Buddha. There seemed to be two signs put together.

I said, what does the individual sign mean? And how does it fit together as Buddha? He says, the first sign means man, which means human being.

And the next sign next to it means no. That's Buddha. It's a denial of the reality of your form identity.

It's an absence rather than the presence is there when there's an absence of the form identity is presence. It's like you go, man, no. It's death.

When we talk about teaching presence, not everybody is going to teach presence directly in such a way as this. There are many other ways in which the new state of consciousness can be taught. And some are already doing it.

It can flow into many different activities. There are already teachers teaching it at school, not out in the open. It's not mentioned on the curriculum, but in whatever subject is there.

They manage to teach the new state of consciousness. Body workers enter that state, the good ones. When they do their body work, it is performed in thoughtless awareness.

And you know exactly what is needed. And ultimately, more and more you find that the body work is a means to you actually teaching presence and presence is the healer. And so you may find you may be called upon to teach presence directly, such as this, or it may flow increasingly into what you're already doing.

So you teach in an indirect way. Whatever it is, important to realize that that is your life purpose to embody that state of consciousness. And then you cannot not teach it in one way or another.

Your life purpose is to live it, to embody it, to be the flowering of consciousness. And then any purpose on a personal level, which is to do with your personal situations and maybe to do with things you've already learned and know is subservient to the greater purpose of teaching presence, the new state of consciousness. So it may be that life will remove you completely from whatever you're doing now, or it may be that presence will flow into more and more into what you're doing already.

And then there's a deepening of that. And the doing and the interactions that you have with people as part of your doing are ultimately an excuse, a means of bringing presence. Whatever you are doing is no longer the main thing.

It's the surface thing is whatever you're doing, whatever your activity may be. And there are not many things that presence cannot flow into and transform that activity. And your interactions, it looks as many of your interactions, you had those interactions because they're part of your daily, the job, the business that you do, whatever you do, and you interact with all kinds of people to get things done, to sort things out, to discuss this and that as part of whatever your external activity is.

And the wonderful thing is when all that becomes secondary, one could almost say an excuse for presence flowing into it. So you may be in a meeting talking about the new advertising campaign. If anybody is in advertising, it's possible.

Presence can flow into even that, perhaps. Why not? I've seen a few ads where there was presence shining through here and there.

Not many yet. In sports also, it's the core essence of being really a master at anything is the state of presence. But this goes beyond that.

It's being a master in life. Being a master in any activity requires you to be in the state of aware presence while you're performing whatever it is, then that is mastery. But what we are engaged in and what humankind needs is more than that.

It's more than people becoming extremely good at this or that. That can be an entry point. I saw a film about golf a while ago, a video called Bagger Vance.

And that's about somebody's teaching golf, but really teaching presence. And I remember just a few scenes from it. The master golfer, how he suddenly before he hits that ball, I don't know the expressions for golf, he looks into the distance and goes, and it's actually mentioned, no thought.

There's a line about being free of thought. And then, oh, there's the truth. And that's about presence within the sphere of a limited activity.

Some therapists will become very effective in what they do, regardless of their therapeutic background and whatever they have learned, even psychoanalysts. I'm not, I'm saying that because psychoanalysis is a very mental mind. Even there, after 10 years of practicing, 15 years, 20 years or more of applying your mental knowledge, some of the psychoanalysts simply sit there after just, they've listened for 15 or 20 years and they've been interpreting for 15, 20 years or more, scribbled.

And more and more, they just, they give up. They just sit there and listen. And there comes the alertness and the stillness.

And then they speak from there, not from acquired knowledge anymore. That may still flow in here and there, certain terminologies, but that's where it comes from. And that's where the, then the, if they call it patient, strange word, it undergoes a change in the presence of the present therapist.

So see where it flows in and not have a compartment in your life where you practice presence, but not, then keep some of your life for business. That's serious. And then presence.

Somebody some years ago, I was talking about somebody who was doing a course in miracles. And I said something about his business. And he said, no, no, not there.

That's, I can't afford to do it. I can't afford to practice there. So your life purpose is to embody that.

And then it's not just having a group once or twice a week, or even seeing people. If you teach in such a direct way, that's very helpful too. But it's a continuous outflow.

I ran into a famous architect the other day. He had come to one or two talks of mine. He's the most famous Canadian architect.

And we talked for a while, and he told me that when he teaches, architect, he still teaches at university. He tries to teach what the state of presence is to his students and to create from there. And he tries to embody presence even in the buildings that he creates.

And he had been doing that before he came into contact with this more direct, the direct teaching of presence. And then he recognized what he had already been doing for years.

And that happens with some people who are already master at something and realize that in that field, they're already practicing presence.

So any external activity is an excuse for that. Otherwise, you might think that something you do out there really matters. And it doesn't.

If you die tomorrow, somebody else will take over your job. The moment you think that something that you do on the level of form ultimately matters, then you are lost again in the forms. And one characteristic of that new state of consciousness is a lightness, an intensity, but a lightness, not the intensity of egoic delusion, which is, this matters dreadfully, and we must get this done.

That's one kind of a totally different vibration. They may get it done, but in the process of getting it done, they're making themselves and 100 other people unhappy. And then they get it done, whatever it is.

It's called karmic action. All the employees are miserable, but the company is making a profit. For a while, but not that long anymore, because the old consciousness and all the structures that it has created are not going to survive that much longer.

So an intensity comes. There is an intensity about presence which is so different from what before you had regarded as intensity, which contained is always a strong element of fear. It doesn't, might not look like fear, if something matters dreadfully out there, there must be fear somewhere.

And so comes a lightness, but not without great intensity that flows into what you do. So that the master golfer doesn't go, I've got to hit that hole. I've got to get that, nothing is flowing.

There's an ego trying to do something. So there's a, as the title of that book goes, one of the many I haven't read, the lightness of being, well, the original title is actually the unbearable lightness of being. I don't know to whom it's unbearable.

In the book, it must be the ego, the lightness of being. And so to live in that state of lightness where nothing out there ultimately matters. It's not that you don't honor this moment and whatever you need to deal with, whatever arises, but you don't want anything through that to get something through it, to a bigger me, self.

And then comes that relaxed alertness, that is the intensity of presence, alert, but no tension. It's playing from then on, you play in the world of form. You still move within it, but you're free of needing a particular result, of needing to be confirmed in your identity through a particular result, outcome.

So the master, master, we use that for both men and women. I think that's right, isn't it? Master, or is there a female for master?

Just so I'm right. You're a master, the master of presence. Now, not to give you a new identity, that would be dreadful.

What are you into now? Well, I'm actually, I've become a master. How do you master presence, become a master of presence?

Not just in one little field. Well, all that means you become master of this moment, because presence is inseparable from this moment. How do you become master of this moment?

Do you try to control what happens in this moment? Are you that controlling master? No, it just means to be aligned with this moment.

This moment, to give it your attention, to look at it, whatever form it takes, the form changes, the moment remains. Whatever form it takes, you look at it. And in that moment of looking, there's thoughtless awareness.

That is the intensity of presence, and that is true intelligence operating. And then whatever needs to happen, happens through you, or it happens externally. It is amazing how many seemingly inexplicable events and connections suddenly come into play when one being is in the state of presence.

How many helpful factors suddenly come into play, and you cannot trace them back to causal factors. How did that connection, how did this person suddenly come in at the right moment? How did that happen just at the right moment?

It's because you're no longer cut off egoic entity. You're open to life. And life, then there's a great connectedness with other forms of life and the totality.

The intelligence of the whole operates through you. So it's not just we have realizations and insights and right action out of that state of acknowledging this moment without running away from it internally in any way, denying it internally in any way, an openness, and then see what happens. The master simply is master of this moment, which means completely open to whatever it is that arises at this moment.

That is the mastery, only this. And you're tested every moment. It's never a mastery that is an achievement that you can carry around with you.

Now I've made it. I'm a master. Every moment, again, determines whether or not you're a master.

An internal yes to what is, is the master completely. With that, all the stuff that the egoic mind likes dissolves. The complaining mind, the should into the shouldn't, and me and my story, and the rental projections of fear.

And then the central point of your life is no longer the story, but this moment. Neither past nor future, which are still there, fine. But the central point increasingly becomes just this moment.

That's the master. That's all. It's not a big thing.

And yet it's a radical transformation of consciousness. And it's both big and little. Just make this.

This moment becomes the central point of your life because that's all there is. So you might as well make it into that. And not the next one, and not the last one.

Just this. And this is an amazing thing to sense the power of this moment as the power of life itself. No matter what form it takes, you welcome every form that this moment takes.

And that could be a million dollar arriving in your bank account, a million dollar leaving your bank account, the car breaking down, it is. And the next moment, somebody giving you a ride, anything, gain or loss. Now, gain is more easily accepted when that is the form that this moment takes.

But that's only one half of the equation. The other half will always be loss. That's the phenomenal universe.

So one half of your life will be gain, recognition, money, status, gain, a relationship, whatever. And then there's loss. And that comes continuously.

The egoic entity wants more gain. And no matter how much it adds to itself, it's never enough. It dreads the loss, which is death, which we talked about this morning.

So the great thing is that you actually, you welcome the loss just as much as you welcome the gain, if not more. Looks very strange. And remember, you no longer need to add anything to who you are for your identity.

That's a great liberation. The need to add to me the completeness of this moment. Not to add to look for an enhanced self.

To add as the play of form. Yes, I learned something new. That's interesting.

The play of form. Or make some money. The play of form.

It's not going to, you're not going to find yourself in it. And then you lose it again. So what do you teach?

When you teach directly, you teach this. And directly, a few of you are going to teach presence directly. Not through some other form.

Either one-on-one or in groups. And then there's the teaching of presence through something else. Through a secondary form.

Which you simply, you perform in that state. And life will tell you what it is. You start with what you're doing already.

No matter what it is, what you're doing already. Presence needs to start with what you're doing already. If it's the most boring of jobs.

Presence, you cannot wait for presence for a better opportunity, more conducive surroundings. Before you can be present. That's a continuous excuse.

It starts where you are now. It arises where you are now. And there's no excuse.

There will be many mental excuses. Why not here, not now? Your life can only change when you totally become aligned with the now.

No matter where you are. And it could be a prison. And you can't say, I need to get out of here.

I want to have a spiritual life. I want to teach presence. How can I?

This is dreadful. Of course, it's dreadful from the judgmental point of view. You start it here and now.

And see the transformation that happens. You may, maybe you're working as a waiter, a waitress. But you think this is, I just need to get out of here.

Why not start there? And bring presence when you bring a soup to the person in the restaurant. And you put the soup on the table.

Would you like anything else? Can I help you with something else? The quality, whatever it is.

The disciple asked the Zen master, Master, how do I enter Zen? The question means, how do I enter the state of consciousness that is Zen? How do I enter Zen?

And they were just walking outside in nature. And the master said, can you hear the sound of that mountain stream? And it was a very distant sound.

And the disciple started, yes, I can. I hear it. And then the master said, enter Zen from there.

Oh, and then they walk on. And five minutes later, or 10 minutes later, the mind started working again. Because while you listen to the mountain stream, of course, there was no mind.

He was attentive, alert. And then the mind started, Master, I've been thinking, what would you have said if I said, no, I can't hear the mountain stream. And the Zen master says, disciple, yes, enter Zen from there.

No matter. Just a few words before we open again to questions. A few words about being with another person who may be coming to you for help.

And you already know the essence. Be in your body and listen. In many cases, you won't know the answer.

The problem may be very complex. Most people's problems are. Become comfortable with that.

If you're not comfortable with not knowing, you can't teach presence. The mind thinks, I must know. What can I possibly say to this person?

Or tries to say something that you read in a book and it'll lack power. It doesn't come out of the now. It doesn't come out of presence.

Or some explanation. Or a belief that makes you feel good. To become comfortable with not knowing.

That's an incredible state of great depth. And maybe even after a long session with that person, who knows? Maybe you won't have said a single word.

And yet, there's the field of presence. And maybe five minutes after the person walks out, suddenly a realization comes to him or her. Or suddenly, the illusory nature of his or her problems is suddenly recognized.

But it's most likely that at some point, words will come out of your mouth. Or a question. And another question.

A strange thing happens often. Not often now do people come to me with stories. Unhappy stories.

But there was a time when people would come to me with unhappy stories. Looking for some way out or solution. And the more they were telling their unhappy stories, the more happy I felt inside.

The deeper the peace and the aliveness. So much so that I couldn't help... I had to smile.

And they didn't understand that. Because there's nothing to smile about in their story. But I did it with one woman.

And she said... She stopped talking suddenly. Her story came to an end.

And said, Oh, I can feel it. You're doing healing. That was her framework for understanding what was happening.

And she called it healing. And it is healing in the deepest sense. Yes.

And that was the time when I myself didn't fully understand what I was doing. Even now I don't, of course. Nobody does.

No mind could do that. But I understood less than I do now. And I thought, She must be right.

This is healing. That's how I became a healer. But that word attracted quite a few people who were not interested in any transformation of consciousness.

But they said, I have this pain in my ankle. Can you take that away, please? Or this hurts here.

Can you do something about this? And for a while I did. And some came for physical healing and got something else.

But after a year or two, I dropped the label healer. But it's still what it is. It's healing in a very deep sense of the word.

But ultimately, there's not going to be a difference between meeting a person in that context and meeting somebody in the street, or meeting somebody in a restaurant, or in the store, or at work. For a while, it may well be that when somebody comes, you enter that state, as some therapists do. They enter the state of presence in the therapeutic setting or framework.

And they can be very effective within that. The moment they step out of the therapeutic framework, their presence is lost, and wrinkles reappear again, and the tension in their face comes back, and they're identified with mind. You can see it, how it comes back.

The moment they stop out of their office, or the wife rings, and then the next client or patient comes in, and they all... It's confined, even sometimes to a room, to a particular activity or function. And ultimately, you're no different in that teaching situation, to call it that, than in any other situation.

You meet everybody in the same state of open presence. And you look at them. If we only get this here, everything would be transformed.

The ability to look at another person, in the state of thoughtless awareness, for three seconds. Give them three seconds of that preciousness. Three seconds of thoughtless awareness, while you meet someone.

So, that's not a big thing, just the greatest gift. And then perhaps it becomes four seconds, five. People like to meet me, not because of the person, because of that state that they sense.

They sense something, that there's no judgment whatsoever in the mind. There's complete openness, complete, and there's that energy field of presence. And they find themselves in that.

They may carry around, of course they will, a mind-based sense of identity. Always inadequate, as all mind-based senses of identity are. And when you meet a person in presence, they find, for the first time, they recognize themselves through you, that form.

And it feels good to be yourself. For some people, for the first time. They haven't been themselves.

Who is themselves? They're all trying to be someone that's in the nature of human existence. Animals are themselves.

Unless they have lived with humans for too long. But most animals are just, even after living with humans, it's a miraculously, most animals still are themselves. Not playing a role, trying to be the cat.

It just is. It does. It moves.

It sits. It rests. It sleeps.

It jumps. It is completely itself. And humans are trying to be something.

Not enough yet. I'm not enough yet. Depending on what people's feedback you get from others.

And so, to be yourself for the first time, and to recognize yourself through another human being, that fullness that you are, and you totally accept it. And that's then misinterpreted by the mind, as if you had something that you can give them, and then they'll run after you. What was that?

I need to talk to you about that. And of course, for a while, that is your function. Your function for a while is to be the reflector of their reality, of who they are in the depths of their being.

And who they are is the spacious presence, the stillness underneath all the mental, emotional formations, the formless one. And that's what you reflect back to them. So for a while, people will love that they find themselves.

And that's your function. You don't immediately say, no, from now on, I don't want to see you anymore. It's all in you, which is true.

But for a while, it may be your function to be that reflection, that reflector. And to be that, all that is required is holding that space of thoughtless awareness. Then you reflect that.

That's all. If that were your only practice, whoever you meet for the first five seconds, you look at them in thoughtlessness, total innocence. And before you know it, it'll be more than five seconds.

That's the depths of true teaching. And I read only a few days ago, somebody said the decisive encounters in the world are not between two famous politicians or two statesmen meeting and shaking hands and having a talk. The decisive encounters in the world are you meeting the clerk in the store, because that's where it's at.

The decisive meetings are in the street, in the office, in the store, two human beings relating beyond mental concepts. It starts with one. You can't expect the other person to do it, too, because you expect nothing in that state.

So you're not demanding that the other person should be behaving in a certain way. They probably won't. And yet, change happens in the spaciousness of presence.

I will be present with you if you behave in such and such a way. Then I'll... Otherwise, I'm not going to be present with you.

So the teaching is no longer confined to a particular setting. It's a limited view that may also apply, that people come and say, but it's everywhere, everywhere. And just the arising of thoughtless awareness, the cessation of compulsive thinking is the new state of consciousness on the planet, without which the planet is not even going to make it.

Well, the planet might make it, but certainly humans won't if that shift doesn't happen within the next hundred years, because otherwise the old consciousness will continue and it'll create more violence, more chaos, more destruction of the environment, more of everything, more consumer goods until everybody's drowning and others have nothing and the others are drowning in consumer goods. The cessation of thought, and that's a pretty radical thing, arising above thought as your normal state of consciousness, not perhaps all at once. For a while, you have one foot in thought and one foot out of thought.

Sometimes thought drags you back into thought completely. And at other times, you're almost out. You say, oh, wow.

And for a while that's there and then suddenly you get dragged back into thought. So for a while, I can't predict how long, you move between the two. It is possible, if not likely, that teaching, if you do it in a more formal kind of teaching, may deepen the arising of that state in you, may accelerate it.

The arising of thoughtless awareness because there is a demand for it. When people come, life is demanding something of you and then when the demand is there, it comes. This is, I experience it always when there's a group.

It's the pull of the group that pulls the presence out of me and the words that come out.

They're being pulled out. Otherwise, if I sat here alone, I wouldn't be talking.

There would be presence. I would be present with the flowers with a little less intensity because it's not needed to be present with flowers. Not such great intensity is needed.

It's beautiful, just presence. But here the presence is cutting through and actually while you sit there is dissolving mental accumulations. So what is required here is a greater intensity of presence and when it's required, it comes.

The opening is there. That's the same with, it works even on a physical level, energy on a physical level. If you never move physically, then after a while you have less and less physical energy because the demand for it isn't there or people who are unemployed for long periods of time and do nothing for years, then they don't even have the energy to do anymore because it's not required.

But as soon as the demand is there, it comes and the demand on the planet, the overwhelming demand on the planet is for a new state of consciousness to arise. It wants to arise. And so all you, you become an opening and then it moves through.

People will pull it out of you. And don't believe the mind when it says, I'm not ready. You can't get ready for presence.

Prepare for the now. There's a single thing here that is the teaching. I don't know how I can talk about it for so long if it's just a single thing.

And that single thing is awareness, pure thoughtless awareness. And some of you, occasionally it arises in some of you, there is a state, I've just mentioned that one foot here, one foot there and another characteristic of that state in which some of you still are, one foot in the world of thought and thought-based identity and one foot out. One characteristic of that state is you move from contracted to the open state.

I'm sorry, I lost that thought. It's gone. It'll come back if it's necessary.

Foot in two worlds, in thought, out of thought. And that's how it is. You don't need to demand to be totally free of thought yet.

Not that you will never use thought either when you finally, to be free of thought, all it means you're free of self lodged in thought. A sense of self lodged in mind activity and the emotions that go with it, a me, an image that isn't complete, hasn't arrived yet. So to become free of thought is to become free of a self, sense of self lodged in thinking.

When it becomes free then, the compulsive nature of thinking gradually decreases. That compulsive stream. Because it's only compulsive because you equate who you are with thought activity and thought creations.

And of course you need to keep yourself going. That's why the compulsive thinker arises.

And then your sense of self shifts from being trapped in thought and the emotions that go with thought to being the spacious, still, thoughtless, aware presence.

The vastness in which a few thoughts happen. And that means you're free of thought. And you've gone beyond.

You're not incapable of thought. Thought can still operate for certain things here and there. To speak you need some thought.

But it's linked into presence. Not a self-serving, repetitive stream of noise. So that thought still arises, but it's no longer a problem.

It no longer has the power to make you unhappy, which is what thought likes to do. It loses that. It doesn't have the heaviness about it anymore when it's free of self, trapped sense of self, a me, my story, my life.

Then when you have one foot still in that old consciousness and one foot in the new, in that there's an intermediate stage here for many people. And that where you realize the relative nature of all thought. Thought is still there a lot of the time.

And yet you're not completely in it anymore. You're moving out already. And that you recognize it by, more and more you recognize thought is thought.

And you're not totally believe in every thought that comes up. Oh, oh, oh. You can see how thought drags you along.

You have one thought about yourself or somebody else and you go completely with it. And now the difference is the same thought may still come up, but it doesn't drag you along with it. The thought goes, oh, okay.

To some extent, the whole work that Byron Katie does is to see that ultimately no single thought has enormous validity. It's a relative position of perspective. I don't think she's ever said that, but that's how it is.

It helps you to step out of a complete belief in everything that the mind throws up, all conditioned. So that's what I was going to say when I said one foot here, one foot there. What comes with that is, you see that, and the way I started, I said that for the first time a few weeks ago at a retreat, at the beginning of a retreat, said one of our practices at our retreat, that is not to take our thoughts too seriously.

And that already is the arising of what I sometimes call spaciousness around thought. And that grows, the spaciousness around thought. And then thought loses its heaviness.

It loses its self, nature itself, the illusion that that's you. So the cessation of thought is the cessation of a thought-based sense of self. When the self is no longer thought in thought, then by itself thought becomes more quiet.

And it's no longer me, me. I need to keep myself. I need to, more of this, more of that.

I'm going to, that's, thought is fine. And then there are the spaces between thought that arise. It is quite possible, and I would, I don't like to make predictions, but I'll just keep it short.

A time will come when thought as we know it, as conceptualization and words going through your head, that won't happen anymore. And humans live continuously in stillness, a state of great intelligence and of deep inner connectedness with being. And at that time, if there are still schools, they will be teaching very different things from now, of course.

If there are still schools, you might hear something like a little five-year-old asking, teacher, is it really true that once human beings existed who thought that the future could be better than now? And the teacher says, yes, they existed once. Unbelievable as it may seem.

If they still speak, but in that state, they won't be speaking anymore. There will just be the immediate communication beyond words. Enough of that.

This is where that new state is emerging. And all teachings ultimately point to that. Take no thought for the moral.

Cause and miracles seem to be full of thought, and yet it takes you in the end into stillness. The end of words has almost come, it says towards the end. The teaching of Krishnamurti, what is the essence of Krishnamurti's teaching?

He's never said it. Don't think. All he said was, let's look at thought, can we look at thought?

Can thought get you there? Can you, let's investigate thought and let's look at it. Until finally you arrive at, no.

And he himself, for those of you who are familiar with Krishnamurti, was a great teacher. Would spend a large part of his life when he went for walks every day for two or three hours, and said, not touched by a single thought during the whole walk. Not needed, just stillness.

The essence of Buddhism is that. Ramana Maharshi, famous teacher in the first half of this century, what is the essence of his teaching? It's contained in his words, which was an answer to a question, how can we judge our spiritual progress?

How can we know whether we are making spiritual progress? And the answer was, the degree of absence of thoughts is the measure of progress on the spiritual path. Oh, and the minds don't like to hear that.

There's some people who say, no, he didn't say that. And you have to show them and say, yes, there it is. Ramana Maharshi was a great Indian teacher that some of you are familiar with.

I'm just pointing that it's all going to the same essence. Nisargadatta, they asked him, what's the real meaning of meditation? Of course, the real meaning of meditation is the changed state of consciousness.

And this meditation, he said, the radical refusal to harbor thoughts. He was a bit like a Zen master. So the radical refusal to harbor thoughts, it's a masculine approach.

The female is the dental, you relinquish thought, you let go. And then there's the male is the Zen, it's also male, no thought, I refuse to have thoughts. Now that could be mistaken for suppression of thoughts.

And it could be that if it's not practiced rightly. Now, that is also a powerful statement for those of you who are inclined that way, the male approach. And now this is meaningless unless there's enough presence in you already through which you understand that statement.

There cannot be the radical refusal to harbor thoughts if there's not enough presence in you. The fact that you can say no to thought means an enormous amount of presence is arising or you're suppressing through willpower, in which case you won't be rid of thoughts for very long. When the body becomes tense, okay, I'm not thinking.

And then after a while you blow up and then you think more than ever. But if there's a true thing that is the radical refusal to harbor thoughts and that simply means a great presence arising in which that becomes possible. I don't need thought.

And the thought comes in and just, no, don't want it. So in whatever way it comes, it may come in a more gentle way through you. Thought becomes less of a threat to you.

More important, less heavy, and gradually you move out. So this is the teaching, whatever, you will only teach one thing, just as I teach one thing, moving beyond thought. The cessation of thought as the basis for your life.

And that is, which is the title of the book by Krishnamurti, that is the awakening of intelligence. True intelligence. Great intelligence.

If this were a Zen monastery, we would be spending the whole night in rigorous meditation, that's the male approach, facing the walls, and we would open the windows to make it really uncomfortable. And you would experience the arising of suffering. More in the head than some pain in the body, yes, cold perhaps, but most suffering is in the head.

You're complaining about this dreadful situation until you can't stand it anymore. And there's the possibility of a moment when thought subsides because you can't stand that burden anymore. And it goes.

And all that remains is then cold and discomfort in the body. Not a problem. You're free of suffering.

All suffering came out of that. Surrender has happened. Complete yes to what is.

This moment, cold, painful body, hungry because we didn't have much to eat. This is the Zen ones. I'm hungry, I'm cold, my body is painful.

Awful place. What am I doing here? And suddenly thought subsides into just this.

And suddenly thoughtless awareness is there. And then perhaps after 10 minutes you say, Master, Master, I've got it! And then the master says, Drop that!

Because it's become a concept again. If any questions arise concerning the teaching of that one thing, framework, one-on-one groups, while you listen, just listen. Listen.

Spacious listening.

[Speaker 3] (4:33:44 - 4:35:16)

Thank you, Eckhart, for sharing so many things with us today. Last night, as you were talking about being with groups of people and having presence pulled through you, I'm reminded of, I guess I'd call it a challenge, something interesting that's been going on occasionally with me when I'm with a group of people whose pain bodies seem to be particularly present. It is quite interesting that I was declaring for myself that I wanted to work with people who are ready to really shift their consciousness.

And the phone rang, and it was to work with people who have been court-ordered for substance abuse to come to a program. So they're sort of involuntarily showing up, and they have a lot of issues. And I realized that the greater the pain, the greater the opportunity sometime for a presence to arise.

So I said yes. And sometimes afterward, for a couple of days, I don't want to talk to anyone on the phone. I just feel like I need to, I don't know what term to use, downtime, or I need quiet to sort of recuperate.

And at times that's true, and other times I don't seem to need that. And I'm wondering from your own experience if you can shed some light to that phenomenon that seems to happen.

[Speaker 1] (4:35:17 - 4:37:50)

Needing, after being with people, the need to withdraw and be alone for a while. Yes, I also have that. After a retreat or after an intensive, I love to be alone and simply be.

It's a strange, I enter a state of almost nothingness after a retreat or after an intensive. There's no thought, or almost no thought, and just a state of an absence of anybody there. And hard to describe.

It's very nice. Just nothing. And I can sit there for hours in a chair just like this.

And it's beautiful. It seems it's what is needed. And then the time comes to go out again.

It's a going in and then out. My natural inclination, this form, likes being a hermit or invisible. And life at the moment doesn't allow that.

So it's pulling me out. I was a hermit for several periods in my life and always loved it. And then the call came, no, you have to go out and do the complete opposite.

Be out there. And then I surrendered to that and that also became very enjoyable, deep joy in that. There may be some teachers who seem to continuously be interacting with people and perhaps that works for them.

Just like you, I also need to go within at times, be alone, not talk to anybody. So there's nothing wrong with that.

[Speaker 3] (4:37:58 - 4:39:05)

That leads to the other part of what's coming up for me is at the same time, what you talked about before about the terrorists and a way to look at that. I'm really comfortable with the way of looking at it that you talked about and that's really helped me be with other people. But it ties in also with a sense of inner urgency, a sense of needing to be out there, to be of service because of what caused that in the first place, the insanity, the rampant insanity that we do see.

And so in terms of trying to balance the quiet time and then being out there and feeling the pull to be out there, that's the challenge to me as well as looking at how to be at peace internally with what is, to say yes to what is, don't resist what is, and yet a call to step up to our true magnificent selves in a way that we need to apparently to continue.

[Speaker 1] (4:39:05 - 4:39:05)

Yes.

[Speaker 3] (4:39:06 - 4:39:21)

And I wonder if you could speak to that urgency in terms of what and how to balance in life that time where we're quiet in our time to move and then the message to convey to people about waking up.

[Speaker 1] (4:39:22 - 4:48:23)

Yes, the urgency is there because there's an acceleration of the insanity also in the world and we'll see more of that. So there's great urgency, the arising of the new consciousness and I feel it very strongly. That's why there's been such an acceleration of the work that I do because the urgency is there.

It doesn't stop me from occasionally withdrawing and then go out again. It's with going within and then you go out again into the world. Otherwise you might lose your inner peace.

If you thought you needed to fix something out there instead of realizing the difference, your state of consciousness makes the difference. That's what makes the difference, not fixing anything out there. You could be drawn into the illusion that there are things that need fixing.

You can, of course, do helpful things out there too. The essence of the work is not fixing anything out there. It's your state of consciousness and you would be contributing to the new consciousness even if you lived alone and simply, although most of you are not called to living alone and cut yourself off in a monastic setting perhaps, but if you did and lived in a state of freedom from thought and presence, that would have an effect on the world too.

Not anything that you could see on the visual, on the surface of things, but your state of consciousness will affect the world even if you never interacted with people. It would still have an effect and help many others who are also entering. Most of us are not meant to be hermits at this time.

Most of us are not even meant to be in a monastery. I loved my, quite a few times in my life, I felt, oh, it would be great to live here and I got very close to living in a Buddhist monastery. I could have lived in a Christian monastery too.

It didn't matter to me what monastery, the truth. I knew I could use any framework to express the truth. I could use exclusively Christian language or Buddhist language.

The truth is beyond that. And yet every time I got close to the monastery, I could see the heaviness of the form, the old forms. Although I have a great love for that, something didn't allow me to enter the monastery.

And most of us also, otherwise we would be in it. But that is not our path, is to be out there and bring that state of consciousness into the mad world, wherever you are, rather than withdrawing. It doesn't mean that you cannot occasionally step back, shut the doors, switch off the telephone and just be.

That's a beautiful regeneration. Or go out into nature occasionally. When you've been with people for a while, you've seen enough people, then you go into nature.

Enormously regenerating to be with nature or just sit, walk in a forest by the seashore, wherever. And it's easy to be in thoughtlessness in nature because everything in nature is thoughtless. Prior to thought, you are post-thought.

Everything in nature is pre-thought, before thought. Great inner, great connectedness. So to regenerate, you may occasionally need to do that.

And yet you are doing, you're out there teaching those people, some of whom don't even want to be there, and yet they are there. And perhaps something happens. Perhaps you can explain to them that they have a choice between happiness and unhappiness.

Explain about the pain body. Quite a few people are ready to listen to that because they immediately recognize the truth of when you address pain body, they know it so well. Many people who are drawn to drugs just cannot stand the pain.

The pain of ordinary existence, the pain that they carry inside, and they run away from that pain. And many of those people have great spiritual potential. Just the same as alcoholics.

Many people have gone through transformation through AA meetings. They've done great work. People for whom alcohol was their first teacher.

It was a kind of negative teacher, but without it, if they hadn't become addicted to that, the growth wouldn't have happened. So you could teach, perhaps, how to be with the pain instead of running away from it. And it's not going to kill them.

Of course, some pain bodies, if they rise up into the mind and take over your mind, they can drive a person to suicide. In that sense, pain bodies can sometimes kill a person. But pain that is looked at, as long as you're running away from it, it seems so enormous, that pain.

But when you're shown that you can actually be with that, and if you embrace it, it doesn't kill you. If you surrender to the pain, and then they have to do it with you, for you cannot do it alone yet. Let's do it together.

When the pain is there, let's surrender to that and hold. And let's be the spaciousness in which this pain happens. So some people may come to you with acute pain bodies, because it's often those people who are more ready than others, because they can't stand it anymore.

But it's a challenge to be working with pain bodies. It's a beautiful challenge. It's an interesting thing when a pain body becomes active in a person, and in that moment, provided that that person already understands the nature of pain body, and at that moment, the person gets taken over by pain body, you can then speak to the consciousness that is still there underneath it, and point out what's happening.

And something in that person will be listening, but the pain body on the surface will be denying. But you can still address the awareness that is still there underneath the pain body. So you bypass the pain body.

This is an interesting thing to do. In a person whose pain body has become very active, you address the sanity underneath it, and something will be listening. I've seen a few cases of people waking up even in the middle of a pain body attack, when the sanity in them, the awareness was being addressed, suddenly stepping out, and the pain body collapsed.

And I've occasionally been attacked by pain bodies, almost physically, got very close, not quite physically, but it got very close. Pain bodies who felt so threatened that they became like in some films, it's like the whole person is turning red. And one pain body who was close to attacking me, instead, he jumped up and ran out of the room.

And I thought I've seen the last of this person. And 10 minutes later, he came back, and the pain body had subsided. And he said, I'm okay now.

And this person had one of the heaviest pain bodies I've ever seen. And he became, in a relatively short period of time, as he continued to disidentify, got taken over again and again, and the pain body lost a great deal of its energy charge.

[Speaker 2] (4:48:28 - 4:49:12)

I, probably three quarters of the people I see actually come to me because of physical illness. And there's often emotional components to that, of course, but that's their principal problems, you know, common things and not so common things. And maybe a quarter are more obvious mental health kinds of things, anxiety, fear, depression.

But in regarding the physical illness, most of what you talk about, we might recognize more in the realm of the mental emotional kinds of clients. I was wondering if you could talk about, you know, the aspect of dealing with physical illness from this perspective.

So one aspect is dealing with physical illness in yourself. And then another aspect of it is dealing with physical illness, people who may be coming to you, not because that is your profession. Many people come to you in the professional setting who are suffering from physical illness.

When many others of you would not be meeting people in that setting, but it may well be that people who are seeking healing, who are seeking consciousness, freedom from suffering, also carry a physical illness within. So that may be, let's talk first about illness in yourself. I touched on it briefly in the book where I mentioned that there's a tendency to see yourself as a sick person.

When sickness arises, immediately the egoic needs, which is always looking for something to make your sense of self stronger and will devour and incorporate almost anything good or bad and say, that's me. So the tendency, as long as that tendency operates in you, an illness arises and it will be grasped by that mind conditioning and it will become part of your sense of self. And if it's a serious illness, it can obliterate a lot of the other identifications that you have, that who you think you are, and then you might see yourself derive your sense of identity from a mental image of a sick person.

And the moment an identification has happened and it happens easily because, as I'm sure you also know, some people who otherwise are not given a lot of attention get attention through an illness. The great doctors are going now to giving them attention and they think they are important. And in the mad ways of the ego looking for an enhanced identity, the ego will grasp that also and gain a sense of greater importance from illness, not in every case, but not in the same degree in everyone.

But the tendency is there, you then become an ill person, see yourself as that. And you will, the moment a mental identification with a physical condition has happened, the strange thing is that you don't want to let go of the illness, but that is unconscious, of course. Because the moment you have identified, it's become part of me, of course, you don't want to lose part of who you think you are.

And in some people's cases, illness that has become an important part, an important aspect of their inability to heal is because the mind doesn't want them to heal. That is often the case. So less so with you.

Healing, on the other hand, has enormous capacity. An illness has enormous capacity also to awaken. It has enormous capacity to pull you into greater unconsciousness.

And it has an even greater capacity to awaken you. And for many people, it's happened that a serious illness that they were faced with, which always contains the possibility of death, so it's any serious, it is serious because it contains the possibility of death, has led to a great awakening of consciousness, because you don't know how much time you've got anymore. And the whole time-bound consciousness that has, I still have a lot of future to complete myself, and you realize, I may not have.

And there may be pain associated with the illness, physical pain. And again, physical pain can lead to greater egoic contraction. And physical pain can lead also to surrender.

I've met some people for whom physical pain had become the only teacher they ever had, and it's led to surrender. I've seen people with AIDS already no longer being able to walk and looked into their eyes. And that's just one example.

I often, I like into, when you look into people's eyes, you can see the state of surrender or resistance. I've seen people with AIDS with light shining through their eyes. Their illness had driven them into surrender.

Not in each case. There are people with AIDS whose illness has driven them into greater egoic contraction. And so there are always the two possibilities.

Illness taking you into a more contracted ego, and then you become a bitter, unhappy, deeply suffering entity. And you're hanging on to the illness without knowing it, because at least you know who you are. Now, or it is becomes a teacher of surrender.

And even pain could do that. I've been free of pain for many years, except recently, for some reason, a few pains have appeared in my body. For a few days, a pain appeared here, and then a pain appeared there.

And it's simply being with it. I don't know why it appeared. Maybe the energy charge is getting too much for the body, a week-long retreat.

It's like the body perhaps is not made for such an energy charge. It's like taking a little toy that runs on two 1.5 volt batteries, and you push its button, as I have one. You push its button, and you push the belly, and it says, that tickles, that tickles.

And then you plug that toy into the socket, into the electric outlet, whatever it is, 190 volt. And for a while, it says more significant things than it tickles. But the mechanism isn't quite adjusted to that voltage yet.

So any pain is surrender. Instead of formulating an image of yourself as a sick person, reduce your illness, if it's your illness, to whatever the condition is at this moment, rather than having a big mental image of what has happened, what has led to it, and how the illness is going to develop, because it may not, and what's going to happen to me. So allow the illness to force you into the now, because if you're not in the now, and you suffer from a degenerative illness, that's like AIDS, or any other serious illness, if you're not in the now, you will suffer.

And I'm not speaking of the pain that is maybe caused, or the discomfort, or the disability that is being caused by the illness, because that's not suffering, it's pain. It's discomfort, or it's a disability, but it's not suffering. Suffering requires a mind-made entity that complains about my condition, and projects itself into an even worse future.

So allow the illness, only the condition of this moment, in whatever way the illness manifests at this moment, so it's not really a huge illness anymore, there is a pain here, there is a disability, there is a discomfort. Allow the illness, in some illnesses, you don't even have that, you just know that you're ill, and you might not even feel anything, they've just told you that, yes, you have a serious illness, but it hasn't manifested yet as a feeling. And there, just this moment, let the illness push you into intense presence, because when you leave presence, you will suffer.

So if you want to not suffer, refuse to leave this moment. This moment, you can live with. The pain of this moment, you can live with.

Or the discomfort, or the disability of this moment, you can live with. But if you leave mentally this moment, then you have an illness. So we deduce illness to just whatever it is now, then that takes away an identity built on that.

So you're not fighting an illness anymore, nor are you resigning yourself to being ill. You're simply surrendering to the condition of this moment. Not the idea that, okay, I might as well resign myself to the fact that I'm ill.

That's not surrender, you have a mental image. Surrender is just this moment is as it is. And I say yes to that.

And then the illness will transform your consciousness. If it has potentially the power to drive you into presence. Even in people who've never heard of presence, it's happened.

I've told a few times, and I told it again last week at the retreat, the example when I, talking about disability, when I was at university, I saw this person in a wheelchair who would come in. And this is an example of no greater disability could have happened than this person who was sitting in a wheelchair. And I saw him every day at lunchtime being fed by people.

And he couldn't talk anymore. He couldn't move a single limb. His head was slumped downwards.

His voice could only produce croaking sounds, which one or two people could interpret. And he couldn't keep the food in his mouth. Half the food could always fall out.

I asked, who is this man? They said, he teaches physics. He's a professor.

And he has, it has a name. Motor degenerative something. Motor neural disease.

A rare degenerative disease. And one day I looked into his eyes, because he was coming through the door at the same time as me. And for the first time, I realized deeply what happens, how illness can become a teacher.

Because there was no suffering in his eyes, just clarity, not a little complaining me. And nobody, a worse illness than that you can hardly imagine. Because the illness, you cannot, you're not supposed to live with that for more than three or four years.

Gradually everything becomes paralyzed, except your brain. The whole, everything, all functions are lost. But you can still think.

And that's what happened. And I looked into his eyes, and I saw he's not suffering. And they had given him two years.

They said, they told me this man was going to live for another two years. That's how much the doctors gave him to live. And 10 years later, I had long left the university environment behind.

I had spent time on my park bench. And I was, would often go into new stands to look at, to see what's happening in the world, because I didn't have a TV or radio, so just read the headlines. And then I looked at Newsweek magazine, and this very man was on the cover of Newsweek magazine in his wheelchair.

And he had become the most famous physicist in the world. 10 years after he'd been given two years to live. 10 years later, he was the most famous theoretical physicist in the world.

And they call him the successor of Einstein. And then I read the interview, and it said, the one sentence I remember in it, he said about his life, he could now speak because they constructed an artificial speech thing through which he can express himself, and said about his life, who could have wished for more? And that was about talking about his life.

Surrender had happened. And because surrender had happened, all the self-identification with the mentally created me wasn't there anymore. Not complete letting go of thought yet.

No, a lot of thought, because he had nothing else to do. Nobody had yet pointed out to him the possibility of going beyond thought, but yet his thought had become very creative. Because he had surrendered, presence had happened, and thought then arose out of presence.

So he had great insights. I believe he's still alive. Stephen Hawkins, and he's still at the same university.

And now it's 15 or 20 years since I met him. 20 probably, if not more. And I could see what the potential for, how illness can become your teacher, if used rightly.

Now, if an ill person comes to you, or any person, I never really differentiate between a physical condition, or a mental condition, or an emotional condition. In a way, they're all one. If anybody comes to you who cannot surrender, you have to surrender for them.

Sometimes people ask me, somebody close to them comes, and somebody very close to them is suffering, either physically or emotionally. And they're not letting go of the suffering. They cannot get out of that.

And so you suffer, because you see somebody so close to you suffer so much, and you want them to step beyond that. And it's the same that you would practice with reference to yourself, is to surrender that this person is in suffering, complete acceptance of this suffering person as not wanting to change them. That embracing, and then looking, the power of your attention moves.

And that is the great healer, the giving of full attention, which implies surrender, all resistance is out of the way. So, but it's not so much giving attention to the symptom, but to the totality of that person. Just embrace that person with your attention, and then see what happens.

You still do, in your case, there are certain things you do on the physical level, you give certain things, you administer. And yet there's the consciousness, the field into which they come when they come to you. Can you be, although you have to use your mind to some extent while you listen to them, I'm sure you practice also being in the state of thoughtless awareness.

So let them come into that spaciousness. If healing is possible, healing will happen in that spaciousness. That is your gift to them, into which they come.

So I wouldn't treat physical illness as a separate problem. It's always, and I know almost nothing about physical conditions. So I can't talk about it on that level.

All I, I always address the totality. I don't even know anything about emotional conditions or mental conditions, just the totality of that being here. And I accept the way they are completely.

And yet words may suddenly come, just as you may give, take that three drops a day, words out of that acceptance, words sometimes arise and they may be just right. The power of attention is very great, pure attention to the entire human being, not one aspect of that form. So don't underestimate the power of attention, just which is thoughtless.

And again, we don't have separate compartments anymore where we now we're dealing with a sick person. And here we're meeting the supermarket cashier. It's all the same because it's the same field of attention that you give when you say hello in thoughtless awareness for five seconds as the attention you give to a person who seems dreadfully ill, the same field of spacious presence, no differentiation anymore of who they are or what their condition is or whether they have 50 more years to live or one more week to live.

It's all the same. Attention is the greatest healer, which is presence.

[Speaker 6] (5:08:35 - 5:09:30)

Along the same lines, being present with pain, whether it's mental or emotional. Is there some pain that is just so great that one cannot stay present with? Example, coming across a car accident, even with a very conscious being.

My husband, I think, is a very conscious being. And two nights ago, back spasm, screaming. Now he's on a morphine drip in the hospital.

And during his screaming, I'm saying, look in my eyes, breathe. And he's just saying, I can't, I can't. There is pain.

I guess that's a question. Is there pain that just comes on so quickly and is so great that one, that being present with it is almost impossible? And when that, where do you go with that as an onlooker and as an experiencer?

Because that could have been me feeling that.

Yeah, thank you. Intense pain can consume a person almost completely. There seems to be nothing left except the pain.

And in that case, you, as the person close to that person, can bring presence, intense presence to that and hold it. In very intense pain is rarely prolonged, although some people suffer from that also. And that is, of course, the most dreadful thing that could happen to be continuously in pain.

If it happens to someone close to you, all you can do is hold the space of intense presence so that you don't get drawn also into the pain. That is a great healer. And you will rise, the degree of presence will reflect the intensity of the pain.

So it's possible that your degree of presence will be enormous if the pain that a person close to you suffers is very intense. And that could also be the case, there are forms of emotional pain of very great intensity too. And some person close to you may be in dreadful emotional pain, perhaps totally consumed by the pain body, completely identified with it.

And then your degree of presence, the intensity will correspond to the intensity of the pain and there will be enormous presence suddenly arising. If you don't get drawn into reaction, and then you will suffer with them, not as intensely, but you will also suffer. If they cannot surrender, you need to surrender.

If the person who is in such intense suffering that surrender is impossible, somebody close to them needs to surrender for them. It's secondary surrender. And it also works miracles.

Somebody who is close to you embraces completely that. And that's, again, there's always a redemptive dimension to illness and pain. Fortunately, that sharp pain, I don't know what is his condition now.

Is he still in pain?

[Speaker 6] (5:12:08 - 5:12:28)

He's on a morphine drip in the hospital, so there's no pain. But the pain was, it would go for 30 minutes at a time, just screaming pain. And breathing into it and staying present was impossible for him to do.

And I run across people like this. This is not unusual.

[Speaker 1] (5:12:30 - 5:18:28)

Intense pain can also consume the egoic entity. It can't survive anymore. Any intense, dreadful disability, as in the case of the person I just talked about, an egoic entity finds it hard to survive in the presence of such intense pain.

I had a pain probably much less intense last week on the retreat in New York. And for three days, I had a lower back pain, which I hadn't had before. And at one point, so much that I couldn't get out of bed.

I had to roll out of bed and then crawl on the floor. And finally, I could get up. And it wasn't so intense that I couldn't surrender to it.

It was just there. So I sat with that. There are greater, I know, in his case, probably of much greater intensity.

If it's all-consuming pain, physical or emotional, surrender for them. You become still, present. And your enormous energy suddenly rises.

And some people do that when they accompany a dying person also. The greatest thing, again, with a person who's dying is to bring the spaciousness to that moment. And maybe the dying person cannot do it.

Maybe in the last few moments, he or she can. But you are there to provide that space. And it's not you get out of the idea that this is so dreadful, this moment.

Everybody dies. And hold that thoughtlessness, pure awareness, field. Interesting thing, questions.

More and more, you will find people asking you questions. And the ability to differentiate between vital questions and mind-made questions. And so that you don't get drawn into trying to answer a mind-made question, any vital question, you will be surprised that the answer will be there.

If you receive the question in stillness, vital means that the questioner truly wants and needs to know, and it is not a curious question. I wonder, or what is there beyond? What happens when you are, is there another state after enlightenment?

I've read this book, and it says that after you become free, then there's another state. I want to know about that. That's not a vital question.

A vital question is how to be free now. But it's vital. It concerns me.

It concerns someone close to me. I need to know this. That's why I don't like to give interviews, because it's very rare that in an interview, it's an artificial situation.

The interviewer comes to the set of questions. They may be good questions, but because of the artificial setting, they're rarely vital questions. Do you truly want to know that at this, does a question arise out of this moment?

And you truly need to know that now. And often I find in interviews, what comes is less alive, has less power, than what comes when it's a true question. There may still be some power.

So recognize the question, is it vital? If it's vital and it is received by you in and through stillness, you just listen deeply to the question, and the answer will come. And sooner or later you can teach the other person to do that for him or herself.

And you will be amazed at how right your answer is when you don't come from a place of needing to know the answer, but simply the open listening. That's beautiful. And then if it's not vital, cut through it in whatever way.

Or say, I don't know. I'm not even interested. Nor are you, really.

Are there any vital questions left? Okay.

[Speaker 9] (5:18:28 - 5:19:29)

Well, it's a question about reflection. And I think that I've been drawn into a... I'm just, after listening to you this morning, I have a feeling that reflection is in disguise as thinking and analyzing.

And I'd thought it for a long time. I could feel and see the word reflection, that one was sitting very, in a kind of quiet posture. And I got a little caught up with that.

But it's a euphemism. I'm having a feeling after listening to you this morning that really it's... It's just old memories.

[Speaker 1] (5:19:30 - 5:19:31)

And... Yes.

[Speaker 9] (5:19:32 - 5:19:56)

But in me, or in this body-mind organism, arises like a reflex to go over stuff. And I think I've been calling it reflection, but I have a feeling that I could call it jack-in-the-beanstalk. I mean, I could call it anything.

[Speaker 10] (5:19:57 - 5:19:57)

Yes.

[Speaker 9] (5:19:57 - 5:20:05)

I feel it. I think I'd like to hear you say something about it, if you didn't mind.

[Speaker 1] (5:20:06 - 5:20:23)

Thank you. So you mean by reflection, the habit of going over past events, perhaps recent past or more distant past, and looking at them, what you did, said, what somebody else did and said. Is that your reflection?

That is habitual?

[Speaker 9] (5:20:24 - 5:20:35)

I might even think that reflection is what you have been talking about. And I think, oh, I will go and do this thing called reflect.

[Speaker 1] (5:20:35 - 5:20:40)

Ah, right. Now, you may remember, I occasionally use the word reflect.

[Speaker 9] (5:20:41 - 5:20:41)

Oh, do you?

[Speaker 1] (5:20:41 - 5:20:44)

I'm not using it in the normal sense of the word.

[Speaker 9] (5:20:45 - 5:20:45)

I see.

[Speaker 1] (5:20:45 - 5:26:22)

In the normal sense of the word, reflection is thought activity, contemplation, thought, contemplative thought, perhaps a quiet, you sit quietly and you look and you go through your mind concerning a situation. When I use the word reflection and I use expressions like, I reflect something to you, that is totally different. And that is also what you do when you are with people.

What you reflect to them has nothing to do with mental reflections. It's a different use of the word. It is to hold the spaciousness of presence because that is the essence of who you are underneath the mind.

When somebody then meets with you, that person recognizes in some way his or her own essence in that spaciousness. They may not even know it yet. They only may know it as a feeling of rightness and goodness at that moment when they are with you.

So when I use recognize, that is not usually an intellectual recognition, a mental recognition, a mental realization. It is often that recognition that is there when you reflect to someone as I've been reflecting all this weekend to you by simply holding, without doing anything, when I use language, it sounds as if I'm doing something, by holding that spaciousness of presence which is thoughtless awareness and something in you knows, it senses the goodness and the rightness of that. That sensing, I'm using these words because it's very hard to find the right words to describe something that is so beyond words.

That's, I'm using fairly simple words, perhaps they're less likely to mislead one, sensing the goodness and rightness of this moment, of being here at this moment. That is because through some form, some form has become transparent enough so that that spaciousness can shine through the form. The spaciousness reflects back to you who you are.

You recognize yourself, not through any thought activity. So it's being yourself. It's like arriving home.

This is good. Perhaps you have no idea about it, just as when my transformation happened, I had no idea in my head, I couldn't explain it. So that's the meaning of reflection in a different sense.

And that is your job is to hold the space of presence so that people can find themselves, their essence, when they come to you. They don't come to see you, they come to find themselves. Nobody comes to see me.

Why would they travel such a long distance to see me? And the strange thing is they travel a long distance to find themselves. If that works, fine.

At some point they realize I don't need to travel anymore. Except if I enjoy it. It may longer be a need, but you may still enjoy that reflection.

A deepening is still there, that your own realization deepens when in that reflection. And it's beautiful. So for a while you travel and it deepens and then you no longer need to travel, but you still do it because you enjoy it.

Until that may fall away too. And then people travel to come be with you and they enjoy that. And so that's beautiful.

It's not that really nobody comes to see you, never feel that they come to see me, because then you get into dilemma. Are they going to, am I going to disappoint them? Am I going to give them what they need and want?

Will I be able to give them what they need and want? They've come such a long way. Is it, do they think it's worth it?

What, oh my God, can I live up to their expectations and the image they have of me? What if I fail? What if I, but if you know they don't come to see you, oh, they come because there's less of you because you're transparent to the light, which is the case when you become present, the spaciousness is there.

They come for that transparency. Nothing to do with you. That's a relief.

I don't have to do anything. That's, oh, that's good to know. And there's no credit.

There's nobody who claims that I have transformed. This weekend, I transformed 30 people, 400 people. Nothing.

And I failed. And then there were another hundred with whom I failed miserably. They didn't become transformed.

[Speaker 6] (5:26:34 - 5:27:13)

This is a question about the mind and working with the mind. I can be in your presence and have no mind. I can sit in meditation sometimes and not go for a walk in the morning and all of a sudden the mind starts coming in.

Don't forget to order this. Don't forget to do that. I carry a piece of paper, notice myself taking it out, writing it down, more and more and more.

How do you work with a mind that is helping you to do your job? I run a retreat center and I have to listen to those things and work with them. But sometimes it's too much.

How do you work with the mind?

[Speaker 1] (5:27:14 - 5:33:54)

Yes. So, of course, it's very helpful at times. You need that.

You need to remember things. But the mind tends to come in the most inappropriate times and tell you, you must think about this now. You're out in nature.

You're not sitting in your office where you are. That is the space where you focus on what you need to deal with. Now, it may be simply a thought that you suddenly remember while you're walking out in nature.

And it may be a very valid thought. You might forget it and you write it down. The question is whether that thought then becomes a mind stream.

If it's just a thought, it might be a useful thought. You write it down and then you're back perceiving, walking, being present. But any thought has this tendency of wanting to prolong itself because it is a temporary, a very short-lived little being.

It's an energy field. It's a creation. It is a mind creation.

The thought is, almost every thought is an entity. No entity wants to go. It wants to carry on and, if possible, grow.

So there's a tendency for any thought to lead to proliferation of thought. And then when you don't know that, and the thought likes to pretend that it's more important than it really is, you need to think about this now. So more and more, it will be easier for you to see thoughts that come and to know whether this is truly important now or whether that is the mind simply trying to stay in control and not allow you to be present.

Is this truly important at this moment? No. If it's not important and you recognize it, what I'm just describing verbally, this question, Is this truly important at this moment?

becomes a non-verbal, non-mental way of looking at the thought and recognizing whether that thought has a place now or whether this is not its place. And then you recognize that this is not the thought that you need now. And then it drifts out.

You allow it to go so it doesn't proliferate. So we talked two days ago, perhaps, about your, I use that expression, your relationship to thought. And so the very fact that you are having a relationship to thought, which is just a way of speaking, a way of pointing, you are not making thought into an enemy.

You have no enemies. But your relationship to thought is to realize no thought is absolutely important. It's only important in the world of relativity.

Every thought likes to pretend that this matters. And a good example is waking up in the middle of the night. And of course, this is a case where often thoughts proliferate.

You can't sleep. And suddenly you remember all the things that you still need to do, one on top of the other. And it becomes suffocating almost because you're lying in bed and you can't do anything.

But you have all these, I need to deal with that. And then I will be faced with that problem. And then that person will come.

And what am I going to do about that? And you're not, this is not the space to deal with any of it. You are in bed.

To recognize that as the momentum of the mind, it wants to, we must think about this now. Think about this now. And so it will be easier for you now as presence is emerging to take one step back, even from a very agitated mind, and know that here is an agitated mind.

That is enough to have already some freedom from it, to know there's an agitated mind. And it goes on and on. And perhaps you cannot immediately switch it off.

But you start by simply saying, I accept that there's an agitated mind here, which means you're already out of it. But occasionally you get back in. And at that moment when you know that, there also comes a choice.

For example, the choice could be, even while you're having an agitated mind, to feel the aliveness in your hands. So you still allow the mind to be agitated. And while you allow your mind to be agitated, you could even combine it with this gesture that I like so much, and that is simply holding.

And while you hold in this gesture, which is the beautiful, essentially feminine, female gesture of total receptivity, often found in Virgin Mary, that beautiful openness of holding, the softness of that. And what you're holding is your agitated mind is in there, in that you're holding that. And while you hold, you sense the aliveness that is there.

And so the mind will then calm down without you trying to make the mind stop by itself. Simply this gentle holding. And you hold with here.

This is the gesture. And there's an energy field in that holding. It's symbolic, and it's a little bit more than symbolic too.

And you hold. So it's a gentle relationship with your mind. It's a little bit like the mind is like a child.

What do you do with it? You hold the child. So have that relationship with your mind.

It's not a big monster. It's the human mind. It does what it does.

[Speaker 8] (5:34:00 - 5:34:23)

Oh, Eckhart, I wanted to ask you if you would be kind enough, we talked yesterday about a situation that might be if you're facilitating a group, but if you're working individually, like in a group, you might play a video or an audio and then meditate. When you're seeing people individually in the years that you did that, how would that look? What could be one way that might be?

[Speaker 1] (5:34:26 - 5:44:30)

Do you mean when I saw people all those years? Do you mean what was the structure of it? Yes, yes.

There wasn't much structure. And people would come through word of mouth. I remember we sat together once or twice in London.

I've known Victoria for many, many, many years. And then there was a long gap when we lost touch. And then Victoria discovered the book.

And so we got in touch again. It was all wonderful. And we sat together in stillness once or twice in my living room.

And still it feels it's now. And you said, I can feel gentle. Something, I don't remember the exact words.

And we sat in silence. With some people, I would sit mostly in silence. And other people would come as if it were a therapeutic, a therapy session.

And they would do a lot of talking. And I would do a lot of listening, listening, listening. Didn't know yet the power that is in the listening until this lady came and said, you are a healer, you are healing.

That was the emanation that comes through the state of stillness. And I tried out different things for a while because my understanding wasn't yet fully developed. For a while, I used sometimes visualizations with people to get them to a place of peace.

And then that wasn't quite right until a totally natural way evolved of being with people. And the characteristic of that is, and that applies to all those people who are doing significant transformational work with others in whatever capacity. It's often the case that they do what they do and it comes so intuitively, they couldn't describe to you what they do.

And it's because it comes out of the state of presence. Before I could be fully effective so that that inner state became externalized as a teaching when I was, for quite a few years, I was working with people. It was in the process of becoming externalized through meeting those people and being with all those people at the time.

It was not yet fully grown, almost one could say. It took time. There was no time in that state, but it took time for that state to become externalized as a powerful teaching stream.

Not only the words that were part of that, but also the energy that emanates. It was already emanating there, but it was still growing the externalization of it. So all that was a process of externalization over time.

But even there, quite a few people already experienced a transformation there. For some people, it was already very powerful and it worked. Others, I couldn't get through yet.

Certain other people who came with very dense minds and yet wasn't, couldn't, the mind was still able to not receive. So I could, would be an interesting story to write about all these things. And what happened, less and less, the structure became less and less in a way.

And I couldn't call it anything anymore. What do you call it? Healer, spiritual therapy.

For a while, I thought, well, I need some label. What do you do? I just sit there and you come and we sit together and I listen.

And then what? Nothing. That was also the time perhaps when we sat together, I gave the first talk, public talk.

I met a man. There was a little gathering and I met this man who worked for the Theosophical Society and I talked to him for five minutes about nothing special. And he said, you must come and talk to us.

We need you at the Theosophical Society. So at about that time, that was the first talk. I gave a formal talk rather than talking to a few people informally.

That was things. So I went to the Theosophical Society and the title of my talk was, because they wanted, you need a label, spiritual dimension in psychotherapy. And there were maybe 25, 30 people there, maybe similar to this group.

And so that was the beginning of speaking and that also grew through time. So it's always the case, and you also are finding that already, I'm sure many of you, and increasingly find that you don't have to do much. It is being done for you.

You're just the opening. And so that's the case with even the effective, truly effective therapists. They don't do much.

It just happens. And then sometimes they come people and say they must have a secret. What is it that they...

There's this thing called NLP. I don't know. I haven't investigated too much about it.

But that started with people looking in detail how three effective therapists work. And they couldn't explain how they work because they just did it. It just happened.

But they started watching them and writing down whatever they do because they're so effective. We must know what they do. Now they're mirroring the other person's movements.

They didn't know they were doing that. They were so in tune that when the client they were listening to moved, they moved with him. They didn't even know it.

And then the eyes go that way when he asked that question, and then they go there. And that became a system. And I believe that is the same case with Tai Chi, which I feel very strongly because I've experienced that.

It doesn't happen often. Spontaneous movement, joyful expression of presence through the physical realm, the body spontaneously, suddenly beginning to move. And it looks as if I've been doing Tai Chi, I don't know anything about Tai Chi.

It's just moving like a very slow dance. And I'm sure the origin of Tai Chi was a few people spontaneously because they lived in presence moved because it was a joyful expression of presence. And then someone said, oh, that looks interesting.

And they became fascinated not just by watching the harmony of the movement, but by sensing the energy field behind the movement. And the more and more people looked and then they would come every day hoping that the master would move again. But of course, he or she wouldn't move every day.

And at some point they said, we have to learn this. And then they came with a piece of paper. Now his left leg goes up.

Now the arm moves slowly outward. And then over time, it became something that you can learn. No longer the real thing that originates directly from presence.

And yet, even if it's a system, it still has certain effectiveness. In fact, rather than arising from presence, the movement can take you into presence. But originally it arose out of presence.

So now we reverse that. It's become a bit of a system, a method, and it takes you into presence. So that works too.

But I know for sure, nobody, I haven't read this anywhere, that the origin was spontaneous expression. So it's a beautiful thing, Tai Chi, Qigong. You can't do it unless you're present.

You won't be very good at it unless at every stage, not trying to get from here to there, not hoping that, okay, I need to get there now. No, you're here, here, here, here, always here, never mentally there. And I know nothing about Tai Chi.

Now, was there one more question from you? Maybe then that'll maybe the last.

[Speaker 7] (5:44:31 - 5:44:51)

Before my question, I just want to add another perspective on charging or not charging that great healer in New York City who charged for his healing, and he was very effective laying on of hands. And he said, you don't charge for the healing, but you charge for your time.

[Speaker 1] (5:44:51 - 5:44:52)

Yes, yes.

[Speaker 7] (5:44:52 - 5:44:56)

In the Western society. What you have is your time.

[Speaker 1] (5:44:56 - 5:45:00)

Yes, that's another perspective on it, which also contains some truth. Yes.

[Speaker 7] (5:45:02 - 5:46:37)

And now my question. I have a private practice for many, many, many years, which transforms as I do. And at this point, I've been incorporating your teaching into every session, which has given new aliveness to my work, which was getting flat.

An aspect of what I do has to do with emotional healing, where the client lies down and I have them breathe and take them out of the mind and into the body and into what they're feeling. And I'm very aware now of not wanting to support a client being stuck in on the level of story. However, there is a place where, as you once said in a tape, where experiences, let's say with a parent that have not been accepted, get stuck and then becomes a cloud in which somebody perceives other relationships or themselves or whatever, and that could obscure their ability to experience presence.

And so my question is, when I'm bringing a client into the emotional body and there is an issue around a parent or around something that has to do with the past, where is that point where you're allowing the story to take over and the emotions to kind of just run through that and you're losing effectiveness and where is the place for working on the level of story?

[Speaker 1] (5:46:37 - 5:55:26)

Yes. The story is helpful to know. Sometimes the story is not even known.

Of course, it can happen that an emotion, a residue of emotion is there and there's not even a memory of where it came from. And sometimes as presence grows, it can happen that suddenly a memory comes back. That's not always necessarily reliable because it could be also sometimes a symbolic expression.

But the memory comes back, let's say it is a memory of what happened or the memory was already there, but a non-recognition of the emotion that went with it. So the memory was there, that is another possibility, but the person was unaware of the emotional charge that was because the child had to cut him or herself off from that in order to avoid unbearable suffering. So it's just as possible that the memory continued but not the person, the adult, then thinks, it remembers that incident or series of incidents or what used to happen at home, behavior of one of other parents, but no longer can feel and thinks I don't have emotion around it.

Yes, my father would do this or that whenever he got drunk, just an example, but I didn't feel, it felt I didn't feel bad about it. And then after a while, but that badness may come up at other times, not knowing that there is the origin. So it's good to recognize the connection between a memory and an emotion.

And once you have seen where it is, not to perpetuate these two so that they link into each other, because the emotion will want to perpetuate itself. And once the person knows where it originally came from, and even that may not have been the true origin, it may just have added to the pain body that was already there, already born into this world and just added more to that. So the pain body always tries to perpetuate the story, think more about it, talk more about it.

But once you have seen it, oh, I've recognized it now, that's what it was, then to focus more, to cut the link between the pain body and mind activity. You've already seen. And now just be aware of the emotion and hold it.

It is human fear. It is human anger. It is human sadness.

And recognizing that in one way or another, all humans experience those things who come into this world. And that's your way of experiencing those human emotions and holding them. And gradually that takes out the self out of the emotion, a continuous attempt to seek yourself even in that painful emotion and thinking that is essentially me.

That is the essence of me, of who I am. By holding it, that is allowing it to be. And that's good if they do it with you together until they can do it for themselves.

And if there's a gradual recognition of the unpersonal, non-personal nature of those emotions, although the events, the triggering events seemed a personal situation, but the resulting emotion is human pain, is human anger, is human fear. And in every human, to a lesser or greater degree, those things will become activated, those emotions, just by living in this world. And this is your essential teaching now is that as you hold the space of presence, they join you in presence and more and more recognize their essential identity as the observing presence, as the holding, as the space in which they're holding that emotion.

So with your help, as you hold the space of presence, it's almost you become one while they sit with you. You're one already anyway, but now you realize that you are one. There's that oneness.

And as presence grows in them, self-identification with the emotion will shrink. And when the self-identification with the emotion shrinks, that also means the link between thought processes and emotions is severed. And then it begins the transmutation of the energy that is trapped in those emotions.

And it's no longer consuming a large part of your aliveness, because if there's a heavy pain body, the heavy pain body will consume an enormous amount of energy and suck the aliveness out of you. It should not be stuck in there and become pain. And then the pain is freed.

And now as presence rises, that pain, the energy that is in that pain, its vibrational frequency changes into presence. That is why I have often found that people with heavy pain bodies have fairly quickly woken up because there was so much energy and actually the pain body fueled once a certain degree of presence is there and it's strong enough, the pain body fuels the growing presence. The energy that was trapped in there changes its, because there's only one energy, but the vibrational frequency of fear or sadness, of course, is very different from the highest of presence, changes its frequency.

Some of the most dreadfully unhappy people have woken up and some of them in the most miserable, unhappy conditions have suddenly woken up. And that pain became presence, fuel for presence. Also, an external situation that is dreadful that you may find yourself in can become fuel for presence.

That's the more unpleasant, the more fuel for presence. That's how this counts of people in the most dreadful situations suddenly waking up out of all that. So it's beautiful work and that is the essence of what you do now.

You're teaching presence and whoever comes joins you. It's like bringing a, I have this image of a log that's only burning a little or not burning, not even burning yet. Put it close to another log in the fire that's already burning and then quickly that one burns too.

So you're all logs. Let's become just... It's been a wonderful weekend of stillness, of words, but always stillness, even during the words, while words were being spoken, the essence of this gathering has always been and is the stillness, the spaciousness underneath or around the words.

And it's always been just about that one thing, nothing else at all. Only one thing matters absolutely. Everything else matters relatively.

Only one thing matters. That's actually in the New Testament. Only one thing matters and you have chosen that one thing.

That's a quotation from the New Testament, but it's right for this moment.

[Speaker 10] (5:56:01 - 5:56:02)

Thank you.

2017 Eckhart Tolle on Great Western Classics 8h12m

[Speaker 1] (0:12 - 4:46:18)

Let's make sure we are at home in the present moment and inhabiting the body, so a little bit of your attention is in the body, the inner energy field of the body, and the rest of your attention is on sense perception, and in that way you are anchored in the present moment. The inner energy field provides the anchor for staying present. If you can't feel anything in your body, start with your hands, direct your attention into your hands, and see if you can feel a little bit of aliveness in there.

Oh yes, there it is. And your feet, are they alive? Oh yes, you can feel almost a kind of tingling.

There's energy there, there's life energy in there, and so you can connect with the entire body as a global sense of aliveness as you sit here, because wherever you are, you're here and now. And the mind will not be excessively active when your attention is in the inner energy field. You can be alert without unnecessary interference of thinking, without having to wait for the next moment to provide some kind of improvement.

So the realization comes that this moment is actually good enough, more than good enough, because you're beginning to feel the goodness that is underneath the phenomenal appearance of the present moment, the forms. You are getting in touch with the formless. One of the things we are doing as part of our new venture, which is a kind of experiment using the internet to reach many thousands of people, occasionally I present a book to you that has been very meaningful to me for many years.

There are a number of books that I've carried around, well sometimes I lost copies and then I bought another one, because I moved around so much. And we already in one of the previous sessions, we had one session on one of the greatest books ever written, the Tao Te Ching. We had a session on that and I feel that we are going to have another session on that at some point, not today though.

For today I've chosen a book and before I continue I need to tell you we're not studying something that's external to ourselves. We are not here, it's not a university setting, we are not learning philosophy, we are only using the subject matter of the book as an alternative pointer to the reality within ourselves. So it's not anything, we're not studying anything outside ourselves that would be useless.

So this book that actually I never lost, it's been with me for 25 or 30 years. I bought it new but now the pages are turning yellow, the edges, which means I'm getting old. When books that you bought new turn yellow around the edges you're getting old or the quality of the paper is deteriorating.

Emerson, Ralph Waldo Emerson, essays which he became famous for. What I'm going to do is just read very brief extracts from one or two of the essays and then we will comment on that. As some of you know Emerson was born in Boston in 1803, died about 80 years later and most of his life he traveled around giving talks.

A very unusual thing, he was kind of a 19th century spiritual teacher, very unusual thing for the 19th century. And some of these essays have enormous power so he must have gone very deep within to be able to write these things. An important thing, just a very brief look at his life.

As many people who are destined to go very deep within he experienced a not very pleasant childhood and early life. At a very early age and this is the case with many people who are forced, either destined to go deeper within or if not they are forced by life's circumstances to go deeper within. And so in his case at the age of eight his father died.

So becoming acquainted with mortality at a very early age, a very painful thing. Then there were five children, his mother was relatively poor so they lived on very little, the mother had to feed five boys. Then later in his early 20s he developed tuberculosis, a potentially fatal illness but recovered from it.

Then he got married and two years later his wife died. So again it became very clear to him, it must have become very clear to him how fragile, how impermanent, fleeting the world of form is, of bodies and forms. So whether he already realized that on a conscious level, but there must have been a very deep having to go deeper within.

And then he studied at Harvard to become a theologian, to become a minister. He became a minister but was not happy with the constraints of the church and then left the church and started just giving talks. And some of the talks became the essays.

So you can see retrospectively how loss is very often a concealed blessing. You don't know it at the time. At the time it just seems a dreadful thing to be happening to you.

But if you look deeper, especially if you're able to come to a state of acceptance, then the moment you surrender to what is, the other side of loss reveals itself to you. There's grace hiding behind every loss. That's good to know next time loss comes to you, as it will of course, because you can't go through life without experiencing loss.

People around you are going to leave you, unless you leave them first. Bodies dissolve. And the older you get, the more clearly you see, wow, all these bodies are dissolving.

A very brief, just a few sentences here on being and the sense of being, finding that within yourself. He says, oh I must, before I read, this is mid-19th century English prose. So at first, it might be for some of you who are not used to reading that kind of thing, Jane Austen or whatever, that kind of thing, may find it a little bit unusual at first.

For the sense of being which in calm hours rises, we know not how in the soul, is not diverse from things, from space, from light, from time, from man, but one with them, and proceeds obviously from the same source whence their life and being also proceeds. We first share the life by which things exist and afterwards see them as appearances in nature and forget that we have shared their cause. Here is the fountain of action and the fountain of thought.

Here are the lungs of that inspiration which gives man wisdom, of that inspiration of man which cannot be denied without impiety and atheism. We lie in the lap of immense intelligence which makes us organs of its activity and receivers of its truth. When we discern justice, when we discern truth, we do nothing of ourselves but allow a passage to its beams, the beams of that great intelligence like the sunlight.

So the sense of being which in calm hours rises, we know not how in the soul, is not diverse from things, from space, from light, from time, from man, but one with them. In calm hours means when you become still inside, when the mind activity subsides. Then what arises is something that had been obscured by mental noise which is the sense of being and that really is the essence.

Sometimes it's called the sense of I am without any addition to the I am, not I am this or I am that. The sense of beingness, as you may remember from grammar lessons at school, to be and I am is part of the same verb. It's easy to forget when you say I am is the first person singular of to be.

So being and I am is the same. So getting that sense of your innermost identity which has no form to it, no mental concept, no physical appearance, it's deeper than that, a formless sense of being that is there clearly is revealed when the continuous flux of forms, especially mind forms, subsides. So that sense of being is always, has always been there underneath the mental noise.

And when that is realized as the essence of who you are, in other words, you are formless in essence, timeless. The Buddhists call it empty and of course Western scholars misinterpret that. They say it's a nihilistic religion or it's life denying.

They don't realize that what Buddhists call emptiness is the formless essence of all life and timeless. And that is something to be realized of course only in the, it's inextricably one with the what we call the present moment. We could say it is the present moment because it is the space in which everything arises.

All sense perception, all thoughts, all emotion, where do they appear? They appear in that space of being which you could also call unconditioned consciousness, timeless. And that is the eternal in you.

And once that is known directly, not as an intellectual fact or belief, but known directly.

And again, not known as you know the flower or the table or the tree, not known as a subject knows an object, but knowing yourself as the eternal subject, not making yourself into an object. And that's the ego.

That's what happened to the human mind. We made ourselves into objects and then you begin to have a relationship with yourself. And then you start liking or disliking yourself.

And then you talk about that you have a life, not realizing that you are life. And perhaps then only the dog or the cat can still remind you that they don't have a life, they are life. They don't have an unhappy or happy story.

They are life. That's why we talked about nature. Nature still lives in that state of connectedness.

And once you realize that, you recognize that formless essence that you are wherever you look. It is the underlying one, the one life, the one timeless life that you are. And then wherever you look, every tree, every animal, every blade of grass, even the sun, the stars, your dog or your cat, you recognize something there, something that any life form is also an expression of that one.

So you recognize yourself in others, which is the most beautiful thing when you recognize the essence of who you are in the flower. And you recognize it not through any mental concept but through the absence of mental concepts. It is only mental concepts that create the barrier between yourself and the flower when you start calling it something.

Or another human being, the beauty of being with another human being without the interference, the screen of conceptualization, just spacious presence. No matter what the other human being is doing or saying, you are there as spacious presence for whatever arises in this moment. That means you are connected with the one, you are that and recognize it, there is nothing alien anymore, there is ultimately no other anymore.

And this is what he is talking about. The sense of being which in calm hours rises, when we become still now, we know not how it rises within, is not diverse from things, from space, from light, from time, from man, but one with them and proceeds obviously from the same source when their life and being also proceeds. And then that is intelligence itself, not the intelligence that can be measured by IQ tests, but primordial, unconditioned intelligence is there when you discover that dimension in yourself.

Here is the fountain of action, spontaneous action arises out of that presence, and the fountain of thought, it can inspire the mind. Creative thought can only come when you become still, contact that dimension, realize that is who you are in essence, and then your mind starts to operate and it becomes inspired, it becomes an instrument rather than self-serving mind activity. And then all the repetitive thinking gradually subsides and more creative thinking happens.

And in between the creative thinking there are wonderful spaces of not thinking. The greatest thing that can happen to you, and hopefully is happening to you, is to discover within yourself spaces of not thinking. You have not reverted back to the vegetable realm, you have gone beyond thinking.

And from the point of view of the ego, that's not a big thing, it says, how does that solve my problems, not thinking? The conceptual mind does not understand the significance of that. I sometimes say that all I have achieved in life is I don't need to think unless I want to think.

That really is where everything comes from, just becoming comfortable with a state of not knowing from the point of view of the mind. Going to a talk, in my case, sitting down and having the feeling I have absolutely nothing to say, and becoming comfortable with not knowing. Not just when you are going to give a talk, in any situation, you don't need to work it out conceptually, what am I going to, how am I going to deal with this person, how am I going to deal with this situation.

Be there, bring the presence to it, and let that intelligence come through you. It can then use your mind and you find yourself saying something original, or you find yourself saying just the right thing that is helpful for that moment and that person. Or you find yourself taking spontaneous action, suddenly the right thing, the right action arises, you suddenly realize what it is that you need to do, you've been thinking about it for years, and suddenly you let go of thinking, space opened up, and the realization is there.

So, for a balanced life there needs to be the two dimensions in your life, the dimension of form, I call that human, the human dimension, where you are a person with a history, and you think, and you have relatives and relationships, and you have a life situation which is good or bad, or changes from good to bad and bad to good, and you are the being dimension of the human being, most humans don't know that yet, there is the being dimension that is the formless. So, a truly fruitful life is the balance between the formless essence within yourself and the world of form.

Most humans on this planet are lost in form, totally identified with form, that's all they know, totally identified with their mind, every thought form that comes into their head, they are completely identified with it, they are in the grip of form, and then they are surrounded by countless forms, and each form in their life situation demands attention, this matters, this matters, the phone rings, I need to do this, now I need to do that, completely absorbed by form, and everything is serious, has a heaviness and a seriousness to it, and the more you go on living like that, the heavier and the more serious your life becomes, it's a loss of balance, and then all you end up with, this is the subject matter of many movies that you see, is people who are totally trapped on that dimension only of form, complete absence of transcendence in their life, and sometimes these films are quite nice, you see, what a pity that there's not the slightest glimpse of any transcendence, they're trapped in their little life situations, and so for life to be balanced, there needs to be attention on consciousness, the underlying essence of life is formless consciousness, and that means your sense of identity comes from there, the true sense, so you don't need the world of form anymore to give you your sense of self, because as the Buddha said, when you identify with, when you're looking for yourself in things, I'm giving a very free translation of Buddha, when you identify with the world of form and looking for yourself in forms, in your thoughts, in your possessions, in your achievements, in other people's opinion of who you are, whatever form it is, if you're looking for yourself, or some kind of completion of your sense of self in form, you're going to suffer, that's the message of the Buddha, because there is no self in these things, you cannot find yourself, now Buddhism says, because there is no self, Hinduism will tell you, talks about the self, but they're really talking about the same thing, it's a formless self, now whether you say, no self or formless self, doesn't make any difference, these are just pointers, you may prefer one pointer to the other, I prefer this finger pointing to the moon, and then another, no, this finger pointing to the moon is much nicer, it doesn't matter, the moon matters, and so we lie in the lap of immense intelligence, it is within and without, we are pervaded by it, it fills the entire space of the universe, we lie in the lap of immense intelligence which makes us organs of its activity and receivers of its truth, if we are open to it, it's like having a house, if you close the shutters, no matter how bright the sunlight is, it can't come in, it doesn't mean the shutters are more powerful than the sunlight, it just means shutters are closed, and so if a human being is closed, the vast intelligence cannot operate, or can only operate as a trickle, everybody has a trickle of it, otherwise they wouldn't be alive, so everybody has a little trickle of that coming into their lives, but the full power of it, in most people's lives, is missing, so they live not knowing what vast power is available to them, or to put it more accurately, what vast power they themselves are, it's not, and I say it's not available to you that creates a separation, it is in essence is who you are, now I'd like to read to you a little thing that came to Emerson when he was sitting in his study, and outside there were roses growing outside his window, and here again we come to the power of nature that we talked about the other day, the power of nature to reconnect you with being, and so he looked at the rose, and then he saw this, or realized this, the context of this is that he's talking about people who are always quoting ancient texts only, they're not open to the power of the divine coming through them, they're quoting from the bible, they're quoting from other scriptures, but not realizing that the very power that spoke then is in them now also, it's just a question of opening yourself to it, and then he looked at the roses under his window, the roses under my window make no reference to former roses or to better ones, they are for what they are, they exist with god today, there is no time to them, they are simply the rose, it is perfect in every moment of its existence, before a leaf bud has burst, its whole life acts, in the full-blown flower there's no more, in the leafless root there's no less, its nature is satisfied, and it satisfies nature in all moments alike, there is no time to it, but man postpones or remembers, he does not live in the present, but with reverted eye laments the past, or heedless of the riches that surround him, stands on tiptoe to foresee the future, he cannot be happy and strong until he too lives with nature in the present above time.

There you have the rose teaching Emerson how to live, and then he put it into words, and this shows us that he actually, it was not just a superficial look at a rose, as one would normally, oh what a nice rose, there was a true, he truly gave attention to the rose, and realized how absolutely present the rose is, how absolutely devoid of time it is, carrying no past and no future, and he recognized that the same as Jesus did when he said look at the flowers of the field, look at the lilies, when he said that he didn't just say have a look at the lilies, he said really look, give it your full attention, and then you will realize something there, that human beings, there's a connectedness with being, they haven't gone out as far as humans, they have not left the source of all life, they have not become as differentiated as the humans have, so therefore what they can teach us, show us, is the connectedness with the source of all life, and that's what he saw when he looked at the rose, and then he realized that we can, when we reconnect with that, we don't just become, go back to the vegetative realm, which is beautiful for everything vegetative there, but not for us, it's not our destiny to go back to become a rose, or a tree, or a blade of grass, we transcend the thinking stage, we transcend the differentiation of the thinking stage, and we then regain the oneness that was once lost, that ancient mythologies point to as the lost paradise, and when you regain something, as I often point out, you regain it at a deeper level with knowing consciousness.

And so the last sentence here is important, he saw here, of course, that usually man does not live in the present, but with reverted eyes, reverted eyes, he doesn't look at what's right here, he reverts his eyes and looks, laments the past, oh dear, regrets about what happened, guilt, regret, memories, things went wrong in my life situation, this happened, that happened, or heedless of the riches that surround him, stands on tiptoe to foresee the future, I need to get, I need to get there, where is it, I need to get to the next moment, the riches that surround you that are part of the now. So the lesson then is to truly look so that something imparts itself to you from anything natural, so the anything natural reconnects you with, can reconnect you with being. By the way, when he uses his words in the 19th century, so there was still a tendency for there to use male pronouns, the same as the Bible, and so on, so obviously when he says man, he means man and woman, and he tends to use the masculine pronoun, so you have to excuse that.

Man is a stream whose source is hidden, always our being is descending into us from we know not whence. Most humans regard themselves as a surface phenomenon, you are here, no sense of deeper connectedness with life, you are here like as if somebody had put you here on this planet and there's me and there's the rest of the world, the rest of the universe, the lack of connectedness. If you go deeper within and you do it by finding the dimension of stillness underneath thinking, then you connect with the source, the depth within yourself, and there's vast depth.

Man is a stream whose source is hidden. And when, once it's open, so all you have to really do, if you can even call it doing, is open the door. And even that is not a doing because really keeping the door closed through continuous thinking is the doing.

So it's more like a stop doing and then it opens. In that sense, some of those teachers are right saying you can't do anything because it's the doing that obscures the being. And so once that is open, then you gradually learn to do and be at the same time.

You can act without losing connect. At first you find it only in very still moments, perhaps in nature, and you go, ah, ah. And then gradually you see if you can stay connected when you're going shopping for food, supermarket, or traveling from here to there, carrying alertness, alert presence, rather than continuously thinking entity.

Always about the next moment or the last moment. This is the only, you may have noticed that I only ever talk about one thing. And this is it.

Now he uses in one of his essays the term the over-soul. And by over-soul he means the unity of all things. The unity, the oneness of all things.

All things are ultimately one. Not only that all things are connected to everything else, which physicists now tell us is actually the case. There's no division between this body and this table and this flower and those other bodies.

There's no real division on the subatomic realm. And so not only is everything connected with everything else, a web of interconnectedness, but also everything is connected to a common source. It has come out of the common source.

It returns to the common source, which is formless and timeless. And the common source remains in every form as its innermost essence. And so this common source, this unity he calls the over-soul.

And he says, that unity, that over-soul, within which every man's particular being is contained and made one with all other, that common heart of which all sincere conversation is the worship, to which all right action is submission, that overpowering reality which confutes our tricks and talents and constrains everyone to pass for what he is and to speak from his character, which means from his essence, and not from his tongue, and which ever more tends and aims to pass into our thought and hand and become wisdom and virtue and power and beauty.

We live in succession, in division, in parts, in particles. Meantime, within man is the soul of the whole, the wise silence, the universal beauty to which every part and particle is equally related, the eternal one. And this deep power in which we exist and whose beatitude is all accessible to us is not only self-sufficing and perfect in every hour, but the act of seeing and the thing seen, the seer and the spectacle, the subject and the object are one.

We see the world piece by piece as the sun, the moon, the animal, the tree, but the whole of which these are the shining parts is the soul, the oneness, seeing the oneness behind the multiplicity, seeing the oneness of all forms in every form. And what he calls the soul, we could also use the word the consciousness, the one unconditioned consciousness that pervades the entire universe, the one reality. So when he says here the soul, if you want to use consciously a different pointer, that's fine.

All goes to show that the soul in man is not an organ but animates and exercises all the organs, is not a function like the power of memory, of calculation, of comparison, but uses these as hands and feet, is not a faculty but a light, is not the intellect or the will but the master of the intellect and the will, is the vast background of our being in which they lie, an immensity not possessed and that cannot be possessed.

From within or from behind, a light shines through us upon things and makes us aware that we are nothing but the light is all, the background, the background space, consciousness looks through these eyes, speaks through this mouth, becomes form and yet remains untouched as a formless. So can you go through life dealing with the foreground of things that need doing, things that you need occasionally to think about and yet remain aware of the background to your life, the consciousness, the light of consciousness or the space in which everything appears. Another way of putting it, can you be aware that you are aware at this moment, can you sense the awareness underneath what you are perceiving with your senses at this moment without which there would be no perception, can you sense the awareness underneath any kind of emotional feeling you might be having at this moment, can you sense the awareness out of which any thought that might arise in your mind at this moment comes and comes, dissolves back into the presence that you are, that's the formless, that's timeless and so that is the vast background of your being, an immensity not possessed and that cannot be possessed. A man is the facade of a temple wherein all wisdom and all good abide. What you see is the facade of the temple, not only what you see as the physical form of this human being but also the psychological form of this human being is also the facade still of the temple, it is not in essence who that being is.

What we commonly call man or woman, the eating, drinking, planting and counting man, eating, drinking, planting, counting, doing all kinds of things, what we commonly call man, the eating, drinking, planting, counting man does not as we know him represent himself but misrepresents himself. Him we do not respect but the soul whose organ he is, would he let it appear through his action would make our knees bend. When it breathes through his intellect it is genius, when it breathes through his will it is virtue, when it flows through his affection it is love and the blindness of the intellect begins when it would be something of itself.

The weakness of the will begins when the individual would be something of himself. So the blindness of the intellect begins with the belief that you are something of yourself, that is the mind, the self-serving mind. The blindness of the, the weakness of the will begins when the individual would be something of himself, that is the ego, believing that you are an independent, autonomous, self-sufficient entity that has been put into this world from somewhere, not realizing you have come out of it and you are an intrinsic part of the totality and so there comes the sense of separateness, of alienation, with that comes the continuous neediness of the ego and with that comes the continuous underlying fear that's always there when you're not connected, there's fear no matter what you may have achieved in the world of form, the fear will not leave you until the sense of separateness leaves you, you reconnect. How wonderful to see that all spiritual teachings in essence are one.

This is why I love to go back to some of the ancient books and they might use very different words but once you recognize the truth in yourself, you see the truth wherever it comes, in whatever form it comes, and you say, yes, there it is, I recognize it. And so this is sometimes being called the perennial philosophy, there's a thread that goes back thousands of years, the same truth being expressed in different words and different forms throughout the ages, in the past by very rare individuals here and there, but somehow it survived, whatever form they left behind, writing or, it survived, somehow there were always enough humans who had at least an inkling that there was something extremely precious and valuable there. So that's the perennial philosophy that, I don't know who first used that word, there is a very wonderful book by Aldous Huxley of the same title, Perennial Philosophy. So the truth is there and there's no arguing once you have it in yourself, you don't attach yourself to the form in which it's being expressed, that's what religions traditionally do, you get attached to the form, not realizing the form points to an underlying essence, which is one, all religions are one, and you don't even need a religion to see the essence.

You are enough. If you have a religion, fine, you don't need it, but if you have it, it can take you, if you use it rightly, it can take you deeper, if you use it wrongly, you get more entangled in ego through your religion. There is no bar or wall in the soul where man, the effect ceases and God, the cause begins.

There is no separation between you and the source, it's a continuous, you could almost think of it, if you think of it visually, you are connected, if you are walking around a globe, and every being on the globe is connected to the center with a thread, it's a visual representation of it, you're connected. Now if you're only, if the surface reality of where you're walking around is all you have, then you see the separation between me, you, and the other human being, or what other life form, or you see the separateness. When you are aware of the center within, then you see the unity.

So you're walking around this globe, there's one human being, here's another human being, disconnected because they're only aware of the surface. If you're aware of the depths within yourself, then suddenly you see that you are one with the other, you're connected at the center. It's a visual, of course, somewhat incomplete representation.

The sovereignty of this nature whereof we speak is made known by its independency of those limitations which circumscribe us on every hand. The soul circumscribes all things. As I have said, it contradicts all experience.

In like manner, it abolishes time and space. The influence of the senses has, in most men, overpowered the mind to that degree that the walls of time and space have come to look solid, real, and insurmountable. And to speak with levity of these limits is, in the world, a sign of insanity.

Yet time and space are but inverse measures of the force of the soul. A man is capable of abolishing them both. You could say, now when he uses inverse measures, you could say, I said that somewhere also, the vastness of space that you see when you look out at night into this clear sky.

And that was when I was a child, even before... No, about the same time when I had mentioned previously, I would often go out into nature to reconnect with being when I was a child. And one other thing I did that helped me when I was a child, and that didn't happen until I went to live in Spain at the age of 13 and a half, where often the sky is clear, especially in the summer.

And so we lived on the top floor with a... I would climb up onto the roof of the building at night and lie in a deck chair and just look at the vastness of the night sky. And I didn't realize at that time that my mind actually became still.

I was just in a state of awe, and I didn't realize at the time I didn't even know anything about meditation. I didn't know I was in a state of meditative stillness. And there was a sense of awe and of feeling speechless.

And what made me speechless was not the... Well, it was wonderful to see all the thousands of points of light that we call stars or suns, but more than that, the vastness of the space itself. I already knew a little bit.

I was interested in astronomy, and I started reading, and I knew a little bit about the vast distances involved there and the vastness of space, of what a light year is. And it was so inconceivable and totally beyond anything the mind could understand. Even the greatest scientists cannot understand the limitless space.

So I sometimes ask myself, well, what is beyond space? And if it's limitless, it's inconceivable. There's a vastness there that is totally ungraspable and inconceivable.

And that, I believe, what he's pointing at, Emerson, here, is what you see as the vastness of space is the externalized vastness of your own being, of being itself. You see it spreading, spread out there. It contains all things.

It's the externalized vastness of consciousness itself, and it appears to us as space. Now, space, of course, is nothing, really. It just enables everything to be, but in itself, it is no thing.

It is nothing. So, and time equally, the vast stretches of time, inconceivable. And does time have an end?

Does time have a beginning? And here, too, what we perceive as endless vast time is the externalization of the timeless within. And that gets stretched out when we go into the sense-perceived world.

It gets stretched out like, it becomes skimmed milk. The cream is within you, and then the universe is the skimmed milk, diluted. So that also can put you in touch with yourself.

Just look into contemplation of space. It doesn't have, it could be the space of the night sky. It could even be the space of, in a room.

If you go into an ancient church or cathedral, it's particularly beautiful to have, to be, if you become aware of, but any room will do it, become aware of, okay, what's the essence of this room? There's the floor, the ceiling, the walls, the chairs, the furniture in it, the people. Okay, but is there more to it?

Yes, of course, there's more to it. What really matters about this room is the space. Without the space, there wouldn't be a room.

And there's usually, people would not be aware of the space, they would be aware only of what's in the space, the furniture, the walls, the people, whatever it is. And so, if you can become aware, not only of what's in the space and what circumscribes the space, but the space itself, the awareness of space creates in you the awareness of the formless within you. Because only the moment you become aware of space around you, and I can't tell you how, you just have to do it, because there's nothing to grasp, there's nothing to be aware of.

So, the mind asks, how can I be aware of space if there's nothing there to be aware of? And that's precisely it. What is left when you're aware of something where there's nothing?

What's left is awareness itself. That's why being aware of space is such a powerful thing, because what we really become aware of then is awareness, nothing, no content. And so, it's a beautiful meditation, wherever you go, you can do it.

There's even a line in the Tao Te Ching which speaks of what, I don't, I can't remember literally, that it says, there's a bowl and the essence of the vessel or the bowl is the emptiness inside the space. And so, to make it a bowl, there's the two aspects, and these are the two aspects to every life form, form and formless. Form and the essence, the formless.

And so, if you can be aware that that applies to you also, just like the bowl or like the room, in yourself also there is content, there's furniture inside you, thoughts. Some people have a lot of furniture inside. Room is just crammed full with furniture, one thought after another.

And so, but there must be some space there, because the furniture somehow has to get in there, so space is there. You just have to know it's there. There is space inside you already.

You don't have to produce it or achieve it somehow, just realize it's already there, because otherwise nothing could be there in your mind. The mind itself in essence is space, which is consciousness. So, most people are so seduced by the furniture, so seduced by all these fascinating bits of furniture or furniture they complain about, they don't want, but it's there, and so that they're never aware of the space around the furniture inside themselves.

What a limitation, which means all you're stuck with is your life situation, your limited life, which consists of content, content, the content of your life. And no matter what you do with the content of your life, it's never satisfying. On the level of content alone, you will always come to a point of frustration, because you never, no matter how you rearrange the furniture, I'm using of course, as you know, furniture as a metaphor for everything in your mind, no matter how you arrange the furniture, or even if you throw some bits out and take other bits in, you always find it's not quite it, it's not, you always very quickly come to a point of dissatisfaction, because the transcendent dimension is missing from your life.

And what is the transcendent dimension? The formless space, not realize that that is the essence of who you actually are. And so people go through life frustrated, complaining that the world isn't doing what it should be doing to make them happy, not realizing the world cannot make you happy, it's not in the, it's not in its power, because the world is the world of form.

It can challenge you so that you go deeper and finally find the formless, that's what it's there for really. And of course, the world is good at that. It always does that.

And once you know that, then every challenge you can actually welcome. And every loss, you can actually, even though you might weep, you can still welcome it. Because you can see how precious loss also is, because what is loss in whatever form?

Loss is, some form has been removed from your life and has left behind an empty space. And that happens when somebody close to you dies. Suddenly, there's an empty space.

And that is, from the point of view of form, is very painful. And of course, you will cry, you will weep, because there is the reality of form, but there's also the deeper reality of the formless. And if you can be with both, then in the presence of death, although you may weep, there will be a deep peace that you sense, because the formless shines through the space that's left behind.

And that's the sacred, the divine, God, whatever you want to call it. It shines through. Wherever there's loss, there's grace.

The grace is, something has opened up. And that's the essence, that is the essence of the form that passed away also. And that is the indestructible, that is the deathless, as it's in Buddhism, the closest Buddhism ever gets to talking about God is death, the deathless realm, Amaravati, the deathless.

That's how wonderful to see. And then, balance comes into your life. The dance between form and formlessness.

The dance between the world and spirit, if you want to call it that. I don't use it very often. It's too many associations there.

And then, the beautiful thing is, the world is no longer a frustrating place. When you realize that the world was actually meant to be frustrating, it's no longer frustrating, then you recognize whatever challenge comes, you say, oh, okay. Either you resist, or you go deeper.

That's always the choice. There's a beautiful line in a book, I believe it's called The Road Less Travelled. And it has the best first sentence, or first two sentences of any book.

That's why I never read the whole book. It says more or less this, life is difficult, and when you know that and accept that, it's no longer difficult. It's so simple.

Once you know, you don't expect something that the world cannot give you, happiness, fulfillment, peace. And once you realize you don't need the world to give you that, because that is already, that emanates from the formless dimension within yourself. Then, ironically, maybe the universe has a sense of humor or irony.

Then, ironically, the world and the things of the world are actually quite nice. They're quite satisfying, and you appreciate them. It's not that you deny.

I don't believe that those ancient practices that almost aggressively deny the reality of form are that helpful. I don't think you can get to the, find the formless within by fighting or aggressively denying the world of form. The world of form is also an expression, it's all an expression of the one.

And so, the world then becomes a much, a place where you can appreciate whatever form is around you arises, no matter whether it's large or small. Mostly it's small, because mostly your life consists of small things. There's a flower, there's the shopping to do, there's go from here to there, get into the car, take one step at a time.

It's all small, really, and you can appreciate the preciousness of all the things in your life. And it's suddenly, what before was frustrating, now is actually quite pleasant. Why has it become pleasant?

You no longer demand from the world, which includes places you go to, which includes people you meet or have relationships with, which includes situations in your life that arise, which includes achievements, successes or failures, whatever. You don't, you don't demand that they should give you what they can't. And you can let them be, you can honour them, but you never, you're not again going to a situation or a place and say, I demand that you fulfil me, or go into a relationship and say, I demand that you make me happy.

Or whatever condition you encounter, some success and expect ultimate fulfilment through it. No, briefly, yes, and then things happen. So with this comes then the freedom, freedom from, you could call it freedom from the world.

It doesn't mean you disengage from the world, but your attachment to things lessens and then goes. There is appreciation, there is honouring the beauty of life, the beauty of even the smallest things, yes, but without the attachment to that, you don't need that anymore. And you can let go when it's time to let go.

This always comes, wherever you go and whatever you do, at some point it's time to let go. And to the, as long as there's attachment, it's a painful thing when life says, okay, let go now. Oh, no, I can't.

It's part of who I am. And that's painful. And then life may even tear it out of your hands.

It's even more painful, but it could be so simple. You could say, there you go. And then some other form appears.

Oh, that's nice. And you know full well there's nothing that is yours ultimately. The whole thing that you can possess something is, of course, an illusion.

You only, for a little while, it comes into, you look after it and then you hand it on. You look after it, pass it on. Let's see what freedom, and then you appreciate the beauty of all things.

And you see beauty where before you didn't see beauty, also in the smallest things. And you don't have to take acid for that. But, of course, the truth is everything around you is intensely alive and beautiful.

It's only the judgmental mind that creates the screen, a barrier of conceptualization between yourself and the aliveness of the world. But the essential aliveness is within, in the formless. So don't look for the aliveness in there.

Nature can hint at it, can give you, connect you with the own aliveness. Yes. The essence of all life is within.

The action of the soul or consciousness is oftener in that which is felt and left unsaid than in that which is said in any conversation. It's not in the words, it's in the spaces. It broods over every society and they unconsciously seek for it in each other.

You unconsciously seek the formless in the other. We know better than we do. We do not yet possess ourselves and we know at the same time that we are much more.

I feel the same truth how often in my trivial conversation with my neighbors that somewhat higher in each of us overlooks this byplay and jove nods to jove from behind. Each of us. God nods to God from behind each of us.

You're engaged in superficial conversation but there's something in the background that far transcends anything in the world of form, which includes words and thoughts. And if you can sense that in yourself, then you can also sense it in the other. And if you sense that in the other, all relationships become holy relationships, as the Course in Miracles would put it.

And you recognize the holy in every relationship, even if it's a brief one. And there is something in you that knows and recognizes the truth. We know truth when we see it.

Let skeptic and scoffer say what they choose. Foolish people ask you when you have spoken what they do not wish to hear. How do you know it is truth and not an error of your own?

We know truth when we see it, as opposed to opinion, as we know when we are awake that we are awake. Do you know that you are awake? Yes, you must be.

So this is direct realization. So if you know that you are awake, that means what is it that you really know? You know that you're awake, you can subtract anything that appears in your consciousness at this moment, any form, and you could then be left with just the state of being awake.

And there's the formless. One more sentence. Under all this running sea of circumstance, whose waters ebb and flow with perfect balance, lies the aboriginal abyss of real being.

Circumstances, situations, world of form, comings, goings, underneath it all, the timeless, formless. Become familiar with the state of not needing to continuously interpret and judge what is happening to you or around you. You don't need that.

You actually become more intelligent when you don't continuously and compulsively interpret what's happening or what's in front of you, what you're perceiving. That's an old habit going back thousands and thousands of years. And the habit says, no, I have to interpret.

I become stupid if I don't. I won't know what's going on anymore if I can't judge this person that I'm meeting or I can have some kind of opinion or I like or dislike this situation or this, I want this, I don't want this, should be happening, that shouldn't. All the stuff that the mind produces continuously that detracts from the simplicity and power of the present moment, that the mind puts out the screen of conceptualization.

And so in living without the compulsive screen of conceptualization is the great liberation. And so you invite into your life the spaces, the one space really, but spaces of not knowing, not needing to know, not just being present with what is, just giving attention to what is at this moment. Which implies, of course, accepting the is-ness of whatever this moment brings, whatever form arises in this moment.

Can you say yes to what arises in whatever form? Because you should say yes because otherwise you suffer. Because what is already is.

So if you argue internally with what is, you really make the universe into an enemy. I don't want this, but there it is right in front of you. You say, okay, this is what is.

You become the space for it. And that's a very quick way of accessing the space consciousness in you, by simply bringing an acceptance into the present moment in whatever form it comes. Where before there was an irritation, where before there was a complaint, where before there was an angry reaction, there's now saying, oh, okay, that's what is.

You open your arms and say, yes to now. Present moment is my friend. I've had the enemy, present moment has been my enemy for long enough.

I'm now making friends with the present moment. Why? Because it's all I have.

There's nothing else ever. Why not make friends with the present moment in whatever form it appears? And the secret then, of course, the miracle is if you make friends with the present moment, no matter in what form it appears, then the formless opens up within you because you become who you already were, space for it.

You are the space for that. That's all. So the primordial spiritual practice, or if you want a mantra, can I be the space for this?

You can ask yourself the question when situations arise that before you might have complained about, been irritated about, whatever the reaction would have been, can I be the space for this? And usually, or I would say always, you will find, yes, I can be this. You just forgot that you can be the space for it.

You forgot that you are the space for whatever arises in your life because you are the now, you are the consciousness in which it arises. So you become who you already are. Can I be the space for this?

With that is the end of all irritation or angry reactions or complaining, inner no, don't want this, want something else. Yeah, but this is what you have now. And it doesn't mean that you get stuck with what is.

The amazing thing is you move on much more quickly when you bring a yes to the present moment. Then life moves on. You've passed the test.

If you bring no to the present moment, it means you haven't passed. Okay, you get stuck. It's all expressed beautifully in the film Groundhog Day.

You can live in resistance. You can try whatever you will. As long as you are stuck in your negativity, you have to do it the lesson again.

You wake up the same day. This protagonist wakes up in the same day every day until finally an inner shift happens and he begins to say yes to the present moment. And then suddenly all the unpleasantness of this day that he has to repeat again and again, all the unpleasantness of that day becomes actually quite pleasant.

He's beginning to help people because he says yes to situations. So he becomes a helpful, beneficial presence in that day. And suddenly everybody loves him in that town.

And finally he becomes so accepting, whereas before he dissed, he hated where he was and he hated his work. Many people live like that, hating everything, complaining continuously, nothing and nobody's ever good enough. And then suddenly the shift happens and finally he's in the same place and he says to his girlfriend, oh let's stay here, it's quite nice.

And then suddenly he's free and he's no longer forced to repeat the same day. Deep spiritual lesson in there and that's how it is. So it's the egoic mind tells you if you accept what is, you'll be stuck.

This is not the case. Acceptance is the beginning for powerful action if action is required. And non-acceptance, the action that you take on the basis of non-acceptance is never powerful.

It always is tainted with negativity and you could say I call it karmic action. It produces more unhappiness, more karma. So a very quick way then of accessing the space consciousness within, the formless, is not resisting the form that the present moment takes in your life internally.

Wow, huge shift. When you can try it in this evening, there may be little things happening on your way home. Wow, non-resistance, greatest power there is.

Welcome. It's time today to look at another book. This has become traditional.

From time to time I choose a book that I look at with you, books that are dear to me. And usually these books are part of the arising consciousness, what somebody once called the perennial philosophy, the arising awareness in the collective consciousness that started a long time ago. And sometimes for long periods of time became obscured, covered up and then arose again.

So there's a thread running through as almost as far as we can look back in the history of humanity. There's already an arising awareness which never reached the majority of the population, probably only always reached a few individual people. But it's been there.

I sometimes call them early flowers. In the same way I talk about it in a new earth. Before the first flower opened on the planet, there was already vegetation.

Had been there for millions of years and only then at some moment the first flower appeared. And probably didn't survive for very long and it perhaps took a long time before another one came and then gradually a few more and then perhaps conditions again became hostile to the flowering and then disappeared again for a while and then more came. Of course, there's a greater flowering now of consciousness than at other times.

But when we look back at the early flowers or flowerings, we see that what they show us still applies today and the patterns they talk about that have discovered in the human mind that prevent us from flowering, from being more conscious, those patterns still operate in all those humans even to this day. All humans who are not yet going through the awakening process. The patterns what the Buddha talked about, how suffering arises if one lives in disconnectedness with the deeper source and the patterns in the mind that create suffering and Jesus talked about it, how we create our suffering, how we are always in tomorrow but never today.

And all these things still apply so we can learn a lot by looking back at the early teachers and see that it still applies to a large part of humanity. So some of the people I choose are a little obscure perhaps. In other words, very few of you may have read them or even heard of them and this applies probably to today's book.

The book I've chosen for today is by a Greek philosopher called Plutarch. Probably in Latin, in Greek the name is Plutarchos and his Latin name is Plutarchus. Plutarch was born in the year 46 and he died in 120.

So whether he ever heard of Christianity, I don't know. Probably not. When he was born in 46, the first gospels that tell us of the life and teachings of Jesus weren't even written.

And this particular book is a collection or a selection of his essays. He was famous for writing essays. This is the Penguin Classic Edition, a selection of Plutarch's essays.

If you look up Plutarch in the dictionary, it will tell you or the encyclopedia, it'll tell you that he's most famous for his collection of biographies of famous Greek and Romans, Greeks and Romans called the Lives or the Parallel Lives. And that's good, but I find his essays more interesting. It's amazing when writings survive over such a long period of time.

It's a miracle that almost 2,000 year old writings have come to us through a time period where for several centuries almost nobody could read and write anymore after the collapse of the Roman Empire and the arising of what is sometimes called the Dark Ages. Almost nobody except some monks in monasteries were able to read and write. And so somehow these manuscripts survived.

People must have seen, appreciated their value and kept them safe and copied them again and again. And then the next generation again, some of those people saw their value, copied them and copied them and kept them safe and miraculously they survived. It's often the case that what's truly valuable does survive because somehow there is something, there's a faculty in humans in that even those humans who are not really awake yet, some of them can still recognize that there is a truth there that is very important.

And so they might not have been able to practice what these teachers talk about, but they saw the value and then they copied it. Oh, this sounds so good without being able to live it. Plutarch was Greek, but he lived much later than Socrates and Plato.

They lived 500 years or so before him. At the time he lived when the Roman Empire was already occupying the whole Mediterranean area and beyond. So he was born in Greece, but he also became famous in Rome and he lived in Rome for part of the time and was highly regarded as a writer and teacher.

And in Greece, his homeland, he also became a high priest at the most important spiritual site in ancient Greece at Delphi. He became a high priest at the Oracle of Delphi. Now this may look like a little book, but it's actually 400 pages of very small print.

So there's a lot here and I've chosen just one of the essays for us to look at and look at the important points, what we can still learn from him. And the essay I've chosen is called On Contentment. That's the translation from the Greek.

So it's traditionally called in English On Contentment. That is already questioned by some people whether that is a correct translation of the original. The original words that he uses as a title for this essay is euthymia, which means good spirits or cheerfulness.

It describes that state of consciousness that is, one could even say happiness, but happiness sounds a little bit too superficial. So there is good spirits, cheerfulness. Seneca, the famous Roman writer, translated some of his essays and this is one of the essays that he translated.

And he called it Tranquillitas Animae, which means something like tranquility of the spirit or tranquility of the soul. But he added a subtitle when Seneca translated it and the subtitle reads, how the mind may always pursue a uniform and unimpeded course at peace with itself, viewing its circumstances with a light heart and a joy that is unbroken so that it stays steady and calm, never raised or depressed. That's a long subtitle.

So he has already described the essence of this essay. It's about one's state of consciousness. It's about the state of inner peace.

It's about looking at what it is in humans, what it is in the human mind that tends to and habitually does obstruct the state of inner peace. He also points out somewhere there is an innate state of joyfulness in every human. And in most humans, that innate state of joy, of aliveness, of peace, but not a dead peace, but an intensely alive peace, that state is in many humans is covered up by unconscious mind activity, dysfunctional thinking.

And so humans are out of touch with that innate state, which is that really everybody's birthright, but they are out of touch with that. And we need to discover the reasons why they are out of touch. What is it that blocks that in humans?

It's not enough to say there is in you the kingdom of heaven. Of course, Jesus used that term, which is an inner state of being. It's wonderful to point to it, but it's, and occasionally it's the kingdom of heaven response when you hear that there is in you that deep peace that's always there.

And sometimes it happens that when it's pointed out, something goes within and says, yeah, I can feel that now. And that's wonderful. But it's equally if not more important to see, well, you can feel it now.

But what happens when in a minute from now, when something happens, the slightest thing goes wrong, and it's gone again, or some thought comes into your head, and you don't feel it anymore. So it's as important, if not more important to become aware what it is in us that blocks that. And this is so, that is a tradition of a teaching that points that out.

The Buddha belongs to that tradition also. He summarizes that which blocks that in us with the word desire. But there's many implications there.

When the Buddha talks about desire as the greatest obstacle, we would have to closely look at that. Perhaps on some other occasion, we'll be talking about the teaching of Buddha. So this essay is about that, what is called contentment.

Here really is the state of inner peace, alive peace. And mainly he teaches us to look at how this becomes obstructed. Once we know how the certain structures that are inherited in our minds, collective mind structures, once we recognize them when they happen in us, then that's the first step towards freedom.

If we don't know what the habitual patterns in the human mind are that block this awareness, then every time they arise, we get taken over by them. We haven't recognized them. Once we know how to recognize them, we already have one foot out of the unconsciousness.

We're already out. And the element of choice begins to be there, of not being drawn into that. There's another term that is used by ancient philosophers that expresses the same truths that I've just talked about in a negative way.

And that term is ataraxia in Greek, which is lack of mental disturbance or turmoil. So it doesn't say joy or inner peace, it explains it in negative terms. It says lack of turmoil or disturbance inside.

So many Greek philosophers, ancient philosophers talked about that. Now let's go to the essay itself. He talks at the beginning about what he calls there is an emotional or irrational part of the mind that always races away from what is actually here.

So that what he calls the emotional or irrational part of the mind is the unconscious mind. And he recognized that it has a tendency of always taking you away from what is right here, from the present moment. So that's his first insight, which of course is still very much the case.

Now he looks at what are the conditions necessary for inner peace or contentment. I'll read the first little bit to you. Whoever it was who said that contentment is impossible for anyone who busies himself with personal or public affairs makes contentment in the first place an expensive commodity if its price is inactivity.

So inactivity, he says, does not lead to contentment. In fact, it often leads to the opposite of contentment. So it's an illusion for people to believe that if I seek a life of withdrawal, I will be content and happy.

He gives an example from the Odyssey in Homer where one of the characters spent 20 years by himself away from civilization with an old woman to look after him who served his food and drink. And although he shunned his country, home and kingdom, nevertheless, his inactivity and boredom had distress as a constant close companion. Even absolute inactivity is likely to induce discontent in many cases.

And he says that people who seek fame and status should go along with this aspect of their nature and engage in politics and public life because they are inherently more likely to be thrown off balance and to be harmed by inactivity. So whatever it is that you feel drawn to, go there. Don't believe that by withdrawing from life or from getting engaged in life, you're going to find the true inner peace, which of course is spiritual awakening.

Undoubtedly, to occasionally withdraw into solitude can be a very helpful thing for anybody and a wonderful thing to occasionally withdraw. But to see that as a goal, as some people do, that if I didn't have my busy life and all the things that I have to deal with, then I could really grow spiritually. If I didn't have all the problems that I have, then I could really put all my effort into a spiritual awakening.

And that is a delusion. You start with spiritual awakening with where you are right now and consider your present circumstances as the ideal starting point and training ground for awareness of our presence. Instead of thinking, I need to get away from start here, then they may shift and change.

It doesn't mean you get stuck. If you resist your present circumstances, you get stuck. Showed wonderfully in the movie, if anybody is left on the planet who hasn't seen it, Groundhog Day, one of my favorite movies, which shows a man who is forced to repeat the same day again and again.

Every morning he wakes up, he wakes up into the same day. And it doesn't change until something within him changes. But so that expresses a very important universal truth.

There are people, he says, who think that freedom from distress resides in one way of life in particular. For instance, farming or being a bachelor or kingship, being a king or very VIP. And he called somebody who said, Menander, another philosopher, said, I used to think that rich people, because they have no debts, don't sigh at night.

I used to think that rich people, because they have no debts, don't sigh at night. Of course they do. Or toss and turn or moan, poor me.

I used to think they slept a pleasant, peaceful sleep. And this philosopher, he quotes, he then goes on to explain that in his experience, even the rich suffer exactly as the poor do. And then says, he asks himself, is grief related in some way to life?

Is grief inescapable? If you are alive, ask that question. But of course, the very reason why he writes this is, it is not inescapable.

Is grief related in some way to life? It consorts with a life of luxury, is inseparable from a life of fame, grows old with a life of poverty. Grief, grief, grief.

So if you exchange one way of life for another, it does not eradicate from the mind the factors which make it distressed and disturbed. And one of the main factors that make the mind distressed and disturbed is, it does not know how to make proper use of one's present circumstances. How to make proper use of one's present circumstances.

That's why I just said, you start with where you are now. And that's the spiritual practice is to be applied to your present circumstances. And it's extremely helpful to regard your present circumstances as ideal for your spiritual practice.

It doesn't mean you cannot take action to change them. It's being aligned with the is-ness of your present circumstances. Action can be taken on the basis of the alignment with the is-ness, on the basis of the acceptance of what is.

There's a peace suddenly, and then action can be taken if action is possible or desirable, necessary. So not being able how to use one's present circumstances is a very common thing, was then and is now. These are the storm winds that vex, both rich and poor, trouble both married and single.

They make men shun public life and then find a quiet life intolerable. They make men pursue promotion at court, imperial court, and be miserable as soon as they get it. He says it's like some people who fall ill and become very irritable when they are ill.

That's their inner state. And whatever they experience from that inner state, that's how they experience reality. So an example, their wives irritate them because they're ill and their wives irritate them.

They complain about their doctors, grumble about their beds. And for a friend to come is a nuisance, and for him to leave is an offense. So he describes a state of mind that underlies one's perception of reality that is dysfunctional.

And he gives the example of somebody who is ill, but he extrapolates from there and says it is normal for humans to have a similarly dysfunctional state of consciousness through which they then experience their daily life. And to continue the analogy of the sick person who is irritated, says when that person then becomes healthy, suddenly he's happy with everything and everybody is fine again. So something has shifted inside him, makes everything nice and pleasant.

And so the next step is then to look, what is it in us that needs to change and what needs to arise in us? And he calls it the engendering of rationality within us causes this kind of satisfaction and change of attitude towards any way of life. Now, what he calls the engendering of rationality within us, what he calls rationality is really applying one's intelligence to one's inner life, rather than applying one's intelligence exclusively to dealing with external things and conditions.

And that is an amazing discovery. It was for that time, because humans applied, they focused always on everything external. They never, I mean, even nowadays, a large part of humanity still does that.

They apply their intelligence. It's all outwardly directed, as if all the problems that I have were out there, not realizing that to a large extent, I create the problems that I seem to have out there by my unobserved mind. And the unobserved mind means I have not redirected the focus of my intelligence into my state of mind.

The reflective quality has been missing. Unawareness is the term or unconsciousness. And that's how humans generate their own suffering, not only for themselves, but also for others, whoever is around them will suffer.

So this is what he calls the engendering of rationality within us, intelligence directed, not outward, but within, self-awareness. And of course, he knew very well that the inscription at the, one of the most important inscriptions at the Oracle of Delphi, where he was the high priest, is know thyself. Know thyself has two levels.

One is to know the patterns in oneself. And once you have recognized the mind patterns in yourself, which is level one of knowing yourself, then you can go to a deeper level of knowing yourself, knowing who you are, who or what you are in your essence beyond the person. Now he gives a lovely example from history about somebody who lives in that unconscious way.

And this is Alexander the Great, the great conqueror. Once when Alexander was listening to a philosopher, and the philosopher was lecturing on the existence of an infinite number of worlds. And when Alexander listened to this philosopher lecturing on the existence of an infinite number of worlds, Alexander started to cry.

And his friends asked him what the matter was. And he replied, don't you think tears are called for if there are an infinite number of worlds, and I've not yet gained control of just this one? All this, I still haven't controlled this one.

Oh, terrible. A wonderful example of a dysfunctional state of mind. And then he gives another example of an ancient philosopher, Krates, and says, on the other hand, Krates, with his bag and threadbare cloak, spent his whole life joking and laughing as though he were on holiday.

This philosopher's threadbare cloak was, many philosophers would walk around wearing an ugly threadbare cloak, that was a sign that you were not that interested anymore in external things, but more in the inner. So this Krates walked around with one bag, and it's a little bit perhaps like the Chinese Taoist inspired Buddha with a big belly. And so threadbare would walk around with this old cloak and one bag, and his whole life he spent joking and laughing as though he were on holiday.

He had transcended the dysfunctional mind patterns, that is the implication. And so he juxtaposes Alexander the Great in his dysfunctional mind to this philosopher who had gone beyond that. He didn't need to conquer the world, because he had, one could say, conquered himself.

So then he continues to use that term that he just used, rational intelligence, which is, as I said, intelligence applied within. It is rational intelligence which makes the life one already has both the best one and the most pleasant one. So you become so aligned with the present moment that the life that you have now becomes the best one.

That would be an amazing shift if one could live in that way of inner alignment with what is. It follows, he says, that we should purify our innate well of contentment innate means we are born with it. We should purify our innate well of contentment.

There is in you a well, a spring of contentment. And we should purify it when he says that he means to get rid of the obstacles. We should purify our innate well of contentment and then external things will be in harmony with us too.

There comes a harmony between inner and outer. Whereas many humans live in a state of disharmony between the inner and the outer. It's quite, even nowadays, quite still, quite normal.

Never aligned fully with the present moment, which is life. So it follows that we should purify our innate well of contentment. What a wonderful expression.

And then external things will be in harmony with us too, provided we don't maltreat them and will seem congruent and congenial. There's no point in getting angry with one situation because it is utterly indifferent. The situation is indifferent.

In other words, it is as it is. But success will accrue to anyone who treats the situation he encounters correctly. And he gives a little example that Plato had said something similar.

Plato compared life to a game of dice in which it is not just important to throw something appropriate, but also to make good use of it, however the throw turns out. However the throw of dice turns out, you can make something, you accept that that's what is. A physical illness can make people incapable of enduring either heat or cold.

He says, I don't know if there must be some illness that makes people hard to tolerate either heat or cold. And those who muddle unintelligently through life are like that, in the sense that they get ecstatic at good fortune and depressed at bad fortune. And of course, one goes with the other because the good doesn't last or turns into its opposite.

So you go, oh, which is to say that both good and bad fortune knock them off balance. So you're at the mercy of external conditions. And again, many people still live like that.

Their inner state is at the mercy of external conditions. Intelligent people, intelligent meaning directing intelligence into yourself, intelligent people can invariably find something congruent and useful to themselves from the most forbidding of situations, even the most seemingly unpleasant situations. If you become aligned with it, something good will emerge from that.

Now he gives an example, which is a little bit humorous on this. The chief thing then to practice and pursue is the attitude exemplified by the man. This man, there was a dog that was pestering this man.

And he picked up a stone and he threw the stone at the dog to drive him away. But instead of hitting the dog, the stone hit his stepmother. And the man said, that's not bad either.

He gives a humorous example of something that we can practice not throwing stones at the stepmother. But what that means is it is possible to change opportunities so that they are no longer unwelcome. Diogenes, the philosopher, was exiled.

He was sent into exile, which was at that time always a dreadful fate because you lost your home and you were not allowed to come back. So you became homeless. So he was sent into exile.

And he says, that's not bad either, uses the term again. That's not bad either because he subsequently took up philosophy. So first he became homeless.

And if he hadn't become homeless, he would not have become a philosopher. So that's how something seemingly evil turns into good. Another famous example, he gives Zeno, the philosopher, who was the founder of what later came to be called Stoicism, a philosophy.

He was a wealthy merchant. He had many ships that transported his goods throughout the Mediterranean. And then things happened.

And he began losing money. And then several of his ships were lost at sea. And then he had just one left from his merchant fleet.

And when he was told that this one too was lost, sunk with all its cargo, his last ship, he said, thank you, fortune, for helping to drive me into a threadbare cloak. And you may remember I mentioned earlier, threadbare cloak was the philosopher's garment. So thank you, fortune, for driving me into a threadbare cloak, which means driving me to become a philosopher.

And of course he did. And he became a very famous and influential philosopher. And so this is just an example to show acceptance of a condition that arises always brings about something else that actually is often far greater value than what has been lost.

Usually things are lost on the outer. And there's something that then arises on the inner that is far more valuable than what was lost on the outer. So that's not bad either, is the phrase he repeats.

And he says, why can't the rest of us behave in the same way? Have you failed to capture some public position you were after? You can live in the country minding your own business.

Have you been spurned while courting the affection of someone in authority? You can now live a life free of risk and bother. Is your time again taken up with worldly business and worries?

Well, if that's the case, enjoy, I won't quote it all, just enjoy whatever it is that you're doing, do it fully. And then once you live in acceptance, work becomes pleasant and labor non-laborious. Now the next very common thing that another very common obstacle to living consciously and in alignment with what is and not losing one's state of inner peace and connectedness is other people.

So most people are hurt and provoked not only by the flaws of their enemies, but also by the flaws of their friends and relatives. And he says, in most, you will find in this world as you deal with people, you will find insolence, anger, spite, malice, jealousy, hostility. It then these things not only plague those people who have these weaknesses, but these things also annoy and irritate foolish people.

If you get annoyed and irritated by other humans unconsciousness, he doesn't use that term, of course, that doesn't exist then. But if you get irritated at other people's insolence, anger, spite, malice, jealousy, and hostility, then you are foolish. You're not applying your intelligence because that is the state of most humans.

So if you don't accept that, he mentions that again in a little while, you suffer continuously if you don't accept the unconsciousness of the humans around you. And once you accept it, you will regard them as doing what comes naturally to them, as dogs are when they bark. Dogs bark because that's what they do.

And humans behave because that's when they are unconscious, that's what they do. And so you will stop unwittingly being infected by other people's flaws. When you react, you get infected and you lose consciousness.

And another important thing, he tells us not to become discontented or depressed when you realize that you yourself have flawed and defective character. So you discover these things not only in yourself, in others, but you may discover in yourself also there are these unconscious traits. It's not only other humans who are jealous and hostile and whatever.

You may discover them in yourself, but don't become depressed or discontented. It's enough to discover it because that's the, you're beginning to step out of the unconsciousness. Another very common trait that is unconscious in the, they're all things in the structure of the human mind.

When an unwelcome incident occurs in your life, anything goes wrong, big or small, an unwelcome incident occurs in your life, it is good for contentment not to ignore all the gratifying and nice things that you have, but to use a process of blending to make the better aspect of our lives obscure the glare of the worst ones. Even when something unwelcome happens, there's still large areas of your life that are actually good. One event happens, yes, it may be challenging.

What happens easily is that the unwelcome event, the problem, whatever it is that arises, something that goes wrong in your life, and of course these things happen all the time, they can draw your attention in completely so that this incident takes over your entire life or your entire consciousness. You forget that there's a vast area of your life that is not touched by that. So there's the good still, and that is very true if some, you can verify it for yourself at any moment.

It's like seeing only the one spot in the beautiful carpet, suddenly a dark spot appears there, but that makes up 10% of the carpet or the rug, but it can easily draw your attention in so completely. That's all you see now, and that's all you react to. That's why I often say, take your attention back into the present moment, and you will always find the goodness that is there, not only outside of you, there's the sky, there's you're sitting on a chair, you're breathing, there's the aliveness all around you, there's the aliveness in your inner body that you can feel, and there's your consciousness.

And to be aware of that is, you see things then in a larger context, rather get a distorted view of life. We strain the mind to glimpse the aspects that hurt it, and we force it to occupy itself with thoughts of the things that hurt it. Things that irritate it, by tearing it almost violently away from the better aspects.

And yet the question addressed to the busy body can be transferred to this context and fit in nicely. Why are you so quick to spot someone else's weakness, but overlook your own? That's what Jesus also talked about.

And so we might ask, why, my friend, do you obsessively contemplate your own weakness and constantly clarify and revivify it, but fail to apply your mind to the good things you have? He's full of examples, some of them numerous. Now he gives another example of that state.

You are like the wine seller, a wine merchant, who sells plenty of quality wine. This wine merchant sells plenty of quality wine to other people. Whether this person actually existed or not, we don't know.

He probably did. But for his own meal, he used to taste wines until he found a vinegary one. So he sold the good wines.

But for himself, he tasted until he found really bad wine. And that's the one he would drink with his meal, this wine merchant. And when someone asked one of his servants what his master was doing right now, the servant replied, looking for bad when surrounded by good.

Looking for bad, in this analogy, he's looking for the bad wine. But he's surrounded by the good wine. And so this is an example for how in many humans the mind operates, looking for the bad when surrounded by good.

Does it sound familiar? A long time ago, perhaps your mind operated in that way too. The next statement that comes after this that I just read connects with that.

I actually put this quote on my Facebook two weeks ago. And as a matter of fact, most people do bypass what is good and refreshing in their lives and focus straight on the unpleasant and bad elements. Elements.

Most people bypass what is good and refreshing in their lives and go bad and focus straight on the unpleasant and bad elements. An amazing thing that people do to themselves. Another example, he says it's a bit like when something splits, somebody loses something or something happens.

Many people behave like little children who, when deprived of just one of their many toys, wail and scream and throw all the rest of their toys away. In the same way, if we let fortune distress us just once, then our whining and resentment deprives everything else as well of any benefit to us. Our whining and resentment deprives everything else as well of any benefit to us.

And this leads him now to talk to mention the importance of gratitude. It's not just a new age thing, gratitude. Somebody else discovered it 2000 years ago.

And we must not overlook even things we share with others, but take them into account and be thankful, be thankful that we have life and health and that we walk the earth. Be thankful that we walk the earth. That there's no war right now.

Here there isn't. There's no war, either foreign or civil. But that we may, if we so choose, farm the land and sail the seas without fear.

That the full range of possibilities is open to us from oratory and politics or to a quiet and inactive life. So it's important to appreciate these things and not wait until we don't have them anymore and then appreciate them and regret that we don't have them, but we took everything for granted when we had it. If we do this, then we will not rate and value any of these things highly only once it has been lost while discounting it altogether as long as it is in our keeping.

So, so important to not to have this attitude of taking things for granted, which means not appreciating the good that's in your life. Only like the wine merchant, always looking for the bad. And that is something embedded in the structure of the human mind.

And this is how still to this day, millions of people make themselves miserable in that way. And they don't know they're doing it. They think it's the world and situations and other people that's making them miserable, not realizing it's their mind.

It's the unconscious mind structure. And connected with that, most people think it is their duty to use their minds to explore and their eyes to examine other people's poems, paintings, and statues in precise and minute detail. They look at poems, paintings, statues, yet they forget their own lives, which could provide plenty of areas for pleasurable reflection.

They constantly look outwards and are impressed by other people's fame and fortune, just as adulterers are by other men's wives, but belittle themselves and what they already have. It's always the other looking at what others have. Oh, I don't have that.

Don't compare yourself to others, he says. What one should avoid is lining oneself up against people who are better off, despite the fact that this is a usual practice. Prisoners, for instance, envy those who have been freed.

And those people envy people who have always been free and never were in prison. And those envy those who have a citizen status that was highly regarded. To be a Roman citizen, not everybody had that.

The green card, I suppose. Envy those with citizen status, who in turn, those who have citizen status, envy rich people, who in turn envy province commanders, who in turn envy kings, who, because they almost aspire to making thunder and lightning, the kings, the kings envy the gods. There's always somebody you compare yourself to.

Consequently, since they never attain things which are out of their reach, they are never thankful for the things that are relevant to them. The only possible description of this is self-mortification and self-inflicted punishment as a result of scrambling for reasons to be ungrateful to fortune. Just find reasons why to be ungrateful to life.

Socrates tells a little story that actually probably happened. Socrates once heard one of his acquaintances remarking how expensive Athens was. Things are so expensive, he said.

A bottle of wine, you pay five drachma. For a purple dyed robe, you pay that amount of money. And for a pot of honey, you pay that amount of drachma.

It's terrible. Everything is so expensive, so he said. And Socrates grabbed hold of him and showed him some grain.

And he says, that costs us five pennies here. Essence is cheap. And then he showed him some olives and said, two drachma for these olives.

Essence is cheap. And then he showed him some simple cloaks, not purple dyed cloaks. Says, this costs 10 drachma.

Essence is cheap. Despite all this, we habitually live out of stupidity with our attention on others rather than on ourselves. So since human nature contains plenty of malicious envy and spite, with the result that the degree of pleasure we feel in what is ours is less than the degree of irritation we feel at other people's successes.

So we take less pleasure in what is ours than the amount of irritation we feel at somebody else's success. That's a very unconscious way to live, but still applies to quite a few millions of people. However, when you look more closely, he says, at those people that you admire, which may be rich or famous or whatever that you compare yourself to or resent, then you must also remove and draw aside the florid veil, so to speak, of their reputation and their facade and get inside where you will notice that they contain plenty of unsavory features and plenty of unpleasantness.

If you look behind the facade of those people, the rich, the famous, you will find lots of unpleasantness. Plenty of troubles accompany wealth, fame, and kingship, but most people fail to notice them under the showy veneer, the glossy surface that you see. Now he quotes something from Homer, the Odyssey, where somebody is told, son of Atreus, you are fortunate.

Your birth was favored by fate and your destiny is to prosper. And that kind of praise is given, he says, for weaponry, horses, and an extensive army, lots of external possessions. But from within come the contradictory emotional cries bearing witness against this hollow fame.

The same man who was told he was so fortunate said, I envy you, he said to an old man. I envy anyone whose life is at an end if he has kept himself safe by avoiding recognition and fame. He uses the term self-love, which really is a word for ego.

And another example of that, it's all really, whatever he's talking about is aspects of ego. The self-love which makes people ambitious and competitive, whatever the situation, and makes them greedily take on everything. They not only expect to be rich, erudite, strong, outgoing, pleasant, and intimate with kings and leaders of nations, but they are discontented if their dogs, horses, quails, and cocks, which were used in sport, are not the best at what they do.

Dionysus, the ruler, was not satisfied with being the most important tyrant of his time, but because his verse, he taught poetry, was worse than that of a famous poet, and he failed to do better than Plato at philosophical discussion, he got furiously angry. He imprisoned the poet in the quarries and sent Plato to be sold into slavery because they were better at something than he was. So he says to, not everything is for everyone.

One should follow the Delphic inscription and know oneself, and then engage in the single activity for which one is naturally suited, and one should avoid forcibly and unnaturally compelling oneself to envy alternative ways of life, to envy other people's ways of life. So the jars of good and bad do not sit on the threshold of Zeus, the god, but lie in our minds. Foolish people overlook and ignore good things even when they are present, because their thoughts are always straining towards the future.

Yes, their thoughts are always straining towards the future. This is one of the, I so often point it out. We all know it, everybody has experienced it within him or herself, but many of us are now going beyond that pattern.

Now comes another important point that people tend to ignore, that he mentions, and that is the, it is impossible to eradicate and exclude the gloomy aspects from your life altogether, because the world is fitted together by interchange between opposites, light and dark. And there's nothing in human life that only has one side. There's always the other side in external existence.

So to expect not to experience the other side is unrealistic and leads to suffering. There are polarities in this life, and often you can observe you gain something here, but by having gained this here, you lose something there. From my own life, I used to, for years, I did workshops with people, spiritual workshops and talks, 10 people coming together for a weekend, sometimes 15, and I've done workshops with two or three.

One workshop I did, one person turned up. The organizer forgot to advertise it properly, and so I came, I arrived on a Saturday morning, and there was a lineup at the door of one person, and I did it, and there was a lot of interaction, of course, with the people, especially with the one, but even with 10, there was this wonderful connectedness, and I was always available to, even people would come, they could call me up anytime, and I would help them. At some point then, of course, I was only very small scale, not reaching that many people.

Go forward a few more years, and suddenly you have 2,000 people coming to a talk. I get ushered in and out by people. If I linger, I get swarmed and can't get out of the place for an hour.

There's no longer the connectedness with humans isn't there anymore on that level that I enjoyed so much, and then go forward a bit more, comes Oprah, and then can't even sit in private in a coffee shop anymore because people quite often come up and want something or say something. Sometimes it's very nice, but I always loved privacy, and so to some extent, that's lost, but what is gained is an enormous amount, the teaching reaching huge numbers of people, which is wonderful, but what is gained here is lost there. The personal interaction that was so enjoyable is lost, and anonymity, I loved not being recognized, and for most of my life, nobody paid attention to me.

That was wonderful, and then that changed, so there was a loss of what I loved and valued. It's just recognizing that what you lose here, you gain something here, you lose something, there are polarities in life. If you're extremely strong physically, then perhaps your intellectual faculties may not be so highly developed, or if your intellectual faculties are highly developed, you may be a weakling, or as Arnold called somebody, Arnold from California, you're a puny loser.

You can't have it all. There's always polarities in everybody's life, and so you experience this, and if you then complain that there's something that you don't have, then it's a non-recognition of how life works, if you cannot surrender to the fact that there are polarities in life. Events too contain polarity.

Good and bad are inseparable, but blending is possible to make things fine. In music, there are low notes and high notes, and in grammar, there are vowels and consonants. And musicianship and literacy do not come from disliking and avoiding one or the other extreme, but from knowing how to make use of them all and how to blend them into an appropriate mixture.

Another philosopher, he quotes, says, each of us has two destinies or deities which take us in hand and into their power when we are born. Now comes a poetic expression of that. Earth was there and far-seeing sun, bloody discord and tranquil harmony, beauty and ugliness, speed and slowness, fair truth and dark-locked doubt.

So the potential for this is in everyone. There is the dark and the light, the transcendence is not achieved on the outer level of the polarities. The polarities continue to manifest on the external level.

The transcendence of the polarities, I'm adding a little bit here, the transcendence of the polarities is an inner thing. Within, there is a state of consciousness that is a transcendent state where, and from there, the polarities are allowed to be. You are no longer dependent on them for your state of consciousness.

Anyone with any sense prays for the better things but expects the others as well and copes with both sets by never behaving excessively. Increased enjoyment of wealth, fame, power and status depend on decreased dread of their opposites. If you dread the opposite, you can't enjoy what you have.

So if you have the so-called good now and if you dread the opposite, you might lose it. That will greatly diminish your ability to enjoy what you have now. A strong desire for each of these things, wealth, fame, power, whatever it may be, a strong desire for each of them instills a very strong fear of their departure.

And so it weakens and destabilizes the pleasure as if it were a candle flame in a draft. So the pleasure, there's a candle flame burning but there's a constant draft. Which is the mind fearing the loss that might come.

But there's the possibility of standing up to fortune fearlessly and unflinchingly and say, you are welcome if you bring a gift and no great ordeal if you leave. You welcome the good but you know it's all fleeting, no great thing if it's gone. So if you know that the coming and going, the polarities are always there, nothing in the world of form is permanent, then once you know that, you can actually appreciate what you have or what comes to you knowing at some point it will leave you again.

But if you don't know that it's a world of polarities, then you get attached to that which arises in your life, you attach yourself to it, your sense of who you are begins to depend on it. And then you begin to think, oh, it might, there are all kinds of threats, it may disappear, I may lose it, it may be taken away from me. And of course it will sooner or later because everything is impermanent.

But you cannot then enjoy, so when you identify with it, you are attached to it, the enjoyment is much less because attachment implies fear. You cannot have attachment without the fear of losing it. The very fact that you are attached means your sense of self goes into that, whether it's possessions or status or some function that you have or some role that you play, whatever it is.

The attachment means you seek yourself in it and then there is, even if you are not conscious of it all the time, there's fear underneath of losing it. But there's a possibility of enjoyment without attachment and really that's what he is talking about. And only then is there true enjoyment of things and you no longer fear their loss.

And in this way, you can solely enjoy whatever the present situation is. The next quote, I actually also quote it in the power of now, although at the time I only had it in my head, I didn't remember who said it. So in the power of now, I just said a Greek philosopher said, and this is a famous quote.

And this was an extreme case of acceptance when he was told by a messenger that his son had died, he said, I knew that I had fathered a mortal. I think the way I quoted it in the power of now was, I said, I knew he was not immortal. And I said in the power of now, now we might think this is, inhuman, but we don't know what the state of this man was when he said, I knew he was not immortal or I knew I had fathered a mortal, whether it was somebody who was incapable of experiencing emotion or whether he was somebody who had transcended attachment and gone so deep that he was in touch with that which is beyond death.

And it is quite possible that when he said, I knew he was not immortal, he might have wept at the same time because the loss of the form of his son would have been painful and he would have been at peace deep within at the same time. And so you can weep and say, I knew he was immortal and I know I always have known it. So there is a deeper dimension present and that is really true inner peace that is not disturbed by outer conditions, which does not mean you cannot feel the emotion of sadness that may be there.

These are wave movements, but you're not dragged along in them. You're not totally controlled by that. It's there and there's a transcendence at the same time.

And Plutarch recommends that we should mirror this person and say, for example, I know that the wealth I have is transitory and unstable. I know that the wealth I have is transitory and unstable. Or I know that I owe my position to people who have the power to remove it.

Or I know that although my wife is good, she's a woman and that my friend is human, a member of an inherently inconstant species. They are all humans and you know they might do certain things that are very unexpected. They are a member of an, this is a quote from Plato, he says, they are a member of an inherently inconstant species.

So trust everybody to do what they do. They might be, they maybe suddenly behave unconsciously. It could happen.

They are inconstant, subject to all kinds of mood swings and different states of consciousness. So once you know that, there is a trust without needing somebody to behave consistently in one particular way because they probably won't. It's again, it's all connected with coming to terms with the constant, the play of polarities in life.

And he says, the point is that if anything happens which may be unwelcome but is not unexpected, this kind of preparedness and character leaves no room for, I couldn't have imagined it or this isn't what I had hoped for or I didn't expect this. And so the heart, and so it stops the heart lurching and beating fast and so on and quickly settles derangement and disturbance back onto a foundation. So you're no longer surprised when the polarities manifest in your life.

Now, again, this all connected. Unwelcome events, of course, a part of the how we experience the dark side. To express the matter generally, while some unwelcome events do by their very nature entail distress and pain, there may be some events in your life that actually physically might involve distress and pain or somebody very close to you may die and there will be some distress and pain.

That's inevitable. Nevertheless, where the majority of such events are concerned, unwelcome events, where the majority of such events are concerned, it is our minds that condition and teach us to resent them. In the majority of cases, it is our mental reaction that creates the suffering.

And therefore, when faced with this second, this latter category of unwelcome events, it is useful to remember this philosopher's quote or line, which says, no experience is terrible unless you make it so. He is implicitly asking the question, unless your body or mind are actually affected, what difference does it make to you if, for example, your father was not an aristocrat, your wife is having an affair, you fail to win some prize or you lose your ride to the front seats in the theater. That was ancient Greece, so highly valued front seats in the theater.

For these occurrences do not stop a man being in excellent physical or mental condition. And where the former events are concerned, the ones which do seem by their very nature to cause distress, such as illness, a friend's or child's death, then he recommends us to remember the line of Euripides, who wrote, I say, poor me, but why? I am only experiencing what it is to be human.

I say, poor me, but why? I'm only experiencing what it is to be human. These are things which we cannot avoid.

This necessity, which is due to corporeality, to having a physical body here, a lot of wisdom that still applies nowadays as it did 2,000 years ago. Let's conclude. We are getting to the end of the essay on contentment.

Let's conclude the way he concludes here. A philosopher, Diogenes, was visiting Sparta, the city-state, and he saw his host busily getting ready for a festival day. And he said, isn't it the mark of a good man to regard every day as a festival day?

And Plutarch adds to this, and a particularly glorious festival too if we see things aright. The world is a temple of the highest sacredness, and nowhere could be more suitable for divinity. And man is introduced into this world by means of his birth, not to view manufactured, immobile images, but to gaze upon what Plato describes as the perceptible likeness of intelligible things which divine intelligence has manifested as containers of an inherent principle of life and movement, the sun, moon, and stars, the rivers with their continuous discharge of renewed water, and the earth with its supply of means of nourishment for plants and creatures.

Life is an initiation into these things, and there is no more perfect way to celebrate them. Life, therefore, should be full of contentment and joy, and we should not make the usual mistake of waiting for occasional days like the holidays sacred to Kronos, Zeus, or Athena for the opportunity to enjoy and revivify ourselves by paying mimes and dancers for bored entertainment. And we don't need to confine our sense of aliveness in our joy to those occasions when we pay dancers and mimes for entertainment or celebrate public festivals.

Every day and every moment is an occasion for the celebration of life. That's a wonderful way to end his discourse on how to live sanely or consciously, how to go beyond patterns in the collective mind that go back thousands of years. It was thousands of years, most probably, of the patterns that he describes and other teachers that were just operating totally unconsciously.

Everybody was totally in their grip until a few humans came who started directing their intelligence within. And even now, the majority of humanity still lives in the unconscious way, but more and more humans are awakening. And what we've just been talking about is more than just words, much more than just words.

It's part of the awakening of consciousness on the planet. And it's timeless. It's not really a 2,000-year-old teaching.

Thank you. Welcome. Make sure you are here with your attention rather than in your mind and in your thinking.

Then you'll be somewhere else. A helpful thing is to look at this from the point of view of the present moment. Come out of your mind means come into the present moment.

The present moment is this. The surface of this, your sense perceptions, and the depth of this. And that's the real present moment, the depth.

The depth cannot be defined conceptually. It can be pointed to. That's why I'm using words, but it cannot be understood conceptually.

And your mind will not know what I mean when I say depth. Depth, what does that mean? To the mind, it's just another concept.

But if depth can be a signpost, so rather than look at if this is the signpost, you say, depth, what's that? You have to then let go of the concept and sense, so to speak, inside right now, the depth that makes all the sense perceptions and the experience of this moment possible in you, the space in you, the light in you in which this room appears is seen, is perceived, in which this voice is heard. It appears in there, that has no form, but it makes all this possible.

This may be a dream, but even if it is a dream, there's something that makes this dream possible to be. And that's the essence of who you are. And you sense that within yourself.

And that is, when you do that, another way of putting it, you're then sensing what now actually means. So beyond what appears in the now, which is this room and this voice and the flowers and the light, there's something deeper that cannot be understood or conceptualized. We could say it's consciousness itself.

You are the light of the world, somebody said 2000 years ago. You are the light of the world. Now, that's not the you that has a name and a little history.

There's a deeper essence to you, the consciousness that you are. That's the light of the world. So we become aware of that.

And that's becoming aware of the now. It's one with the now, what we call the now. That's the power of now, is to become aware of that directly.

And that frees you from the temporary person. There's nothing wrong with the person. That you are for a while.

But if that's all there is, then it's very frustrating. Little me with a little history and the end will come soon. So you become still and alert and spacious inside.

Nothing needs to be understood at this moment. There's an intelligence there that doesn't need to understand conceptually, which means cut it up into little bits and pieces. That's conceptual understanding.

Oh, they're not small enough. I need to understand more. And then you get a grinder or whatever.

That's called a PhD. But you never get beyond. You just can cut smaller and smaller segments.

And then you need a big microscope. And of course, the ultimate mystery can never be known that way because it cannot be worked out conceptually. So you become still inside and alert, spacious.

The greatest thing is finding the spaciousness inside yourself. Right now, we don't need to know even who you are anymore. But for you are that light, but you don't need to call it light.

You are that space, but you don't need to call it space. Just be it. Of course, what's in the way of that?

Can that be a continuous realization rather than just when you are in a protected environment like here, nothing is impinging upon your senses. Everything is conducive towards this realization. No phone is ringing.

No computer screens flashing saying, give me attention. But then life, you go back into life. And then is it possible to live this realization as a continuous state of being?

Yes, that's the art. That's why you're here, to bring that into your daily, not just to have little experiences. And then you remember them and say, I had a great experience there five years ago.

And then life happened. So as we are here together in the background, there is that presence in the background of who you are. And that's the essence of this gathering.

And that's why we are here. And even while we look at seemingly other things, they are not other things. At the most, we look at the things that tend to obscure the realization of the depths within yourself.

Things that tend to interfere and take you away, obscure it. That is helpful to know what tends to habitually obscure that realization. Because if you don't know it, you get taken over by it without even knowing it.

And just, it has you. There's no recognition of it. So it's very helpful to recognize how it happens that the depths that you are becomes obscured through misuse of the mind, dysfunctional mind patterns and habitual ways of thinking.

It's also wonderful, of course, to be here and occasionally just experience the stillness in between the words without thinking that it needs to be filled with something. And then you can experience the same experience when you're at home. One of these habit patterns of the mind, dysfunctional habit patterns, is that this moment needs to be filled with something.

Of course, you have to do things, but also see if you can experience the spaciousness of this moment. The civilization tells you, you have to fill every moment with some kind of doing. And then you lose the sense of being.

And when you lose the sense of being, no doing is ever enough to satisfy you, except very briefly. Ah, I got that done. And 10 seconds later, the mind said, oh, okay, now I have to think about, oh, yeah, still, okay, all those things still to do.

Oh, and then I got, oh, I got that done. Throughout history, from time to time, there were individuals who recognized, even a long time ago, they recognized the habitual dysfunction of the human mind and they recognized it as a dysfunction. And they said, there is a way out.

There is a way beyond. They pointed to the nature of the dysfunction and they pointed to the way beyond. A very famous person, of course, is the Buddha, who saw that.

He described the dysfunction. He saw that if you live in the dysfunctional state, you suffer. So normal human existence, he said, is suffering.

But there is a way out of suffering. So that's, Buddha is a famous example of someone who had this recognition. One of the most important moments in the history of humanity, not the battles or the kings or the mad emperors or the politicians, that's not.

One of the most important moments in the history of humanity was the recognition on the part of one human being of what's wrong with humans and what's right with humans. So the Buddha said, I teach suffering and the end of suffering, which means I show you how you create your own suffering. I show you how you can go beyond your own suffering that you create by stopping to create it.

That's the message of the Buddha. And there were others also who had that realization. Jesus had the realization expressed in different terms according to the listener and the culture.

And always a few people here and there had that realization there's a thread running through history and that thread is sometimes called the perennial philosophy. There's a knowing there that surfaces from time to time and then gets buried again and then surfaces again. And a few people get changed by it in history.

But most humans don't understand, except now more humans are beginning to understand than before, not just understand, able to realize the truth of it. And I find it wonderful to discover when I read an ancient book to see, wow, there's already that basic realization there of the dysfunction of the human mind. And this is why in these sessions from time to time, I talk about a book or a teaching that is ancient or well, from some time past.

You may know that I've already spoke briefly about the Tao Te Ching, about the meditations by Marcus Aurelius and about the teachings of Ralph Waldo Emerson in the 19th century. But it's always, it's just looking at the fundamental truth through slightly different lenses. That's all it is.

And when we talk about it here, it's not like a university lecture. I don't want to give you knowledge about history. That's what, you don't need that.

It really, whatever we talk about here is about you. So if we talk about this philosophy that few people have heard of called Epictetus, ha, E-P-I-C-T-E-T-U-S, who lived about 2000 years ago. He was born in the year 55, Greek.

We're not really talking about Epictetus. We're not really talking about, we are talking about, it's always about you. So this, I only discovered this really a couple of years ago in his teachings.

I had a book that I bought a long, long time ago in England in a secondhand bookstore, but I never got into Epictetus in that way. The translation, I think, was not very good. And then I got this book and said, wow, this is wonderful.

It's the, it's a good, it's a wonderful translation too. This is the Penguin Classic, Epictetus. Just something that may be helpful to know about him, because how did he get this realization of the, how did he discover it?

What helped him to discover it? Yes, he had one or two teachers, but his main teacher was his personal circumstances and his personal circumstances were as follows. He was a slave.

He was born into slavery. His mother was already a slave. So he grew up as a slave and for part of his adult life, he was a slave.

His body was also crippled. He described himself as lame. Nobody knows exactly in what way.

And there is one ancient source says that his master, the person who owned him, mistreated him and he caused, he broke his legs or his leg or something. And that may be true. So here we have first two factors.

A person who is not free externally and a person who is not free as far as mobility is concerned. A person who has no status in society. And another factor is that his master, who was quite wealthy, lived in Rome and was always at the court, the imperial court of the infamous emperor Nero.

One of the many completely insane emperors. If you read that, any politician is very sane. He's relative to them.

Even the most insane Western, well, there've been some others, but let's not go there. So he also would often, for some reason, maybe he accompanied his master as a servant. He would actually observe what was happening in court.

He was a nobody, but he observed the most important people in the empire, how they behaved, what they did and what happened to them. Of course, the closer you were in court to the emperor, the more dangerous your life would be, especially if the empress is mad. So his teaching was his condition, which one would say would really probably create an unhappy human being.

If you're a slave, you're crippled, and you have to watch all these wealthy and powerful people. So on the surface, that would be enough reason to justify unhappiness or a low opinion of yourself. And perhaps that was the case initially, but he discovered in himself that the cause of his unhappiness was not the situation.

And here we come to one of the two central points of his teaching. The cause of any upset or unhappiness, he said, is not the situation or the condition, but the thoughts that my mind is creating concerning the situation or the condition. And the moment he realized that, there was no more suffering.

He became free from external condition. And that is the second point of his teaching, the possibility for humans to become free as far as their external, internal state is concerned, to become free of externals. That's his teaching.

The two are connected, of course, that any upset arises from your mind and not from the situation, the suffering, the unhappiness, arises through judgment or situations. And we always look to externals, he says, for our fulfillment, and we never find it. And he points to the possibility of becoming free of that.

And then no matter what the external situation is, inside you have a space of freedom. You are no longer a reactive entity. You are no longer governed by external events.

And that's an incredible freedom. Because if your inner state is always dependent on external events, then you're at the mercy of what happens or fails to happen but should happen. You're at the mercy of what people do and say or should do and say but don't.

You're at the mercy of everything. And so you live in that way. That is unconscious living, dysfunctional living.

And he saw all that through his own condition. So, wonderful thing. Then he became free internally.

And a little later, he was given his freedom externally. And this was not totally uncommon. It happened quite frequently that a slave, after working for 20 or 30 years, the master would say, I'll give you your freedom.

And he did. He became free, and he became a teacher of so-called philosophy, which is very different from what is called philosophy at university these days. This philosophy is intensely vital.

It is teaching you how to live. So he was more a spiritual teacher than a philosopher. But at the time, the word for it was philosopher.

He became a philosopher. And then he moved to Greece, and he set up a school of philosophy, which became quite famous. And people would travel, many Romans would travel to Thetis to learn with him.

And in the end, even when Nero was no longer emperor, the emperor Hadrian actually visited him to pay his respects. The slave become a philosopher. And even the emperor Marcus Aurelius considered him to be one of his teachers.

So his social condition and so on becomes irrelevant there. Marcus Aurelius had certain realizations, perhaps not the deepest possible, but he saw some things very clearly. And he was wealthy and powerful.

And Epictetus saw the same things very clearly. And he had no power and no wealth and wasn't interested. It made no difference.

External conditions then become irrelevant. So he also teaches to use all conditions in your life as something helpful, because you can practice. He compares it to having a sparring partner if you're training for the Olympics or whatever.

Every condition is something you can use. The ability grows in you, the freedom, if you are challenged by a condition, then how do you approach the challenge? With inner resistance, or are you able to accept what is?

There's great power in that. And then you grow internally, so to speak, in consciousness, the light grows. The more challenges you have, the better.

And he said, to quote one sentence, he said, if you look at tragedies, ancient Greek tragedies, they're really based on certain dysfunctional mind patterns, and that creates the tragedy. You can look the same way at any modern movie or novel. People behave in certain dysfunctional ways, and that creates the drama.

So he says, behold the birth of tragedy when idiots come face-to-face with the challenges of life. Idiot means a person who is unconsciously reacting, and then you create your own drama in life, when you come face-to-face with the challenges of life. But even in translation, this is a very good translation in this book, Penguin Classic.

It is powerful, and it is, I'm sure, more or less exactly how he spoke. And that's wonderful. I'll read a few things to you in a minute.

It still has the power to transform. So a little story in connection with that. You may remember, some of you, in 1992, Ross Perot was running as an independent for President of the United States, and he had chosen as his running mate a person called Stockdale.

And Stockdale, of course, Ross Perot didn't become president, so Stockdale didn't become vice president, but he later became the vice admiral in the Navy. What's important about Stockdale is that in Vietnam, he was a fighter pilot, and he was shot down, and he was a prisoner of war for seven years, four years of which he lived in solitary confinement. And he credits his survival to the teachings of Epictetus.

He had apparently a little book with him of the teachings, and he said that was what kept him alive. When he was shot down, the story goes, and he was ejected from the plane, and then he could see the soldiers coming towards him with rifles. He said he whispered to himself, I'm leaving the world of technology, and I'm entering the world of Epictetus.

And the next seven years were his, the application of the teaching. I will now take a few very short passages and read, and then talk about each one. I must warn you, sometimes he can be quite extreme, and you say, oh, no.

It is not events that disturb people, it is their judgment concerning them. Death, for example, is nothing frightening, otherwise it would have frightened Socrates. But the judgment that death is frightening, now that is something to be afraid of.

So when we are frustrated, angry, or unhappy, never hold anyone except ourselves, that is our judgments, accountable. When we are frustrated, angry, or unhappy, never hold anyone except ourselves, that is to say our judgments, accountable. An ignorant person is inclined to blame others for his own misfortune.

To blame oneself is proof of progress, but the wise man never has to blame another or himself. So you look to the root cause of where unhappiness arises, where upset arises, not the situation. It's my judgment about the situation.

A vital teaching. And as you practice that, gradually, you become free of attachment to your mind. You gradually disidentify from what your mind is saying.

And gradually, more spaciousness arises in you as you disidentify from the judgment of your mind by recognizing it as a judgment. So that's the work, you could call it. That's the practice.

And life continuously gives you stuff to practice with. Stuff happens continuously. And of course, if you say, why did I want to have some peace and quiet?

But life doesn't allow you. And if you do get peace and quiet, then that becomes the problem. There's nothing happening anymore.

And now he has a little bit of advice of how to approach things so that you become free of the dependency on externals. In the case of particular things that delight you or benefit you, or to which you have grown attached, remind yourself of what they are. Start with things of little value.

If it is a piece of china that you like, for instance, say, I am fond of a piece of china. Because otherwise the mind says, this is the precious thing from so-and-so that I inherited. It's a piece of china.

Yes, but I bought it at Sotheby's. It's a piece of china. Okay, so then because if you discover attachment, say, oh, I'm fond of a piece of china.

When it breaks, then you won't be as disconcerted. Now, the next step here is where you go. When giving your wife or child a kiss, repeat to yourself, I'm kissing a mortal.

Then you won't be as distraught if they are taken from you. Of course, it's a fact. You are kissing a mortal.

You are kissing a mortal, aren't you? Yes, it's a fact. Of course, the mind says, yeah, but why should I remind myself of that?

Well, it might seem a little extreme to you, but just to have the experience you don't have to say that verbally, but to know at the back of your mind that any human being that you're with or yourself, yes, you are mortals. The end could come at any moment. Of course, it could.

I'm kissing a mortal. And now comes a little bit, some other piece of advice. They're all very closely related, of course.

Whenever planning an action mentally, rehearse what the plan entails. If you're heading out to base, picture to yourself the typical scene at the bathhouse. That's where they used to go to place.

People splashing, pushing, yelling, and pinching your clothes. You will complete the act with more composure if you say at the outset, I want a bath, but at the same time, I want to keep my will aligned with nature. So you know what you want.

That's one aim that you have. Of course, you will go there to have a bath, but that's not all. I also want what he calls, keep my will aligned with nature, means not to fall out of alignment with the present moment and the flow of life internally, not to step out of alignment with that, to keep my will aligned with that.

In other words, let's translate it into our terminology. I'm going there to have a bath, but I'm also going there to stay present. So you have an inner aim and an outer aim.

So what he's really actually saying is, don't have just outer aims, because then you get lost in the outer. As you pursue your outer aims, remind yourself that you have also an inner aim that's even more important than the outer aim. That is to stay present as you engage in action and do things.

So that's extremely useful to remember, because otherwise you go into situations and they don't unfold as they should. The mind says, and you get upset. And upset, by the way, is a form of suffering.

Anger is a form of suffering. Now, the egoic mind doesn't know that. The egoic minds have a right to be angry in this situation, but you're suffering.

Suffering? No, I'm not suffering. Now, if you look into your body, then you will know that you're suffering, because if you look and see what the anger does to the physiology of the body, to your heart, to your breathing, to the circulation of your blood, and so on, you realize that your body is actually suffering from this emotional state.

It is suffering. For the first time, they discovered it when they discovered 200 years ago, whenever it was, somebody was shot in the stomach and the hole just didn't heal. So that was the first person, they could peer into his stomach and see when he got angry, the lining of the stomach became red.

The first time they saw that, whoa. And many other things happen in the body. So it is a form of suffering.

And so, two aims. I'm here to get from A to B, but I'm also here to practice presence, to be present. I'm here to discuss the important business deal, but I'm also here to be present.

The two, you have the inner aim and the outer aim. That's what he is saying. If you forget the inner, you get lost in stuff and it overpowers you and you get overwhelmed and life becomes frustrating.

Lost in externals, as he would say. Externals, all that matters. I want to bathe, but at the same time, I want to keep my will aligned with nature.

Do this with every act. That way, if something occurs to spoil your bath, you will have readied the thought, well, this was not my only intention. I also meant to keep my will in line with nature, which is impossible if I go all to pieces whenever anything bad happens.

If you go all to pieces when something bad happens, of course, you're not aligned with the flow of life. You're not aligned with what is in the present moment. That's the dysfunction.

Wonderful teaching. And it's as relevant now as it was then. Sickness is a problem for the body, not the mind, unless the mind decides that it is a problem.

Lameness too is the body's problem, not the mind's. Of course, he was talking from experience. Say this to yourself, whatever the circumstance, and you will find without fail that the problem pertains to something else, not to you.

In other words, you can be free of problems. Another way of putting it, there is no problem. There only is what is.

And that's your incredible liberation. If you can go through life realizing that there are no problems, there are only situations. If you can live that, then you're a master, living as a master.

There are no problems, only situations. Under no circumstances ever say, I have lost something. Only say, I returned it.

And now another one where you go, oh no. Because it could be misinterpreted as being insensitive. And it has, this has happened historically.

Some people did not fully understand the teaching and they thought it's to do with desensitizing yourself to life and putting up a barrier to life where you go, nothing touches me anymore, like a wall. You sometimes have that with Zen practitioners too. Because it can also, this is certain similarities with his teaching in Zen.

And the way he lived would be very much like a Zen master lives. Just, this is what is. Where's the problem?

Now, some people observe the Zen masters and they kind of, but they can't, they don't live it in the right way, which means they don't surrender to what is. They put up a wall to what is, against what is. And that, this is how this teaching could be misinterpreted and lead to insensitivity.

So this is not becoming insensitive to life or to other human beings. It's to open yourself more to life and other human beings. On the surface, it might look desensitizing yourself.

No, it's opening yourself because it's all to do with acceptance. So there's a huge difference between putting up a wall to life and accepting life. And people who put up an inner wall, it's a misunderstanding.

And of course, behind that wall, they suffer. But of course, they're hiding their suffering behind the wall. I don't suffer.

I'm a Zen practitioner. I have gone beyond. And then the wife says something.

Leave me alone. I'm in control. Don't talk to me.

I'm meditating. I can't deal with it now. Leave me alone.

I need to meditate. I can't meditate. It's acceptance.

So very different. But when you read this, the next thing especially, it could be misinterpreted. There is a deeper, there is a compassion there.

So don't misinterpret. Under no circumstances ever say, I have lost something, only I returned it. Did a child of yours die?

No, it was returned. Your wife died? No, she was returned.

My land was confiscated? No, it too was returned. And then somebody says, but the person who took it was a thief.

And he says, why concern yourself with the means by which the original giver effects its return? As long as he entrusts it to you, look after it as something yours to enjoy only for a time. The way a traveler regards a hotel.

Whatever it is, if it's there, enjoy it, knowing that, of course, it will leave you or you have to let go or it'll decay, whatever. Enjoy, no attachment. And this is real, that where true enjoyment becomes possible only then, because if you're attached, you're not really enjoying the thing.

You make it into a means of something else. Make me happy or make me bigger. I own this.

It makes me feel bigger. You're not really enjoying it. Whenever you see someone in tears, distraught because they are parted from a child or have met with some material loss, be careful lest the impression move you to believe that their circumstances are truly bad.

Have ready the reflection that they are not upset by what happened, but by their own view of the matter. Nevertheless, you should not disdain to sympathize with them, at least with comforting words or even to the extent of sharing outwardly in their grief, but do not commiserate with your whole heart and soul. It's interesting.

Do not commiserate, which means do not enter their unhappiness. Compassion, I wrote something like similar in the power of now that compassion has two aspects to it. One, you can feel their pain.

This is empathy. You feel the other person's suffering because you have had your suffering. It's probably if you have never suffered, compassion would be difficult.

But if you have suffered, you can feel the other person's suffering also. But for true compassion to arise, true compassion has a deeper aspect to it. In addition to that, there's a depth, and that is the depth that today we started with, the depths within yourself.

If you can feel that depth and there's peace in there, there is a space that is not touched by suffering in you. So in the background, so to speak, there can be that peace. You're connected with that deeper, the depths within yourself.

Even as you empathize and feel the suffering of the other person. So you have the two dimensions. Yes, I feel your suffering, but at the same time, there's a deep peace underlying that.

And then compassion is something that's actually very helpful to the other person. If you only commiserate, as he puts it, if you only commiserate with the other person, you're entering their frame of reference. You're entering their suffering.

There's no help in that, really, to the other person. The help comes if you stay rooted in the eternal within, and then you connect with the other person. That's really what he is saying.

So there's a peace in the background, even as you empathize with the other. And that's healing in the deepest sense. That is where healing flows from the depths of who you are to the other.

And that's where it sometimes happens that the other person suddenly also becomes peaceful, doesn't know why. So it doesn't work through verbalization. You can't say, well, you should have known that your husband or wife was mortal, shouldn't you?

No, that doesn't work. It comes from the depths of who you are. That's the eternal.

You don't need to talk about that. And that's also in any situation where you empathize with others, whatever their problems. It might not be a physical problem.

It could be that they are in a huge personal drama and they want to talk to you about their drama. Are you completely entering their reality? And then, of course, you get depleted after a while.

Some people love that. They say, this is what happened. Listen to me.

Listen. And they almost suck your energy in. And the energy, they need that energy to feed their drama.

So if you enter it, after an hour of listening or trying to figure out some solution, well, why don't you do that? And he said, no, I can't do that. Yeah, but all you could do, no, I've tried all that.

That doesn't work. Of course, they don't want an end to their drama. They are identified with that whole mind movement.

So that doesn't help, except an hour later, you feel, I'm trying to be compassionate and helping. It doesn't work. No, you don't enter their reality completely.

You recognize that as a construct, an artificial construct created by their mind. That's all the suffering. But you don't say that.

You know it, but you don't say it. Because the construct does not like to be challenged in that way. And you would not be reaching that human being.

You would be only talking to the unhappy self, the mental construct. And it is not receptive to that kind of talk. It doesn't want to look at itself because that's the end of it.

He was quite funny too, from time to time. What do we value? Externals.

What do we look after? Externals. So of course, we are going to experience fear and nervousness.

Faced with external circumstances that we judge to be bad, we cannot help but be frightened and apprehensive. Please, God, we say, relieve me of my anxiety. Listen, stupid, you have hands.

God gave them to you himself. You might as well get on your knees and pray that your nose won't run. A better idea would be to wipe your nose and forego the prayer.

Show me one person who cares how they act. Someone for whom success is less important than the manner in which it is achieved. While out walking, who gives any thought to the act of walking itself?

Who pays attention to the process of planning, not just the outcome? If the plan works, of course, the person is overjoyed and says, how well we planned it. Didn't I tell you with brains like ours, it couldn't possibly fail.

But a different result leaves the person devastated, incapable of even finding words to explain what happened. So not just joke to the result, how you do is more important than the end result that you want to achieve. How you do something is to do with your state of consciousness as you do it.

Is your state of conscious, does it come out of the inner power? That is this deep peace and a powerful energy flow. Your complete attention is on the doing.

Or are you looking to what you want to achieve through the doing? And then the doing is of a totally different quality. It goes, there's no, you get upset while you do things because you haven't arrived yet where you want to arrive.

You look there and you do here. And of course, I call that low quality action. And while you do, you're upset, you're angry with other people, you're blaming and accusing and shouting and angry with yourself, whatever.

Dysfunctional states, psychic disharmony. You're engaged in some big, important business enterprise, but how are you doing it? In a state of psychic disharmony, creating unhappiness all around you.

Yes, but I'm creating something great. No, you're creating unhappiness. Whoever comes into contact with you gets infected by your inner dysfunctional state.

And of course, and then if he does, he or she does finally achieve success, it's totally tainted by the energy that brought it about, karmic. And then he drops dead. So how you do, pay attention to how, not always look to the end result, because how is your state of consciousness now?

When you're driving somewhere, what's your state? What's more important? Your state of consciousness in the moment of driving or arriving where you want to arrive?

Of course, most people think arriving is more important than this moment, because there's something important at the other end. That is not true. What is more important is this moment, because, why?

Because it's the only reality ever, this moment, there is nothing else. So how could it be less important than some imagined future moment? And when that arrives, of course, then some other imagined future moment becomes more important than that one.

This is normal living, but it's insane. These are deep-seated mind patterns in humans.

They are insane, they're normal.

So many humans spend a lot of their lives in states of psychic disharmony or dysfunction, whatever you want to call it. They don't even know what they are doing. They don't know what they're doing to themselves, and they don't know what they're doing to others around them.

And they contaminate the planet, the world, with this negativity. They don't know it. So this is what, when you recognize that, you see it immediately in others around you.

And if you are very alert, you can see it in yourself also. But the seeing is the beginning of freedom. And you see, okay, I'm creating a dysfunctional state right now.

Oh, now you have a choice to step out and become present. When you see you're creating your own suffering, then you have a choice. You can step out of the stream of thinking.

And the mind says, no, I can't step out of the stream of thinking. I just can't stop thinking. I have to think about this.

What's going to happen when this happens? And what if he doesn't? Or that might go wrong and this can...

What if I don't get it and this happens? Oh, God. Oh, God.

And of course, sometimes life does that to you, but it doesn't say no, it goes whack. And then for a moment you're, oh, what was all that? It was all mental fictions.

Nothing to do with this moment, the only reality, this moment. God, I could read the whole book to you, it's so much in it. Let any danger loom and you will discover what we really practiced and trained for.

So what you learned as a spiritual teaching, when you are confronted with danger or challenge, then you can practice, that's the most important part, to apply it in actual life situations in your daily life. Now, if you don't practice because of our negligence, we forever compound our problems and make our situations out to be worse than they actually are, very common. So, for instance, whenever I'm on board a ship and gaze into the deep or look around me and see nothing but ocean, I'm gripped by terror, imagining that if we wreck, I will have to swallow all this sea.

It doesn't occur to me that around three pints will be about enough to do me in. So is it the sea that terrifies me? No, it is my imagination.

Again, in an earthquake, I am prone to picture the whole city coming down on top of me, whereas in fact a single brick is enough to dash my brains out. It's simple. The complexity is never in the present moment.

The complexity of one's problems and one's situation is in here. Not here. It's always simple.

A brick falls, okay. Or at the right moment, you step aside. Now, one important thing here when you become endeavoring to become free of externals and dependency on externals, there needs to be a balance between dealing with externals.

You can't say nothing. I'm not dealing with anything anymore because I'm free of externals. And he talks about this.

Let's read it a little bit. It isn't easy to combine and reconcile the two. The carefulness of a person devoted to externals and the dignity of one who is detached.

The person devoted to externals says, okay, now we need to do this and this and this and this. But without detachment, you don't have the dignity, which is the spaciousness while you do things. So it's the balance between giving attention, but at the same time, not attaching yourself to the external.

This is not impossible. Otherwise, happiness would be impossible. It's something like going on an ocean voyage that was at his time a little bit more hazardous than it is now.

What can I do? Pick the captain, the boat, the date, and the best time to sail. But then a storm hits.

Well, it's no longer my business. I've done everything I could. It's somebody else's problem now, namely the captain's.

But then the boat actually begins to sink. What are my options? I do the only thing I'm in a position to do, drown.

But fearlessly, without bawling or crying out to God, because I know that what is born must also die. I'm not father time. I'm a human being, a part of the whole, like an hour in a day.

Like the hour I must abide my time and like the hour pass. What difference does it make whether I go by drowning or disease? I have to go somehow.

So whatever you can control about externals, you do what you can. This I can do something about. This I can do.

This I can do. Then it begins to unfold. And then in ways that you could not have predicted very often.

And then it comes, you become aligned with what is as it unfolds. Now, there's one or two things that Epictetus did not yet see totally. One is to some extent, your inner state of consciousness and the external reality that you experience as your reality are linked.

They're not totally separate. So he doesn't talk about that. For him, there's the external that we need to accept.

Whatever is beyond our control. But as your inner state changes, your reality also changes. Not in ways that is exact.

You cannot trace everything that happens to some thought or something like that. But your habitual state, your habitual vibrational frequency, emotional state, habitual thinking patterns, they tend to create certain reflections also in the outer. Very simple examples, of course.

If you believe that most humans are dishonest and out to deceive you, then you meet those people all the time. Isn't it strange? Any deep-seated belief that you have about other people or life, it tends to confirm itself in your experience.

If only because perception becomes selective. If you believe that everybody is dishonest, then you will look for... your perception is selective and honest people, you won't even see them.

This is just one example. They could give hundreds of examples. You don't see...

If you look for the bad, you don't see the good. In humans, for example. So your perception becomes selective and then reality confirms to you that all your thought patterns are actually correct.

Yes, they are all evil. They're all dishonest because it becomes selective. That's one aspect.

And also there are certain attractions. You attract people that whatever you're afraid of, you tend to attract that. So if you're afraid of being robbed, you tend to attract that.

I asked a famous person that I met a couple of years ago, do you have a... You don't have a bodyguard? Because I met some other famous people who always walk around with bodyguards.

And he said, well, actually, I'll tell you what it is. I'm sure he doesn't mind. Sting, he said...

So I said, you don't have a bodyguard? No. That would be like walking around with a gun in your pocket and then you attract certain situations where you need the gun.

And of course, that's very true. So that's inner states and outer reality. Another thing he didn't quite see yet as deeply is that thinking can be transcended altogether.

Not continuously, but the ability to step out of the stream of thinking and just be present in that spaciousness. That's a creative state. Creative in the sense of not necessarily creating a work of art.

Could be that, but it doesn't. Creative in the sense of dealing with life as it happens in this moment in a creative fashion and not a conditioned way. Responding creatively to what this moment requires.

That's creativity. But that does not happen if you apply preconditioned thinking patterns to what happens in this moment, because then you will be judging, interpreting according to your past conditioning, what's happening in this moment. And it's never, that's never it.

You're imposing the past on the present. And so people do that with other humans. They immediately judge them according to their conditioning in the mind.

Can you meet another human without judgment? Well, to be able to do that, you have to stop thinking. Because every thought about that other human being is going to be some kind of judgment.

So is that possible? Can you come to be with and face another human being and look at him or her and listen to him or her and just be a spacious presence while you look and listen to him or her? Yes, you can try it.

Look at me in the same way that I look at you. Do I need some judgment about you? What can that add to the experience of this moment?

It doesn't add anything. It detracts from the aliveness that is in you and that is in me and that is in all, that is all around us. It detracts from that.

Any judgment and reality immediately gets, shrinks into, first as a space and then suddenly you judge the other human being or the situation that you are in. It immediately gets fixed. Like it becomes, it becomes like a piece of ice where before there was flowing water.

And suddenly you pronounce some mental judgment or some mental conclusion. This is how it is. This is how it is.

And the whole flow of water which suddenly gets frozen. And it's hard. Once you have fixed reality in your mind like that, you're stuck with that.

And whenever you meet that other human being that you have imposed that on, you get that rigidity that you might, you cannot allow the human to be other than the judgment that you have imposed upon him or her. And if they display other behavior that completely contradicts your judgment, you won't even see it. Or you will misinterpret that in some way.

So that's, can you be, and this is the, perhaps the essential teaching, can you be spacious this moment here? Spacious as a presence. Be here as a presence rather than a person.

You don't lose anything. You can pick up the person that you are when you walk out of here. The person will still be there.

Don't worry if you still want it. You can pick up the person with all its history and problems. But for the time being, just practice with other humans.

Let's practice being a spacious presence for them while you listen to them. Oh, or look at them. Don't tell them what you're doing because you're not, it's not a doing anyway.

Just, this is wonderful, not having to judge other humans. This is gradually the ability in you to do that. It's not a doing, judging is a doing, but the language is limited.

The ability for you to do that grows as you practice being with others, not impose judgments. And your mind says, yeah, but you become defenseless. Silly nonsense, you don't become defenseless.

And there are things, if there are obvious things about another person, you see it and you still don't judge it. If a person comes and says, look, I'll sell you this gold watch for $50. I paid 5,000 for it, I'll take 50.

Say, no thanks. You don't have to say you're a thief, you probably stole it somewhere. Or it's, or you got it in Thailand for $10 and now it's gone.

You're wanting to sell it to me. No, no thanks. You see, without even saying anything, you see the intention behind it and you still can be compassionate.

You don't say how bad this human is. You just walk away, it's fine. Don't need to, because who knows that human may awaken tomorrow through some drastic event.

And suddenly, if you had judged that person and said he's a thief, well, maybe tomorrow he suddenly awakens and the thief collapses. So that is not who he or she is in their essence. You don't get the essence through judgment.

The essence in the other human becomes obscured and the essence in yourself becomes obscured to yourself. I'll read a little, just a little bit more. Here, first of all, a very extreme one.

Don't judge it, just listen. It's a dialogue, very short. His son died.

What happened? His son died. Nothing else?

Nothing. The ship was lost. What happened?

The ship was lost. He was thrown into jail. What happened?

He was thrown into jail. He's in a bad situation is a stock comment that everyone adds on their own account. So the man I mentioned to you earlier, Stockdale, he practiced these extreme teachings in an extreme situation.

And as a prisoner of war in North Vietnam for seven years and he says it worked for him. Acceptance and non-judgments, no more suffering. Physical pain may still be there, but no suffering.

Suffering being the superstructure on top of the physical pain, the mentally created superstructure on top of it. And this is an interesting little piece now about people who are waking up. He doesn't use that term.

I use that term. People who are beginning to wake up, living in presence. The tendency can be for them to be drawn back into unconsciousness with the habitual people that they spent time with.

And he talks about that here. It is inevitable if you enter into relations with people on a regular basis, either for conversation, dining, or simple friendship, that you will grow to be like them unless you can get them to emulate you. So it's either you go there or they come to you.

Place an extinguished piece of coal next to a live one and either it will cause the other one to die out or the live one will make the other reignite. It's true. Since a lot is at stake, you should be careful about fraternizing with non-philosophers.

As he calls it. In these contexts, remember that if you consort with someone covered in dirt, you can hardly avoid getting a little grimy yourself. He's talking to people in whom this is just growing, not to people where it's already fully manifested.

They can associate with anybody. But in people in whom it is growing, the presence is arising, can very easily become obscured again by people you meet. It becomes obscured by a glass of alcohol.

Once presence is firmly there, even one or two glasses of alcohol won't make any difference. You can have it or you don't have it. But while it's arising, it's better not to protect it a little bit like a delicate flower that grows.

I mean, what are you going to do if your friends start nattering about gladiators, horses and sports stars? Or even worse, if he starts gossiping about shared acquaintances. He's good.

She's bad. It's good this happened. It's too bad about that.

What if he sneers, ridicules, and even plays slow down tricks? Do any of you have the musician's ability to pick up an instrument, immediately identify which strings need attention and bring the whole instrument into tune? Or Socrates' gift in every setting of winning over the company to his side?

Not likely. Inevitably, you're going to adopt the common person's mentality instead. So why are they stronger than you?

Because they talk such garbage from conviction. Whereas your fine talk is no more than lip service. It lacks life and vigor.

Anyone listening to your speeches might well come to hate that damned virtue you keep proclaiming. That's why those fools get the better of you. Conviction is quite a potent and irresistible force.

So until those fine principles take root in you so that you can begin to rely on them a little, I advise you to use discretion in associating with such people. Otherwise, whatever you write down in class will melt away like wax in the sun. Keep out of the sun then, so long as your principles are as pliant as wax.

This is why philosophers say that we should even leave our native land since old habits pull us back and make it hard to embark on new adventures. Also, we can't stand running into people who say, look at him, this so-and-so, trying to become a philosopher, ha-ha-ha. So it's better not to talk really about what you're practicing or learning, as little as possible, unless there's receptivity in the other human.

If there's no receptivity, then it's enough for you to practice, not talk about it. Let's see what else I can find. Here's a funny one.

It shows a lack of refinement to spend a lot of time exercising, eating, drinking, defecating, or copulating. Tending to the body's needs should be done incidentally, as it were. The mind and its functions require the bulk of your attention.

Give attention to your mind. That really means be present with your mind. So you've seen the wake-up call.

Thank you. Vigilance is required. Vigilance is that alertness.

Alertness, especially alert to see what your mind is, what kind of thoughts your mind is producing. A helpful thing also is the alertness to sense perceptions. That slows down the mind considerably and brings you into the present moment, the surface of the present moment.

Sense perceptions are the surface of the present moment. But if you touch the surface of the present moment, you can go deeper from there into the depths of the present moment, which is your spacious consciousness itself. So alertness to sense perceptions is really where the portal begins to open into the present moment.

If you ask, where is the present moment? How do I get out of my mind into now? The simplicity of now, the reality of now, the power of now.

Sense perceptions. Looking, listening, smelling, touching. Oh, you're suddenly back in the now.

It's the surface, but that's a good start. And then you sense, underlying the sense perceptions, the field of presence. You can't, it has no form, but it's there.

That which makes the perception possible. And that's the way to live, is to have that in the background while you deal, either just contemplate sense perceptions or begin to deal with things here. Continuing to sense the presence that you are in the background.

What is presence? This. And then you realize that it's not just inside you.

The presence is within and without. In other words, the universe around you begins to feel more alive. It's almost as if you could sense an aliveness even in the space.

So it's within and without. You sense that aliveness, which has no form. Formless aliveness.

You can't put it under a microscope. It is the precondition for everything. You cannot examine it as an object of consciousness.

Okay, I'm now going to look and examine the aliveness of presence. Who is looking? The aliveness of presence.

I'm now going to look at it. You can't. It is it.

I am it. I cannot look at I as if I cannot. If I make myself into an object that I'm going to analyze or look at, it doesn't work.

The presence is the eternal I. So you can only be it, but you cannot make it an object and say, oh, there it is. It is prior to everything.

So you are prior to everything. In that sense, there's nothing you need to understand to realize who you are. What you need to understand, perhaps, is what prevents you from realizing who you are.

That's helpful to know. But who you are, you can't know. Because it's the eternal subject.

It can never be an object. And so you don't need to understand more about yourself to wake up spiritually, to be who you are in your essence. You are already that.

The only understanding would be helpful to see how that realization is obscured in you. So what you understand is never the reality of who you are. It's the illusion that obscures who you are that you can understand to some extent.

So when you judge another human being, whatever you say about them also tends to be the illusory self that you see there. The mental construct, which either might actually be there or it's a total projection of your mind or a combination of the two. So you have the knowing, two types of knowing, conceptual knowing and non-conceptual knowing, which most humans don't realize yet the possibility of that.

So that's quite a relief that there's nothing you can add to who you are already by some further understanding through the mind. It's by relinquishing, trying to figure something out about who you are that suddenly who you are in your depths opens up now. So this is the same teaching as Epictetus going and taking it a little bit further.

We're in a different time period. More humans are open to it and the need for awakening is much greater now for humanity or to awaken. At his time, it was still a luxury.

Now we have to and that's good. The essence of the teaching is, of course, the freedom from having to think. That's really what it comes down to.

Yes, you don't have to think. You can if you want to, but increasingly you can go through life without an excessive baggage of thought. Suddenly you feel much lighter.

Situations are much lighter. Other human beings are lighter to you. They're not a problem to you.

Amazing things happen as you practice the ultimate renunciation. Renunciation is a religious, spiritual term. And usually it's used with reference to possessions, sexual relations, money, power, renunciation of whatever.

Traditionally, the renunciates in India possess nothing. And that was also for a long time a tradition in Europe in the Middle Ages and early Christianity. In early Christianity, people lived in the desert, renouncing everything.

The desert fathers, as they're called. And that's all very nice, but if the ultimate renunciation hasn't happened, then all that is not even that helpful. If thinking, the compulsion to think, and addiction to thinking, and identification with thinking is not renounced, all other renunciations don't really make that much difference because you would still be attached to whatever thoughts arise in your mind.

And if you've renounced possessions, the first thought that will arise in your mind will be, I am someone who has renounced all possessions. You haven't renounced thinking. So the possessions that you were identified with, which in reality, of course, was only a thought, which means this is mine.

It is part of who I am. That was a thought you had identified with, but now you let go of that. And that's replaced by another thought that you identify with, which is, I'm the one who has renounced.

And all these inferior humans have not renounced. Basically, nothing has changed. Now, you could, of course, have somebody who renounces all possessions and at the same time renounces self-reference to thinking, then that's fine.

And you could also have someone who has all possessions and renounces thinking, and possessions are still there, but don't matter anymore. Or perhaps he'll give them away. Who knows?

But the ultimate renunciation is breaking the addiction to thinking as a dysfunctional, useless activity. And then apply thought when it's needed for certain things. That's fine.

And be free when it's not needed, especially in relationships. A lot of the time, thought isn't needed in a true, deep relationship. Transcendence of thought is needed for a relationship to be deep and true.

Of course, you talk to each other, but the foundation of the relationship must be the space, the inner space in each one, which is ultimately one space, one consciousness. So, practice the ultimate renunciation. Ah, what a relief.

Don't have to think all the time. But don't go to sleep. Stay awake.

Okay.

[Speaker 2] (4:46:29 - 4:46:30)

Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (4:46:54 - 7:23:36)

From time to time, I have been sharing with you a book, books that have been dear to me for many years, and books that also I believe will be helpful to everybody. These are books that contain a message that goes far beyond, transcends the time period in which they were written. So, they're books that contain a timeless spiritual teaching or spiritual message that is still as helpful for us today as it was for people at the time when it was written.

So, the oldest book you may remember that we talked about some time ago was the Tao Te Ching, written 2,500 years ago. We also had a couple of books that were 2,000 years old. We talked about Marcus Aurelius' Meditations.

And we talked about the teachings of the philosopher Epictetus. And I've had some feedback from people who found it very helpful. So, the messages are as powerful today as they were at the time these books were written.

So, for today, I have a little treat in store for you, another book. And this time, it's a book that comes to us from the Middle Ages, written about 550 years ago. And that book, for several centuries, was considered one of the most important spiritual books within the Christian tradition.

But you don't need to be a Christian to benefit from the teaching that's contained in this book. In fact, I'm sure there are many evangelical Christians today for whom the teaching that's contained in this book would be as alien as Tibetan Buddhism. The book is called The Imitation of Christ.

The Imitation of Christ. Imitation nowadays has a name. It's a negative connotation.

But at that time, all it meant was copying, being the same as. So, the book teaches us to imitate Christ, which means to become as Christ, to become one with Christ or to become one with God. The author of the book was a monk who lived, was born in the year 1380.

But first of all, let me show you the book. This is a deluxe edition published by the Folio Society in England. The Imitation of Christ.

And the name of the author is Thomas R. Kempis. Thomas R.

Kempis, which means Thomas from Kempen. Kempen being a small town in northwest Germany by the River Rhine, not far from the Dutch border. So he's generally known as Thomas from Kempis, a Latinized version of Kempen, the town that he's from.

So Thomas R. Kempis was born in 1380 and he lived to the age of 90. Very rare in those times.

And of course, he was a monk because virtually all books written in the Middle Ages were written by monks for the simple reason that nobody else could read or write. Almost nobody else. So the books that were written and read were written and read by monks.

And so the Imitation of Christ is a book that contains short chapters. It does, the book does not need to be read consecutively. You can open it anywhere, read a chapter.

There's no buildup, there's no argumentation or anything. Every chapter is simply designed to make you aware on the one hand of that which separates you from your true identity or self, although it doesn't use those words. So you become more aware of your patterns, your inner patterns, the egoic patterns.

And again, of course, it doesn't use the word ego. It uses other terms, as we shall see. And also the book deals with the fact of suffering and how to approach human suffering.

The book, of course, was written originally in Latin and later was translated into the other European languages. The translation I'm using here today is the translation that was made 200 or 300 years ago. It's quite old.

So the English language is ancient old English. And it's been slightly revised in the early 20th century. I believe that this still most faithfully reflects the spirit of the original, that kind of language.

There have been other translations in recent times into contemporary English. But when I looked at one or two, I immediately felt this just doesn't work for this kind of text. So when I read short extracts to you, because that's what we are going to do, I'll read short extracts and we'll then comment.

I believe you will quickly get used to the language. Might be at first a little bit unfamiliar. So Thomas Acampis, The Imitation of Christ.

Let's have a look. Remember, we are not really studying something outside ourselves. So this is not an academic setting.

The beginning of me talking here sounds a little bit as if you were at a college or university, but that's not how we approach it here. We are not really studying a book. We are not really studying a text.

Why should we? What we are doing is we are using this text to look at ourselves. So we look at ourselves through that teaching, because every spiritual teaching is here so that we can direct it to ourselves.

The spiritual teaching is of no interest. The spiritual teaching directs your attention to yourself. It directs your attention in the first place to the obstacles in yourself, the obstacles to awakening, the ego.

And then it directs your attention to the deeper levels in yourself, the spiritual dimension, that which lies once you get through the obstacles so that they no longer obscure your awareness, your awareness of who you are, or simply your awareness is no longer obscured. That's the very purpose of all spiritual texts, no matter whether they are two and a half thousand years old or contemporary, any spiritual teaching. Its only value lies in that, that it directs your attention to that.

It awakens you in various ways. Now, every teaching, of course, has certain limitations that have to do with the time period out of which it comes. So there are certain limitations to this teaching also.

It's a medieval teaching. In some ways, the Middle Ages, medieval times, are very alien to us these days, usually regarded as the Dark Ages. And of course, it is true that there was an enormous amount of superstition and ignorance and cruelty and violence and absolute insecurity at that time.

That's all true. But it's also true that there were some human beings at that time who, despite all this, or maybe not despite, maybe because of the absolute insecurity of those times, who were able to access the deeper dimension within themselves. And became spiritually awakened.

So they had great mystics. They were called mystics. Of course, they all lived within the structure of the Christian religion and Christian terminology.

Although many of the greatest mystics were regarded with a suspicion by the church hierarchy. It was too dangerous, too alive, too threatening to the collective ego and to the personal ego. So let's look at this now.

At first, as I said, you might find it a little unfamiliar. The language will be strange. But we'll very quickly go more deeply into the text so that the language doesn't matter anymore.

I showed you this deluxe edition just now, which I haven't had for very long. But I'm going to read from this little edition here, which is more or less the same, which is a book that I've had for 25 years. I only recently removed the dust cover, so it looks nice and new again.

Let's start with something simple. A little chapter. I may not read the whole chapter.

It's only a page and a half. But it's called Of Self-Consideration. We may not trust too much to ourselves, for grace and understanding are often wanting to us.

There is in us but little light, and this we soon lose by negligence. Oftentimes, we are quite unconscious how interiorly blind we are. How true this is still today.

Oftentimes, we are quite unconscious how interiorly blind we are. The difficulty he is talking about of knowing, of recognizing your own patterns of reactive judgment, of negativity, egoic patterns, in other words. An inability to be aware that you are still run by unconscious patterns.

And so in many chapters, he directs attention, our attention, away from the external world so that we can direct attention within. As I often say, what really matters at any moment, no matter what you're doing or where you are, what matters, what is more important and more fundamental than whatever is happening outside you is what's happening inside you. If you lose awareness of that fact, then you lose yourself in the outer.

And we'll come to some wonderful little sayings about that in a minute. Oftentimes, we are quite unconscious how interiorly blind we are. We often do amiss and do worse in excusing ourselves.

A very common egoic pattern is to find excuses and justifications. That's easy to recognize in others. They do silly things, unconscious actions.

When you point something out, immediately the ego protects itself. It immediately finds justifications. It's an automatic ego protective mechanism.

As I said, easily recognized in other people, but it needs more awareness to recognize that in yourself. Sometimes we are moved by passion and think it's zeal. Passion here throughout the book is used in a negative sense.

Passion here does not mean what it means in modern English. Passion means reactivity, being possessed by mental, emotional, reactive patterns. And we mistake passion for zeal, which means we mistake it for something that is good, that is enthusiasm and energy that flows into what we do.

We blame little things in others and overlook great things in ourselves. We are quick enough in perceiving and weighing what we bear from others, but we think little of what others have to bear from us. He that should well and justly weigh his own doing would find little cause to judge harshly of another.

This is self-explanatory. If you were really aware of your own patterns, you would no longer judge others harshly. So that is, our task is to become more aware of our own egoic patterns from moment to moment in situations.

The interior, by the way, all the language here, of course, according to the times, is masculine. So when he says man, you have to, of course, include women. Also, the English language, unfortunately, doesn't have a word that includes men and women as the German language does.

He didn't write it in German, but just German has Mensch. Well, Jewish also has Mensch, but with a slightly different connotation. Yiddish, I mean, has Mensch.

So whenever I read man, think human being. The interior man regards the care of himself before all other cares. That means that's what matters most.

Look into yourself. He that looketh diligently to himself findeth it not difficult to be silent about others. He says here the interior man.

The interior man, again, is a term that's used frequently. Interior human being. It means he's talking about the aware human being, the human being at the level of awareness rather than the human being at the level of unconscious thinking.

So the interior man, the interior human being is the level of awareness, who you are at the level of awareness. Because, and that's a vital distinction, most humans who are not awakened, not awake spiritually, live at the level, exclusively at the level of thinking, plus the emotions that are generated by thinking. So that's the interior man is the dimension of who you are at the deeper dimension, the deeper level of awareness.

So that's the shift. You're quite a different being when the shift happens from thinking, the thinking being, we could see the exterior human being to the interior human being. And of course, for many, they fluctuate these days.

Many people are going through an awakening. They fluctuate between being the thinking entity, the thinking being, and being the aware, the awareness, the deeper self. Thou wilt never be interior and devout unless thou pass over in silence other men's affairs and look especially to thyself.

He's giving some advice here of not engaging the exterior man or human being, not engaging, not giving more food, not giving into the mental tendency of wanting to judge the egoic tendency of wanting to judge others. Pass over in silence other men's affairs. If you can let go of the almost compulsion to talk about other people's doings, usually in a critical way, then you're not giving food anymore to that mental habit.

He wrote, of course, the book was mostly written for monks or maybe also nuns, people who lived in monasteries. Nobody else could read anyway. So he refers often to situations that occur in monasteries, but basically it's the same as in everyday life because it's human interaction.

And it's just as challenging to be in a monastery as it is out here in the 21st century. In everyday existence. If thou attend wholly to thyself and to God, what thou seest abroad will affect thee but little.

Abroad in old usage means outside. If thou attend wholly to thyself and to God, what thou seest abroad, outside, will affect thee but little. So as you place more attention on the inner, where you become aware of your patterns and also become aware of God, which is the light of consciousness in yourself, then what happens outside of you no longer has that power over you.

You become, to some extent, free from being controlled by external events that all the teachings point to that. You can respond to external events, but your inner state is no longer controlled by what somebody says or does or by what is happening around you. So, one more time.

If thou attend wholly to thyself and to God, what thou seest abroad will affect thee but little. Where art thou when thou art absent from thyself? Absent from thyself, what's he saying?

When you're not present. Where are you? You're asleep.

Where are you? Where art thou when thou art absent from thyself? So, put this into this teaching.

When you're not, where are you when you're not present? You're not there. You're asleep.

Unconscious patterns are running you and pretend to be you. Normal existence. And when thou hast run over all things, what has it profited thee if thou hast neglected thyself?

Even if you achieve all kinds of things. If you have not grown in consciousness, what is the point? And in the end, it will make you unhappy.

So, we see the essence here expressed in old language, but in some ways we can recognize that how vital this message still is, because it is about the human ego. Now, a little bit from a different chapter. Very important.

He says, this is sometimes, by the way, sometimes the words seem to be spoken by God. An old version of conversations with God, perhaps. And occasionally there's even a dialogue here between the, perhaps the writer and God or higher consciousness, whatever you want to call it.

So, here it starts with the writer or the reader being addressed by, Son, thou oughtest diligently to aim at this, that in every place and in every action or external occupation, thou be inwardly free and master of thyself, and that all things be under thee and not thou under them. That thou mayest be Lord and ruler of thy actions and not a slave or mercenary. Be someone who stands above things present and contemplates the eternal, who with the left eye regards things passing and with the right, those of heaven.

We'll see that, we'll, now let's look what I just read. Son, thou oughtest diligently to aim at this, that in every place and in every action or external occupation, thou be inwardly free and master of thyself, and that all things be under thee and not thou under them. In other words, don't be the slave of things, of things that happen outside you, of actual material things, things that happen.

Don't lose yourself, as I sometimes put it, don't lose yourself in things. Don't lose yourself in the world. Don't lose yourself in your thoughts, which are also things.

It's all form, the world of form. So there's a love, this lovely image he uses here is, see that all things be under thee and not thou under them. And even nowadays for most people, that is not yet true, not yet the case, they are under the things, they are totally controlled, they give their total attention only to the things in their lives.

I call that life situation. Life situation absorbs your attention completely. What does that mean?

What is the life situation? Life situation is your health, your finances, your relationships, where you live, what you do for a living, your job, all those things, your relationships, your family, all those things make up your life situation. And for most people, of course, those things entirely occupy their attention.

So their attention or their consciousness is absorbed completely by their life situation, which exists in time. And what they miss, I put it in those words, what they miss is life. What they don't realize is something deeper and more vital than their life situation, which is only accessible in the present moment, which I call life, but you could also call it consciousness, awareness, or God.

And so you miss what really matters, the aliveness of life, the depths within yourself, and you spend a whole lifetime running around the surface of your life. That's one way of putting it. Or as he puts it, things are on top of you.

You are not on top of things. You are under the things, burdened by the things. And he points to the possibility, and I always talk about that, of course, in other different words, the possibility of living in a different way where you become aware of the formless dimension in yourself, the awareness, the presence, the inner space, whatever you want to call it.

And here he has a wonderful image that he uses here. He points to the possibility that you can stand above things present and contemplate the eternal. And you can, with the left eye, regard things passing, and with the right, those of heaven.

Meaning, the art of living is to find a balance between the world of form, all the stuff that make up your life situation, the world of form that continuously changes around you, yes, you have to deal with it, yes, you have to give it some attention. It requires action and this and that. But if that's all, if that absorbs all your attention, you are lost in it.

So he points to the possibility of giving due attention to that dimension that I call the life situation that he calls here things passing. So you contemplate, with the left eye, you regard things passing. That means one half of your attention is on your life situation and whatever it is that needs doing there.

With the right eye, you contemplate the eternal or the things of heaven, as he calls it. Then that means, in any situation, there then there's a dimension of form. You here as a body, a person who, yes, the thoughts that arise, relationships, dealing with this and that, without loss of awareness of the underlying dimension of consciousness itself.

What I sometimes call inner space or what I sometimes call presence. Awareness of that of the background, the spaces, the space in the background of your life, the inner space that is always there in which everything arises and subsides. And that's the essence of every spiritual teaching so that you don't lose yourself in the world, which is your mind.

Without totally denying the world for the time being, you, the form identity, is part of this world. And then there is the essence identity which has no form. This is not something to believe in.

It's something to realize here and now. The moment the mind becomes still, it's there. The moment you totally accept the form of the present moment, you feel a space in the background.

It's there. So what a lovely image. So with the stand above things present, contemplate the eternal.

You are someone who with the left eye regards things passing and with the right, those of heaven. The dance between form and formlessness. The dance between the temporal and the eternal.

Now let's look at a little bit from a different chapter. You can see that it doesn't really matter where you open the book. That's a not ideal for meditative reading.

He that knows how to walk interiorly and to make but little account of things exteriorly does not look for places nor wait for seasons to perform exercises of devotion. The man of interior life soon recollects himself because he never wholly porous force himself upon exterior things. Exterior labor is no prejudice to him nor any employment necessary for the time.

But as things happen, so he accommodates himself to them. Let's look at those two sentences. Very important.

The man, the past, the human being of interior life soon recollects himself because he never wholly porous himself force upon exterior things. A lovely way of putting it. The interior man, again, we had that before.

It means it points to the who you are at the level of awareness. The unconditioned being, the timeless in you, the essence of who you are, the interior being. Soon recollects himself.

The interior man never completely loses himself in the external. He or she soon recollects himself because he never wholly, I'll just put it into slightly more modern English, he never wholly force himself upon exterior things to pour yourself into exterior things, to completely lose yourself in exterior things. You observe it all the time.

When you just, before you see it in yourself, look at other humans around you, how they lose themselves, or the slightest challenge comes in the form of an unexpected setback, something going wrong here or there, some difficult situation, a person not doing what I expect them to do, whatever it is, how quickly people pour themselves into exterior things, and so this thing suddenly becomes of absolute importance.

That's what it means, pouring yourself out into things. Which ultimately, of course, you pour yourself into your thoughts. Every thought that arises takes complete possession of you.

You pour all your attention into that. So you're a continuously loss, a continuous loss. Amazing.

You can see it in others. Just wait, people around you, how, what they do when challenges come. Okay, you've done that.

Now you've recognized it in others. The next step is, oh, can you recognize it in yourself? Do you do that also when you wait for the next challenge?

Do you completely, does it completely draw you out of yourself? And when it does, don't beat yourself up, but even just noticing that that's what's happening is a huge gain in consciousness. So you don't beat yourself up and say, oh, I can't do it.

No, just notice it. Any pattern you notice in yourself means there is some consciousness. There's awareness there.

It's when you don't know it that you're completely trapped in it. And if you don't know it, there's not much you can do except after the challenge has passed, perhaps you can look back and say, oh, I completely lost it there again. And when that, so awareness comes after the challenge, which is even, which is still better than no awareness at all.

And because if there's no awareness at all, even the most unconscious reaction, you will justify afterwards to yourself and to others. The ego is good at finding excuses and justifications. The most absurd justifications will do.

It's an automatic defense mechanism of the ego. So if you're very unconscious, of course, you wouldn't even be listening to this. I'm not talking to people who are totally unconscious because they are not listening.

They can't. There's no space in them to listen to this. Without a little bit of space, at least you can't listen to this.

It's, it would be dreadful, completely meaningless or threatening. And so pouring yourself upon exterior things. And the next sentence here that I'm reading again now, exterior labor is no prejudice to him, nor any employment necessary for the time.

Translated into modern language, whatever you do externally, whatever action you perform, is no prejudice. Doesn't really matter what it is that you do. But as things happen, you accommodate yourself to them.

You go with whatever this moment requires. This moment is not an obstacle to awareness. That's what he's saying.

The, the ego regards to the ego. Anything is an obstacle to awareness. The ego is the obstacle.

So there's a possibility then of accommodating yourself to the present moment. That's what it really is. And whatever action is required in the present moment, you go with it.

This is what's required. And then awareness stays with you. If you react against what is required by the present moment, awareness is lost.

And that means you are absent, not present. If all were right within thee, and thou wert well purified, all things would tend to thy good and thy profit. If all were right within thee, and thou wert well purified, meaning, of course, if all were right within thee, if your inner state of consciousness were clear, present, aware, that's mean, that's what purified means.

All things would tend to thy good and thy profit. Even seemingly negative things will turn to thy good. You will use whatever situation arises, and it will be transformed into good.

Christ for the middle, another expression, can be used to mean to describe that. And so all that happens, a difficult situation, a difficult person, you become more present. You don't lose presence anymore.

You become more alert. Alertness, presence arises instead of reactivity. There's nothing that so defiles and entangles the heart of man as an impure attachment to created things.

Created things is the world of form. An impure attachment to created things is to seek your identity, yourself, in that world of form. And that means suffering.

As he puts it, there's nothing that so defiles and entangles the heart of man. You get defiled and entangled in created things if you seek an identity through this or that, possessions, whatever it is, ultimately thoughts that arise in you. If thou wilt refuse exterior consolations, then shalt thou be able to apply thy mind to heavenly things and experience frequent interior joy.

The joy comes with that as that dimension is awakened in you. What wonderful teaching teaching. Here's a little chapter that is called Of Avoiding Rash Judgment.

And he says, Turn thine eyes back upon thyself and see thou judge not the doings of others. In judging others, a man toileth in vain for the most part he is mistaken and he easily sinneth. But judging and scrutinizing himself, he always laboreth with profit.

Look at yourself. We often judge a thing according as we have it at heart, for true judgment is easily lost through private affection. What does that mean?

True judgment is easily lost through private affection. There is in you, he's saying, I would reduce it to the movement of either fear or desire. There are certain things that you want or fear from another human being and so or situation and you judge through your wanting and fearing without knowing it.

So whatever you perceive and judge is colored, distorted completely by your inner state, which basically is an egoic state. Your ego has some issue and through that, usually it involves desire or fear, some wanting, and through that it interprets and the interpretation of other humans and situations that involve humans, all situations involve humans more or less, is distorted. So you're really seeing only a reflection of your inner state and you think you're dealing with reality.

Next sentence he says is here, if God were always the only object of our desire, we should not be easily disturbed at our own opinions being resisted. Of course, that's a very, very, very common way of losing consciousness, happens all the time. Just look around or we better look at yourself.

Your opinions, your viewpoints are being resisted and we are easily disturbed, as he puts it, at our own opinions being. The moment somebody resists your opinion, your viewpoint, you are disturbed, upset, defensive, angry. And why is that?

Well, he says here, if God were always the only object of our desire, we should not be easily disturbed at our own opinions being resisted. If we reside deep enough within the dimension of aware presence, we are no longer identified with our viewpoints or opinions. Identified, of course, means we don't seek ourselves in them anymore.

So we are free to put forward our views, viewpoints or opinions without the element of self in them, because we don't need it for our self-identification, because we are already dwelling in our essential identity, which is awareness. We are already here as the aware presence, the space. Out within that space, you express a viewpoint or an opinion.

If it's resisted, it is no longer a threat to who you are. It never was a threat to who you are, but that was the delusion, that you regarded it as a threat to who you are, your identity, because you identified with it. It happens just all the time.

Wherever you look, how quickly somebody resists your viewpoint, challenges it, you're upset one way or another. Which means you're not aware. And here he adds the next sentence, many secretly seek themselves in what they do and are not aware of it.

It's amazing how deep psychological insights he has at a time when really nobody was talking about the unconscious or anything like that in the Middle Ages. Many secretly seek themselves in what they do and are not aware of it. I just talked about that because you seek yourself in your viewpoints and opinions, completely unaware that it's only a thought form.

So there's no, you're not rooted in being. And again, another way of looking at it, as he does in the previous chapter, you lose yourself continuously in things, in form. Next sentence here.

Every sentence is a little jewel. It's so precious. So just to connect with the previous sentence, many secretly seek themselves in what they do and are not aware of it.

They seem also to continue in good peace so long as things are done according to their will and judgment. But if ought happen otherwise than they desire, they are soon disturbed and become sad or angry or whatever. If ought happen otherwise, which means if anything happens otherwise than they desire, they soon become disturbed and become sad or angry.

So you continue in good peace so long as things are done according to your will and judgment. Things you're not being challenged, everybody, but of course that never lasts long. If anything happens other than they desire, they become disturbed and become sad.

Too often, says continues here, too often difference of feelings and opinions giveth rise to dissensions between friends and fellow citizens, between religious and devout persons. Even in the monastery, they do it. They identify with their view and opinions, and then suddenly there's conflict and aggression.

And of course, it was done on a huge scale by the collective ego of the church at that time. Because if you disagreed with the collective viewpoint at that time, you were regarded as a mortal enemy. And if you were lucky, they would put you in prison for the rest of your life.

And if you were not so lucky, you would be burned to death or tortured and then burned. What for? Different viewpoint.

That's the ego. That was a collective ego. An inveterate habit is with difficulty relinquished and no one is willingly led beyond his own views.

Everybody, in other words, is trapped in their own mind patterns, conditionings, viewpoints. Last sentence here in this chapter is, God will us to become perfectly subject to himself and by the love that burneth in us to transcend all reason. Reason, I would say, really means thinking.

God willeth us to become perfectly subject to himself. God, of course, is the formless reality. And by the love that burneth in us to transcend all reason.

To be rooted in the formless is, of course, also love. Because love is not the love of form, because that's egoic view of love. True love is not the love of a form, a human form or any other form.

True love is recognizing the formless in the other, which is God. So all true love is the love of God. But you can only recognize the formless in the other if you recognize the formless in yourself, because it's only through the formless in yourself that you can recognize it in another.

Recognize not visually, of course, you can't see the formless, but you can sense it. But there needs to be space in you, because the space is it. Presence, space, stillness, alert stillness.

Now let's look at some interesting aspect of his teaching. And that is transforming suffering into awareness. He's not talking about suffering that is produced by the human mind, which for many people is a very large part of their suffering, but true suffering, which could be physical suffering or could be suffering at some great loss, somebody loved one dies or some other great loss, whatever suffering it is.

The suffering, according to the medieval Christian tradition, is called the cross. And Jesus is the prototype of the suffering human. He's the great example.

So, and this is part of a larger medieval tradition. When you suffer, and this is a way of transcending suffering, whether that still works nowadays, perhaps for most people, not. But at that time, it did work for some people.

How many? I don't know. Their own suffering was looked at with reference to the suffering of Jesus on the cross.

So Jesus was the prototype. And then you would regard your suffering as participating in the suffering of Christ. And that was regarded as a kind of spiritual practice.

It's not, it's actually can be a very powerful thing because if you use that archetype of suffering that Jesus represents, human suffering, Jesus stands then for all humans. He's a representative of humanity, of all humans. And if you can feel that at the time, it was possible for many, probably, to feel they were suffering with him, participating.

And that led to letting go of all resistance. And of course, letting go of all resistance, when you can say yes to whatever arises in this moment, which could be suffering, that's the, you immediately transcend the ego. So he, in various chapters, he shows us how to go beyond suffering by embracing suffering.

Even, and this is, nowadays, we would regard it as a little perverse, but it is part of a very ancient tradition, not only in Christianity, but also in Hinduism, for example, to even welcome suffering. Now, I'm not asking you to go there, but that is, that was a way for hundreds of years. In India, it's still practiced by some, quite a few yogis.

Basically, they not only welcome suffering, go one step further. Don't go there, please. I'm just pointing out what, what is possible, what humans have done, although the modern humans find it hard to understand.

Not only, so, not only accepting suffering is one stage, and it's beautiful, because what else can you do if it's not mind-generated? If it's mind-generated, you have to look at your mind, how it generates suffering. But it could be physical suffering, accepting suffering, welcoming suffering, even, and then some would go so far as almost, or actually, to create suffering for themselves, as yogis do in, some yogis do in India.

The famous thing, the famous cliche, you sleep on a bed of nails. You create, and they've come up with all kinds of things to create suffering. And there's, it is doubtful that this will truly free you, because if you create suffering in order to achieve transcendence, there's a huge danger that instead of achieving transcendence, you achieve enhancement of the ego.

But let's look here at what he calls the Royal Road of the Holy Cross. So cross, or Jesus on the cross, stands for suffering. Go where thou wilt, seek what thou wilt, and thou shalt not find a higher way above, nor a safer way below than the way of the Holy Cross.

Dispose and order all things according as thou wilt, and as seems best to thee, and thou wilt still find something to suffer, either willingly or unwillingly. And so thou shalt always find the cross. For either thou shalt feel pain in the body, or sustain in thy soul tribulation of spirit.

Sometimes thou shalt be deserted by God, at other times shalt be afflicted by thy neighbor. And what is more, thou shalt often be a trouble to thyself. Neither canst thou be delivered or eased by any remedy or comfort, but as long as it shall please God, thou must bear it.

For God willeth that thou learn to suffer tribulation without comfort, and wholly submit thyself to him and become more humble by tribulation. The cross, therefore, is always ready and everywhere awaiteth thee. Thou canst not escape it, whithersoever thou runnest, for wheresoever thou goest, thou carryest thyself with thee and shalt always find thyself.

Turn thyself upward or turn thyself downward, turn thyself inward or turn thyself outward, everywhere thou shalt find the cross. If thou carry the cross willingly, it will carry thee and bring thee to thy desired end, namely to that place where there will be an end of suffering. If thou carry it unwillingly, thou makest it a burden to thee and loadest thyself the more, and nevertheless thou must bear it.

If thou fling away one cross, without doubt thou wilt find another and perhaps a heavier." So, beautiful writing. It resonates, of course, also with the teaching of the Buddha, especially here where he says, you cannot escape the cross, whithersoever thou runnest, wheresoever thou goest, thou carryest thyself with thee and shalt always find thyself.

And no matter where you go and what you do, then something, there will be something to cause you suffering. Again, he said, thou shalt feel pain in the body or sustain in thy soul tribulation of spirit. You are afflicted by your neighbor or afflicted by your trouble to yourself.

Of course, the Buddha teaches that and speaks of the universal fact of dukkha, which also means suffering. Although it's not just suffering, it embraces other things. The Buddhist term dukkha embraces any kind of unsatisfactoriness, non-fulfillment, misery.

All that is dukkha. So the Buddha says, no matter where you go or what condition you're experiencing, you will always find the element of dukkha in any situation, in any condition. And that's very true.

Any human who has lived long enough will find no matter where you go, where you live or what you do, there's always this element of suffering or unsatisfactoriness arises sooner or later. Relationships. So Buddha teaches then what he, wherever you go, you will find dukkha.

And Thomas Arkampis in the Christian tradition says, wherever you go, you will find the cross. Now, because people have not truly understood the teaching of the Buddha, especially people who only try to analyze it intellectually, therefore call Buddhism a negative or life-denying teaching. And many people nowadays would also regard Thomas Arkampis in the medieval spiritual tradition as negative.

But the fact remains, it is actually true. Anybody can verify it in their own life. However, something important needs to be added to the Buddhist teaching or the spiritual teaching of the, a Christian teaching of the cross.

This is only true until you realize the essence of yourself as beyond form, or as Buddhism puts it, you realize the truth of anatta, as it's called in the Pali language. You realize the truth of no self, that there is, you only suffer if there is self-seeking in the world of form. If you're identified, then you're identified with the world of form.

Then there's dukkha. Because the Buddha says everything is impermanent in the world of form, anicca. Everything is devoid of self, anatta.

And if you seek yourself in that which is impermanent, that's dukkha, suffering. But if you don't seek yourself in that which is impermanent, because you have realized your essential self, which Buddhism calls no self, as spaciousness, which Buddhism calls emptiness, which Jesus calls the kingdom of heaven, then you don't need the world of form anymore to give you your sense of self. You can have a loose relationship with the world of form.

Allow it. Play with it. Give it its due.

Don't expect from it more than it can give you, which isn't that much. You don't have unreasonable expectations of the world of form. Because if you have unreasonable expectations of the world of form, which includes other humans too, please fulfill me.

No, nobody's going to do that. Well, they may try. You might have an egoic marriage contract.

Say, I fulfill you, you fulfill me. That sounds good. But try it for a while and you'll see it doesn't work.

I'm sure many of you have tried it. So the cross, there's one way you can use. Suffering as it arises, and there accept what is in the midst of suffering and give up resistance.

And suddenly, it's one way of finding that which is beyond form. You suffer and you willingly, you can practice it if you have an illness or whatever, completely accept what is. Don't accept the idea of illness.

I've said that before somewhere. Accept simply whatever you feel at this moment. Bring acceptance to it.

Whatever arises in this moment, it is as it is. That frees you from the world of form. If you accept the form completely, it frees you from form.

That's a miracle. If you don't accept the form of this moment, you are trapped in a reactive movement, which means you are more trapped in form. So surrender means accepting whatever arises.

And that's the cross. And he says here, if you accept, then the cross carries you. You don't carry the cross anymore.

Isn't that amazing? Then the suffering turns around and suddenly becomes an opening into the realm of the transcendent through surrender. And in the ancient Christian tradition, that is a lesson of the human on the cross who says, not my will, but thy will be done.

So we see how the really seemingly very different spiritual traditions really all point to the same, the same place, take us to the same place. If thou carry the cross willingly, it will carry thee and bring thee to thy desired end, namely to that place where there will be an end. End of suffering, though here there will be no end.

Here means in this dimension, in this dimension only, there will be no end. You will continue to experience challenges. The difference is they no longer turn into suffering.

As long as there is suffering, you can practice surrender and through surrender, the ego gets eroded. Through complete acceptance, the ego gets eroded. Sometimes all at once, sometimes gradually.

And now he comes to the, the most extreme expression of this teaching. When thou shalt arrive thus far, that tribulation shall be sweet to thee and thou shalt relish it for the love of Christ, then think that it is well with thee, for thou hast found a paradise upon earth. As long as suffering is grievous to thee and thou seekest to fly from it, so long shall it be ill with thee and the desire of flying from tribulation shall pursue thee everywhere.

So if tribulation shall be sweet to thee, then immediately you find paradise on earth. Now that just means a complete yes to what is. That's pretty drastic.

You welcome whatever is. But basically that's the, is at the bottom of all teachings. And immediately inner transformation happens.

And then the ego is gone. And there's a beautiful saying here from Thomas Akempis. I'm just taking this one quote, one sentence.

For the Lord bestows his benediction there where he findeth vessels empty. Empty. If you're empty, now doesn't that sound like Buddhism?

If you are empty, you are blessed. God bestows his benediction there where he findeth vessels empty. Now Buddhism doesn't mention God, but basically it's the same.

It's the emptiness. The absence of ego is you become spacious inside. You already always were spacious, but didn't know it.

But now you know it. And then suddenly the blessing comes. Peace comes.

Joy comes. It's there. Let's look at one more chapter.

It's quite short again, just less than a page. Of the inconstancy of our heart and of directing our final intention to God. Trust not to thy feeling.

Whatever it may be now, it will be quickly changed into another. As long as thou livest, thou art subject to change even against thy will. So as to be sometimes joyful, at other times sad.

Now at peace, again troubled. At one time devout, at another indevout. Sometimes fervent, at other times sluggish.

One day heavy, another elated. But he that is wise and well-instructed in spirit stands above all these changes, not minding what he feels in himself, nor on what side the wind of instability bloweth. But that the whole bent of his soul may be made conducive towards the due and wished for end.

For thus one and the same and unshaken can he stand, directing through all this variety of events the single eye of his intention unflinchingly towards me. God is speaking here. And the purer the eye of thy intention is with so much greater constancy will thou pass through these diverse storms.

So this is a wonderful teaching again. We experience fluctuating inner states, mental and emotional. As long as thou livest, thou art subject to change even against thy will.

Sometimes you're joyful, at other times sad. Now at peace, then troubled. One day devout, another indevout.

Fervent, sluggish, heavy, elated. But he points to the possibility of not minding what you feel in yourself. Those are the words.

Not minding what you feel in yourself, nor on what side the wind of instability bloweth. Not minding what is. Inner states becoming, in other words, the aware witness of your fluctuating inner states.

Then you can allow them to be. They no longer, I would say, they still arise, but they no longer create suffering. It's only when you are totally engaged in the inner states, identified with the inner states, that's suffering.

When you are the aware presence, you allow this feeling to be there, whatever it is. One day you are sluggish. One day you are elated.

One day you are this or that. But you are, in other words, you are rooted in the inner spaciousness, the aware space, and then allow the states to come and go. And again, this is basically Buddhist teaching.

It all comes together. So you see the oneness of that. All spiritual, true spiritual teachings.

And so in that dimension, you are no longer dependent on what happens or doesn't happen, either outside or inside. So what a wonderful teaching. I could read many more chapters to you.

I almost feel compelled to read one more, two more. So let's just a few more lines. God himself, herself, itself speaking, which is the unconditioned consciousness, the universal intelligence that is, it dwells within all life forms and is, of course, also beyond all life forms.

If in anything thou seekest thyself, thou presently faintest away within thyself and growest dry, principally therefore refer all things to me, for it is I that have given thee all. Consider each thing as flowing from the sovereign good, and therefore all must be returned to me as to their origin. Out of me, both little and great, poor and rich, as out of a living fountain draw living water, and they who freely and willingly serve me shall receive grace for grace.

But he who would glory in anything else beside me or delight in any good as his own shall not be established in true joy nor enlarged in his heart, but in many ways shall be impeded and straightened. Therefore thou must not ascribe any good to thyself nor attribute virtue to any man, but give all to God without whom man has nothing. Again, to attribute anything to yourself is a delusion, because all, whatever energy you have, whatever the life that you are, the consciousness that you are, and whatever comes out of that consciousness that you are as a creation, something that you do or achieve, where does it all come from?

It all comes from the one source of all life. It's not yours. Nothing is yours.

Because the moment you say, this is mine, you've created the illusion of separateness from the source, and then the flow from the source becomes greatly restricted. The moment the illusion of separateness arises, the flow from the source of all life becomes narrower and narrower, it's not coming through anymore. Of course, Jesus said the same when somebody called Jesus good man or whatever somebody called him, and Jesus said, do not call me good.

There, none is good but God alone. So he was very much aware of that, not attributing anything to yourself, and then power can move through you much more freely. It all comes from the one source.

And so then you can, without the ego, but ego means there's a self, you attribute something to yourself, and that's me. Without that, you can be a full expression of universal intelligence in whatever form it wants to take. Let's end with reading me again just these few lines here.

Out of me, both little and great, poor and rich, as out of a living fountain draw living water, and they who freely and willingly serve me shall receive grace for grace. There's only God. That's the basic truth.

There's only the one. And you are it. Thank you.

Something I don't normally do is to share with you a book and there are some books that I've loved for many years that are powerful, timeless, and you may have seen, already started by sharing with the Tao Te Ching, the ancient Chinese book of wisdom written 2,500 years ago and just as powerful as it was then, even in translation. And I don't know if you've seen the second one was the Ralph Waldo Emerson, not that old, 19th century, also containing timeless, powerful, spiritual truth. Books like that are more than books.

They're, I feel, almost life energy fields and they have a life of their own. After giving birth to the first time, the power of now, I had this feeling that I had given birth, it came through this form and suddenly it went off into the world and it had a life of its own. Not that much to do with me anymore and it went into the strangest places and caused all over the planet reaching people who were ready.

At least one copy of the power of now even reached the bottom of the Pacific Ocean. Somebody told me that he was on a yacht and it sank and the book went down with it. So when we talk about a book and I have chosen another one for today, let's bear in mind that we are not at a college or university, that's not our approach.

We're not actually studying the book as such but the book is more than a book. It consists of powerful pointers towards spiritual truth, awakening, realization. So we're looking through the book, not at the book.

We're looking through the book at ourselves because every significant book is about you. That applies even to literature. If you read an important, deeply alive work of literature, it's about the human condition, always in the story, hidden underneath the story is a truth about the human condition, which is you.

And the book is powerful because it is about you and even more directly so in a spiritual book. So that's really what we are looking at through the book at ourselves, at the truth of awakening or at dysfunctional mind patterns in ourselves, becoming aware of that. So there is running through, as far as these books are concerned, there's running through history, this thread of spiritual realization or truth that has been called by some people, I don't know who coined the phrase, perennial philosophy.

Perennial means everlasting, always there. Philosophy, not in the modern sense of abstract solving of puzzles, but the original meaning of philosophy was about change in consciousness, about how to live sanely in this world. And so the book I've chosen for today, again, a book I've lived with for many years.

This book was written approximately 1,900 years ago. And the amazing thing about the author of this book, one quote from this book is in the power of now, I'll tell you in a minute what it is. The author of this book is highly unusual.

He belongs to the rare species, extremely rare species that are sometimes called philosopher kings. That refers to people who have worldly power, but are not unconscious. Rare combination.

Worldly power and a high degree of consciousness, perhaps not absolutely awakened state, but a very high degree of consciousness and self-awareness. And that's extremely rare. So I've seen it, for example, I remember when I lived in London, I would often go into the British Museum where there's a huge and wonderful section on Egypt.

And there are particularly two gigantic carved granite stone heads of pharaohs of Egypt one a man and one a woman, huge size. And when I saw them for the first time, I felt both of them emanated such serenity that that must be the depiction of somebody who is in a state of absolute peace. There was no doubt because even the stone statue emanated that serenity with a much more powerful, more powerfully than most Buddha images, although occasionally you get beautiful Buddha images like that too.

They both have a very slight smile on their face, just a hint of a smile and wonderfully serene gaze. And I actually took photos of these two and I had them on my wall for many years. But now the photos have gone the way of all world or earthly things and been lost or dissolved.

But that's fine for the time being. If you ever go there, they're still there. The stone, the original stone heads and I'm sure you will find them easily.

Just walk around the British section in the Egyptian section in the British Museum on the ground floor and you will very easily find them. So philosopher king, those were pharaohs, they were the rulers, but at the same time, perhaps they lived in that state of awakened state, perhaps not completely, but conscious, very conscious state. And the book I've chosen for today belongs to the same, written by the same kind of being, a Roman emperor called Marcus Aurelius, who was emperor for about 20 years between approximately the year 160 and 180 after Christ.

And while he was emperor, he wrote that book. He's considered one of the most just and wise emperors in a huge number of emperors, many of which were, I could almost say, completely crazy, completely insane, with occasional interludes of sanity, but he perhaps was the most sane. This unfortunately was not the case as far as his son was concerned, who became emperor after him, who was one of the worst.

So the awakened state is not easily transmitted genetically. If you have seen the film Gladiator, the emperor in that film is called Commodus, and that's his son. And in the film, actually, Marcus Aurelius appears at the beginning of the film, and if I remember correctly, in the film he is killed by his son.

I don't think there's historical evidence for that, but it's quite possible that he did kill his father. The actor is so good who played Commodus, the mad emperor, his son, I believe his name is Phoenix, Joachim Phoenix. He's so good.

That was the first time I ever saw this actor, and whenever I see him in some other role now, I think, oh, there's the mad Roman emperor. Now, the book that he wrote was not meant to be a book and was not meant to be published. It was to himself, and for a while that was the title.

When later it was published, it was called To Himself, and then later the title became Meditations, and that's what it's called nowadays, Meditations. And so when he died, people found this collection of notes to himself, and all just very short notes, very rarely more than half a page, and often just two or three sentences. So they found these notes, and people must have realized that they were deeply significant, and they were published.

In other words, copied by hand, of course, and then distributed to some people. And for about 300 years, 200 years, 300 years, gradually the book became better known. The book couldn't spread as quickly as it happens nowadays because first there was no print, and there was no opera.

So. And then what happened was, what started then were the so-called dark ages, when very few, the Roman Empire collapsed, the destiny of all form. The Roman Empire collapsed, the so-called barbarians took over, smashed everything up.

And for 1,000 years, the book disappeared. Nobody heard of it. And miraculously, one or two copies survived somewhere.

Nobody knows where, in a monastery perhaps, because the only people who could read and write during those 1,000 years were monks in monasteries. They kept alive the literary and philosophical tradition. And 1,000 years later, somewhere the book reappeared, and somebody read it and said, wow.

And they started copying it again. And ever since then, it's been, when it spread, it has been known to people, and many people found it meaningful, and many people still do. So that's amazing how the life of a book, it can disappear for 1,000 years, and suddenly reappear again and be just as alive.

And now here we are in the year 2009, looking at a book that was written 2,000 years ago, and it's alive for us, as you will see in a minute. It is alive. It is vitally alive.

Imagine the equivalent of this would be in the year 4,000 people reading The Power of Now. Now this is an ideal book if you don't want continuous reading, but either read it in bed or wherever you are, open it, read one entry, two entries, one page. They're all unrelated entries.

The book is divided into chapters, but it's meaningless. Originally, it didn't have chapters, but the publishers these days thought, well, every book must have chapters, so we call it chapter one, two, three, but it's meaningless. It has some themes that recur, but otherwise, there's no division into subject or themes.

It's just thoughts that came to him, insights, realizations, and reminders to himself of how to live. So that probably means that he didn't quite live the truth all the time. He was not totally conscious all the time.

He needed to remind himself of the truth. So these pointers that he wrote down were to himself, and not he didn't realize that anybody would find these pointers powerful and meaningful. Anybody who had even the slightest opening to the truth within, they would then recognize the truth that's there in the book.

Amazing. So I'll show you here what I have. I have two books here.

One is an old edition and an older translation, Penguin Classic. It probably looks different these days. It may have a different cover.

I've had this book maybe for 25 years. For a while, it disappeared too. This, I didn't.

And then I got it again. I had it stored somewhere. This is the Meditations Penguin Classic, an older translation.

This was sent to me one or two years ago. I received it in the mail from the publisher, said, we've just published a new translation of Marcus Aurelius. And we realized that you quoted him in The Power of Now.

And I think you would like to have a look at it. A very different translation by Gregory Hayes. The publisher is The Modern Library.

I love them both. This translation is more formal and serene. This translation is more modern and impactful and concise.

And this one is... So in a book like that, as with the Tao Te Ching, where I also gave you sometimes alternative translations, it's good to look at two different translations to have two different approaches to the same truth and see how different a translation can be. Now, you might think since he was a Roman emperor, he would have written this book in Latin, but he didn't.

The original is written in Greek. Every highly educated Roman would be virtually bilingual. And Greek was a language in ancient Rome of culture and philosophy.

And so naturally, when talking about these subjects, they would use the Greek language. So it's a translation from ancient Greek. Marcus Aurelius lived at a time when Christianity had just come to Rome.

But he doesn't mention Christianity. Apparently, there's one mentioned somewhere. I haven't found it yet.

But they believe that a later copyist put that in. He was aware, he must have been aware of Christianity. And many people have said that many of the truths that he speaks of seem to show a Christian influence.

But that is not an external influence. I believe it's something that came from within. Because the time of Christ was a second wave of spiritual awakening coming.

The one, well, not perhaps the second, perhaps third or fourth. One very powerful wave was, as I meant at some other time, the time of the Buddha. And Lao Tse, who wrote the Tao Te Ching, was an enormous influx of spiritual truth.

It seems to come in waves. The awakening of humanity comes in waves. There comes a wave of...

Suddenly, it flows from within. It flows into humans. And then the wave subsides.

And unconsciousness returns. Not completely, perhaps. But it's going...

Ooh. It's like somebody... Let's say humanity is a single human being that is asleep and dreaming.

And this human being doesn't wake up like... This human being wakes up out of the dream world. A lot of the dream is nightmares.

It goes... And dreams on. But perhaps not quite as deeply.

And then comes another... Oh. Self-awareness.

And then it's overtaken again by sleep. Can't keep my eyes open anymore. Another thousand years of the Dark Ages.

And then something shocks it. Perhaps some deep... Some suffering.

Some enormous collective pain. Like something hitting you. Wake up!

Life says, wake up! And you go... In our case, I believe that that hit by life on you that wakes you up was the 20th century.

The madness of the 20th century. The dreadfulness of history. 20th century history.

This dreadful suffering was... Like shaking you awake. And this is why from a larger perspective, even the dreadfulness has its place.

Because ultimately, it's part of the dream. The dreadfulness of the madness of it all. The 20th century.

Even that has its place. And perhaps we would not be here... It's almost...

Don't want to say something like that. But perhaps we would not be here if it hadn't been for the enormous suffering. Self-inflicted by humans on humans.

And so that served perhaps as an awakener. And this is why we are now experiencing another very powerful wave. Perhaps the last.

Perhaps leading to a permanent awakening. A permanent shift. I'm not absolutely sure that this wave is the last one that leads to a permanent shift in consciousness.

So that from now on, humanity or large section of humanity can live consciously without losing it again. However, if we look at history, we see that, yes, it seems to come in waves. Perhaps this is a wave.

Perhaps even this will have to subside again. Perhaps there will be another period of darkness. And then finally the shift will happen.

That's possible too. It doesn't really matter. There is an awakening here happening now.

That's all we need to know. And to be part of that. So that it happens through you.

That's all that matters. And it's never lost. No awakening is ever lost.

Even though humanity may go back to sleep for a while. Who knows? And yet, no gain in consciousness is ever lost.

Then the sleep won't be quite as deep. And there will always be some humans who stay awake. Even if collective sleep should return.

Hopefully not. Would be dreadful. But you can see there is the sleep state.

You can even when you watch the television. CNN. Partly there are some people who are very unconscious still.

And occasionally there are some people who bring in, who seem to be more awake than others. Much more. I'm not mentioning any names.

Now, Marcus Aurelius was not, you might have said, well, he must have had a great life. He was a Roman emperor. Lived in a life of luxury.

And well, he didn't. He spent many years fighting. It was a tradition for many emperors not to stay in Rome when there was a war.

They would actually go out and lead the soldiers into a battle. Maybe not personally with a sword. But they would be present where the Romans were defending their empire from the barbarians in the north.

And for years he lived there. Living through the agony of Germany's winters. And no central heating, of course.

And he was getting old. And not that many pleasures. And during that time, he wrote this book.

In The Power of Now, I mention one entry from the book. And I haven't looked at it recently. But I may actually have misquoted it.

Because when I wrote The Power of Now, I didn't have any books with me. So I caught it from memory. But the correct quote, I believe, from this is, and this is the old Serene Translation.

I didn't have this one then. It says, Love nothing but what comes to you woven in the pattern of your destiny for what could more aptly fit your needs. Love nothing but that which comes to you woven in the pattern of your destiny.

For what could more aptly fit your needs. The pattern of your destiny is the totality in which you move. And whatever you encounter, whatever situation you encounter in life, in this moment, the only moment there is, must be part of this web of the pattern of your destiny.

Where everything is connected with everything else. This is why I sometimes say, I speak of the inevitability of the form of the present moment. It happens because why is this happening now?

It could not happen otherwise. The entire history of the world has brought about the form of this moment, obviously. It has produced the form that this moment takes.

And that is the web, that is the pattern. And to go against that, is insane, to not accept it. So one theme that runs through it is to live in a state of non-resistance to what is.

Oh, so amazing that... He didn't call it non-resistance to what is, but that is the basic message. And that reoccurs many times in the book.

So let's have a look perhaps at one or two. The last few days I've been re-reading it and marking a few entries that I want to share with you. And I love it.

I can't put it down. And it's not because I can't put it down because there's some what's going to next in it, because there is no next. There's only this entry and then this entry, because it's so alive.

Oh, so much. That's good. I don't know where to start.

Let's start with a very, very short. To shrug it all off and wipe it clean, every annoyance and distraction and reach utter stillness. Don't need more than that.

Shrug it all off, wipe it all clean, every annoyance and distraction and reach utter stillness. That's the first and the last lesson. Now just, what does this serene translation say about this?

It's more poetic, but less powerful perhaps. Oh, the consolation of being able to thrust aside and cast into oblivion every tiresome intrusive impression and in an instant be utterly at peace. Now, as you notice, this translator uses stillness.

This translator uses peace. Of course, it is the same thing. Peace is inner stillness.

So according to your inclination, some may prefer one translation. Others may prefer the other. It is only the form in which it comes.

The essential truth behind the form is the same, of course. And that is so you may love. We talked previously about loving the form, having an affinity for the form and calling that love and recognizing the essence, which is love.

So you might have an affinity with one or the other form of this book, one translation or the other, that has nothing to do with it. The essence is the same. So that's fine.

It's just form and essence. Some forms are easier for others to use, for some people to use than others. So it doesn't really matter which one.

But that ability to shrug it all off and wipe it clean, every annoyance and distraction and reach utter stillness, that possibility is there at any moment to say, I'm just returning completely to this moment, which means you shrug it off, you wipe all distraction, all mental accumulations completely back in the present moment. No problem. There's no problem here now.

That in itself is a meditation. If you can remember that when you are not at peace, the possibility of returning to the present moment, you can call it like, usually one lives, one's intention is here in the past and here in the future. And so the focus of your consciousness is either there in the past or here in the future.

But it's not where life is happening, which is here. And you're interpreting the life that's here through the past or through fears and expectations about what you want, future, past and future, clouding your vision of what is. Of course, it's confusing.

You get confused. And so you separate. Ah, you wake up out of the dream.

The present moment is actually fine. Yeah, but what about tomorrow? Well, when it comes, it'll be the present moment.

The ability just to see how unproblematic the present moment is. The problem arises from something else, past and future. Where is past and future?

In thinking. Here, there are one or two translations. I've changed a word or two to make it even, well, in my view, better.

Nothing that goes on in anyone else's mind can harm you. Nothing that goes on in anyone else's mind can harm you. Nor can the shifts and changes in the world around you.

Then where is harm to be found? In your tendency to see it. It refers to harm.

In your tendency to see harm. Stop doing that and everything will be fine. Let the part of you that makes that judgment keep quiet.

Even if the body it's attached to is stabbed or burned or stinking with pus or consumed by cancer. Or to put it another way, it needs to realize that what happens to everyone, bad and good alike, is neither good nor bad. That what happens in every life, lived naturally or not, is neither natural nor unnatural.

Important phrase here is, let the part of you that makes that judgment keep quiet. The judgment that harm has happened. Without that, all you're ever faced with is the isness of the present moment.

The rest is an interpretation or a story. And it is in your power to let go of the interpretation which is unnecessary and simply be with what is. Don't impose a story on it and strengthen your identity by fighting what is.

It's about living in a different, from a different consciousness. People try to get away from it all, to the country, to the beach, to the mountains. You always wish that you could too, which is silly.

You can get away from it any time you like, by going within. Nowhere you can go is more peaceful, more free of interruptions than your own soul. In an instant's recollection, and there it is, an instant's recollection, and there it is, complete tranquility.

And by tranquility, I mean a kind of harmony. So keep getting away from it all like that. Renew yourself.

Getting away from it all, that expression, many people want that. And of course, ultimately, the only way to get away from it all is to go within. Now, in the little book, Guardians of Being, which some of you may have seen about dogs and cats, there's a little cartoon where the man walks with his dog and says to his dog, oh, isn't it nice to get away from it all?

They're walking out in the country. And the dog says, I suppose so, although I don't have that much of an all to get away from. Another theme that runs through it is impermanence, the fleetingness of all things.

And from the point of view of the practical man or woman, they would say, I don't want to hear, this is very negative, to be reminded of death or of the end of things. The practical man or woman says, no, I just want to get on with life. I don't want to be reminded of death.

And yet, eventually, it'll catch up with you. And then it's a bit late. And if you've been identified with form all your life, and finally the end approaches, it's very painful, extremely painful when the forms around you begin to collapse and you become aware of the imminent dissolution of your own form, it's dreadful.

And the dimension of depth cannot develop in you as long as you're identified with form. If you do not see the fleetingness of all forms, you remain shallow. So this is why I wrote somewhere, any civilization that denies death, that doesn't want to hear about it, like Western civilization still, doesn't want to hear about death, denies death, is shallow.

And the amazing thing about impermanence is that the realization of impermanence opens up in you the dimension of space or stillness when it is not resisted. This is why many spiritual teachings point to the fact of impermanence of all form as a device, as a teaching device. Because the moment you see that, how fleeting everything is, and don't resist it, something in you feels suddenly very spacious and peaceful.

And this could happen even if you go to, here in the West, you can't do it. But if you go to India, you could go when a person dies in India, the body is taken very, just a few hours after death, because it's hot, you can't keep bodies for very long. The body is taken to the cremation grounds, out in public, hot, dreadful, in public.

The body is taken to cremation grounds and there's a huge fire and is placed into the fire and all the relatives, they watch the body burn. And that, of course, many cry, but it is a deeply spiritual thing to watch the destiny, the fate of all forms, to actually see it, not as an abstract truth. You can have an abstract truth, it's, yes, everybody dies eventually, and when they die, the body dissolves.

Okay, that's an abstract, you don't really know it. And if you're a young person, up to the age of 30, perhaps, okay, you've been told, or you think, you know, you are going to die one day, you don't really believe it, that you are going to die, it's not me. Maybe at the age of 30, for the first time, for a second, an inkling comes to you that you may be mortal.

Or as I heard, I read an interview with a young person and she said, in her 20s, she said, oh, I'm not worried about death because by the time I reach that age, they will have invented something. So, soon you will be ashes or bones, a mere name at most, and even that is just a sound, an echo. The things we want in life are empty, stale and trivial, dogs snarling at each other, quarreling children, laughing and then bursting into tears a moment later.

Ordinary human existence, dogs, dogs snarling at each other. Children, quarreling children, laughing and then bursting into tears. And then they die.

So, he constantly reminds himself of the fleetingness of life. And why is he doing that? That must have given him inner peace and stillness.

And again, why is this happening? Why can, why potentially can the realization of fleetingness give you inner stillness? Because something in you, that that in you which recognizes the birth and death of forms is not form, it's consciousness.

So, there must be something eternal or timeless and non, something that is not form in you to recognize formlessness. I said somewhere in the book, if the whole world were blue, you wouldn't see any blue. In order to see blue, there must be something that's not blue.

So, in order to recognize the fact of impermanence, and to see there must be something in a faculty in you that is not part of that impermanence, and that is timeless, and that is consciousness itself. So, when you see the form, you disidentify, when you see the form dissolving, and this could be in your life with a simple thing, like some kind of loss. It doesn't have to be death every time.

Some kind of loss in your life. It could be the loss of a job, the loss of your investments, the loss of your partner, of someone close to you. Perhaps they leave you.

They may not die, but it's the same. Separation, the loss of certain life circumstances, the loss of your home. Many people in these economically difficult times are experiencing, for example, the loss of their home.

And again, home, your house where you live, is something important in the world of form that you identify with as part of who you are. It is very painful to be deprived of that, but potentially, there is here the possibility of disidentification from form. And there, suddenly, you find yourself, although most people in this country, you lose their home, most, some do, but most people eventually find some other home.

Most. And even if you don't find another home and you find yourself on a park bench, this could be a moment of complete disidentification from that which you thought you needed to sustain your life, or the forms, to psychologically sustain your sense of who you are. You've lost that.

And what are you left with then? What's left after you've been deprived of the forms that gave you your, what you thought was a foundation for your life? When life takes away the forms that you thought were the foundation of your life, what is left?

The life that needs no foundation, that is the foundation, the formless, the essence. And this is why many people, many people have to go through loss to awaken to that. Some of the happiest times in my life I spent on a park bench without a home was beautiful.

No, I'm not saying this will happen to you. Some people read the introduction to The Power of Now where I talk about having no home for a while and sitting around on park benches and they close. Oh no, I don't want to go that way.

Dealing with people, that was one of his things. He often reminds himself of how to deal with other people. Don't be irritated at people's smell or bad breath.

Now he's using really, he's using that as a metaphor for something else, being irritated at the behavior of people. But he uses that, don't be irritated at people's smell or bad breath. What's the point?

With that mouth, with those armpits, they are going to produce that odor. And then he argues with himself. The next line says, but they have a brain.

Can't they figure it out? Can't they recognize the problem? And then he answers, so you have a brain as well.

Good for you. Then use your logic to awaken his. Show him, make him realize it.

If he'll listen, then you'll have solved the problem without anger, which means point out, don't react to other people's unconsciousness. They, whatever behavior they manifest comes out of their state of consciousness. This is why he says, with that mouth and those armpits, have to produce that odor that just follows.

Why be angry about that? Why react? Use, you have a brain, which means you can, instead of asking them to be conscious, be conscious yourself.

And then he says, use your logic to awaken his. Now, when he uses the word logic, we have to, it's deeper than what we know as logic. According to the philosophy of which he was a part, which is called stoicism, there is such a thing or no thing that is called logos in Greek.

And logos is often translated wrongly, I believe, as the word. Logos is translated as the word, for example, at the beginning of the gospel of St. John, where it says, in the beginning was the word and the word was with God and the word was God. Now, what he translates, what in St. John is translated as the word is the Greek word logos. This is the origin because the gospels are written in Greek. The word logos says, in the beginning was the logos and the logos was with God and the logos was God. That is, logos, the fact that the writer of the gospel of John uses the word logos means that he was familiar with Greek philosophy.

So he uses a term that was already at the time of writing, was already 400 years old, logos, and incorporates that into the Christian teaching. So we have Greek philosophy coming into Christian teaching. But the logos in that school of philosophy, and that is why it's part of the perennial philosophy of spiritual truth, the logos really is consciousness.

The logos, they're regarded as an intelligence that pervades the entire universe, that animates and pervades. It is also the intelligence that makes it possible for you to think, but it is deeper than thinking. It is intelligence that sustains the body and created the body.

It is this intelligence that underlies the whole. That is the logos. And the teaching of Marcus Aurelius or what he reminds himself of is to live at one with that intelligence.

Consciously, in conscious oneness with that intelligence, with this consciousness itself.

So when he says use your logic, it means you live in alignment with that universal intelligence. And you cannot live in alignment with that universal intelligence if you resist life, if you resist what is, if you complain about life, if you have a quarrel with life, the present moment.

And there's a beautiful, if I can find it, piece on that. I can't find it. But I know it more or less from memory.

He says, if you quarrel with your circumstances, you are like a tumor or an abscess in reality, in the world of form. You become like a tumor or an abscess if you quarrel with what is internally or out aloud. You're like an abscess on the world.

And many people, of course, if you observe human life, many people live like that. They live in, if not continuous resistance to circumstances. Circumstances consisting of the other people, what people say or do, what people don't say, but should have said, or don't do, but should have done, and so on.

All that is circumstances. And the habitual state of consciousness is to quarrel with circumstances, with what is. And so he describes that, that you make yourself into an abscess.

You are out of alignment. It's like some growth. You may not realize how widespread that state of consciousness is, that lives, even if it's just 50%, that it's half your life living out of alignment with life.

And for many people, it's more than 50% of their life. There are many people who, almost 100% of their life, are quarreling with circumstances, internally or out aloud. Whatever is in the present.

They're complaining. Isn't that amazing to live like that? And he saw the insanity of that.

So do you want to be an abscess? And of course, most of you don't do that anymore, except occasionally. And this is a good moment for a humorous interlude.

Somebody gave me a card. A card that he gave to his wife. And he showed it to me.

And I liked it. I don't know why he gave it to his wife. And he showed it to me.

And I loved it so much. And I said, oh, I'd love to have that. And then he got one for me.

It's all about complaining, of course. So the card shows this woman. It's apparently from a TV show called Saturday Night Live.

And this woman looks very unhappy. And the card says so. I don't know if you'll be able to hear it.

It's a little digital recording. She's going to say something when I open the card. The card says so.

When you open the card, it says, how are things with you? And then she tells you how things are with her. I suppose I have to hold to my microphone here.

How are things with you?

[Speaker 2] (7:23:37 - 7:23:48)

I'm depressed, I guess.

[Speaker 1] (7:24:11 - 8:12:19)

Now, the reason why it's funny is because it's so close to the truth of many people. Just a slight, maybe very slight, exaggeration. Not that much.

Choose not to be harmed. And you won't feel harmed. Don't feel harmed.

And you haven't been. This, again, is about not creating a story in your mind. This is what he did to me.

This is what he did. And then it goes on. He did that.

Talk about it. Think about it. This is, you're creating a substitute reality.

You're creating a huge superstructure, mental superstructure, on top of the simplicity of what is. If you don't do that, it's almost as if nothing happened. Even if somebody cut off your arm, if you don't complain, if you don't make it into a story, nothing much happened.

Don't. So, choose not to be harmed, and you won't feel harmed. It's not, what he's really saying is, do not create a superstructure of story making.

Impose it on reality, and believe that to be more real than the simplicity of what is. It's amazing. And again, of course, this is still a lesson that most humans have to learn.

Impermanence. Little point, again, to impermanence. He is reminding himself of, he says, the age of Vespasian.

Vespasian was an emperor about 80 years before him. The age of Vespasian, for example. People doing the exact same things.

Marrying, raising children, getting sick, dying, waging war, throwing parties, doing business, farming, flattering, boasting, distrusting, plotting, hoping others will die, complaining about their own lives, falling in love, putting away money, seeking high office and power. And that life they led is nowhere to be found. Or the age of Trazan.

Trazan lived 40 years before him. He was emperor then. The exact same things.

And that life, too, gone. Survey the records of other eras and see how many others gave their all and soon died and decomposed into the elements that formed them. All gone.

But most of all, run through the list of those you knew yourself. Those who worked in vain, who failed to do what they should have, what they should have remained fixed on and found satisfaction in. This last sentence, what he means by that is, who worked in vain, who failed to do what they should have, what they should have remained fixed on and found satisfaction in.

Their entire attention was on the world of form. He's really saying their entire attention throughout their lives was on the world of form. And he gives this whole list.

And of course, the list that he gives, marrying, raising children, doing business, flattering, boasting, plotting, putting money away, is still exactly the same these days. No difference from 2,000 years ago. And so the entire attention is on the things, the stuff around you.

And this is why he says they worked in vain, because what they should have remained fixed on, or at least there should have been a balance in their life of what I previously called the formless and the world of form. What I express sometimes in, you may remember this, the formless and the world of form. It's your life to have a balance in your life.

And for most people, there is no balance. There is only form. And that is such a waste.

They are not focused on the eternal. They are unaware of the eternal within. Jesus talks about that also when the famous story of the two sisters, when he visits a house, Martha and Mary.

And Martha is concerned about getting everything ready. Let's see, you have to do this and that, and the cooking has to be done, and this has to be done. She's agitated and stressed.

And Mary is sitting there listening to Jesus. And Jesus says, Martha says to Jesus, please tell her to help me. She's just sitting there.

I've got so many important things to do. Jesus says, well, she has chosen only one thing is necessary, and she has chosen that one thing. When Jesus says only one thing is necessary, what he means is only one thing is absolute, is absolutely important.

Everything else may be important, but it is only relatively important. Your job, your relationships, your home situation, your financial situation, your health situation, whatever you have in the world of form is relatively important, yes, but not absolutely important. But what determines whether your life ultimately has meaning or not is whether the dimension of depth, the stillness, the spaciousness, the formless essence, whether you realize that within yourself or whether your life is consumed completely by the world of form, which includes the thinking mind.

Then your thoughts, this is primordial form. Thought is primordial form. Your thoughts then consume your entire consciousness and the things of this world, which are really all become thoughts in your head.

You don't have a relationship with your car or your house. What you really have a relationship with is the mental concept of car and house. And so ultimately, all the things of this world are your mind.

And you don't even know whether there is such a thing as a car out there. Maybe all the cars we see in LA are just in your mind. Philosophers have spoken about whether what we perceive out there is actually there.

And nobody can know for sure is there even such a thing as an outside. Amazing question, but let's not go into that. And ultimately, it actually is helpful as the Course in Miracles recommends that you consider everything that you see as being inside you.

This is almost as a kind of spiritual practice. And that's quite an amazing thing. If everything that you see, if you can practice it for a day or half a day or an hour, that everything inside is actually inside you.

What, that obnoxious person is inside me? And of course, if it's inside you, it changes. Ultimately, the division between inner and outer is not really there.

But let's put that aside. Let's stay with the practical. Again, a little entry about the story making in your mind, giving things a significance that they don't really have.

Like seeing roasted meat and other dishes in front of you and suddenly realizing this is a dead fish, a dead pig, or that this no longer exists. Noble vintage, whatever it's called, is grape juice. Of course, it is fermented grape juice.

And the purple robes, the Roman emperors would wear purple robes, and the purple robes are sheep wool dyed with shellfish blood or making love. Something rubbing against your penis, a brief seizure, and a little cloudy liquid. Well, that destroys many illusions.

Perceptions like that, latching onto things and piercing through them so we see what they really are. That's what we need to do all the time, all through our lives, when things lay claim to our trust, to lay them bare and see the truth. How pointless they are to strip away the legend that encrusts them so that you're not deceived by the world of form.

So good to see that when you see advertising. It doesn't mean you can't enjoy things, but not get into some illusory realm. They inhabit some illusory mental realm because then the world will take you over and devour your entire consciousness when you don't look through things.

Amazing. Our inward power, when it obeys nature, when it says nature, by the way, it again really is one of the many ways in which you can translate logos. So in alignment with consciousness itself, our inward power, when it obeys nature, reacts to events by accommodating itself to what it faces, to what is possible.

It needs no specific material. It pursues its own aims as circumstances allow. It turns obstacles into fuel as a fire overwhelms what would have quenched a lamp.

What's thrown on top of the conflagration is absorbed, consumed by it, and makes it burn still higher. Obstacles, challenges, when they are not avoided but faced, when they're not resisted internally, it uses the words reacting to events by accommodating yourself to what you face as a consciousness rather than rejecting what you face. Then whatever challenge comes into your life, and I say the same in The Power of Now, it becomes fuel for your, as I say, it becomes fuel for your consciousness.

Any difficulty in your life, any challenge in your life, if it's not avoided, denied, rejected, complained about, saying life shouldn't be happening to me, it's accepted as it happens, then it becomes fuel for the flame of consciousness. And you grow, consciousness grows, comes through you more and more. And then also at the same time, not only does that free you from the suffering, the self-inflicted suffering that is there when you reject what is, does not only free you from suffering, it also brings a power in that deals then with the situation.

So use whatever challenge comes into your life, you use it as a kind of fuel for the flame of consciousness. And that is done through surrender to what is. And some people need more of that than others.

If you choose presence in your daily life, you may not need the drastic challenges. You remember the, like life shaking you awake. If you wake up and stay awake, life doesn't need to shake you awake.

If you go to sleep continuously and the universal impulse of consciousness is of course towards awakening, then life needs to shake you. Let's look at something from the poetic translation. There's a type of person who, if he renders you a service, has no hesitation in claiming the credit for it.

Another, though not prepared to go so far as that, will nevertheless secretly regard you as in his debt and be fully conscious of what he has done. But there's also the man who one might almost say has no consciousness at all of what he has done, like the vine which produces a cluster of grapes and then having yielded its rightful fruit, looks to no more thanks than a horse that has run it through his race, a hound that has tracked his quarry or a bee that has hived her honey. Like them, the man who has done one good action does not cry it aloud, but passes straight on to a second as the vine passes on to the bearing of another summer's grapes.

How to live without ego, claim I did that for you, or claiming credit, but something is done and you move on, like nature. So, and then he sometimes has a dialogue with himself. So now he writes, according to you then, we should rank ourselves with things that act unconsciously.

Is that how we should live? Like the vine or like a horse that has run its race and then forgets about it, doesn't say I did that. And then he replies, exactly, yet we should do so consciously.

So be like, be as much in alignment as the things of nature that live unconsciously, live in the same kind of alignment with life as the vine, as the horse, as nature, but do that consciously. And that's an interesting point because that is the alignment that you naturally live in before the mind takes you over and before the mind creates separation between yourself and reality, yourself and the world, yourself and other people. Before that happens, you live in a natural alignment with what is.

So there's nobody, there's no ego that says, I did that. There are still some humans whose mind is not highly developed. They would perhaps be called retarded.

Some humans, their mind is not developed enough yet to have an ego. And those humans also can live in that simplicity. I've pointed out before, if this is, for example, in the film, Forrest Gump, you have a human who would be considered virtually almost on the brink of retarded.

And he does, first of all, life always gives him what he needs. Things come to him. Secondly, even when he accomplishes great things, for example, he goes to Vietnam, he saves many people out of the, carries them on his, he says, well, nobody there to claim credit for it.

He hasn't got an ego. He just tells the story of what he did. That's what happened.

That's what I did. There's no ego there to say, I did that. And so that's the pre-egoic state, like nature.

So this is what he talks about, is we can live like that, but consciously. That's the next stage. And this is the reason why the simpleton or the fool and the enlightened person have a lot in common.

And why sometimes the simpleton or the fool or the enlightened person can be mistaken. The enlightened person can be mistaken for a fool, and the fool can be mistaken for an enlightened person. The latter being the case in the nice film with Peter Sellers, Being There, where the fool is being mistaken for a highly unconscious being.

They are close. The human being in whom the ego has not yet arisen can be used more easily by the logos, to use that term, by universal intelligence, because it's not the power of the logos, which is consciousness, it's not obstructed by the ego. And this is why there are many ancient legends and myths, mythology, where the fool has an important mission.

That's an archetypal motive in mythology and literature. The fool can do something that the great heroes cannot do. And again, it's the power of the egoless state, even if it's pre-ego.

As the most recent example of that, of course, is the Hobbit, Lord of the Rings. The simple guy, little and not particularly intelligent, only he can do this important, accomplish this important mission, not the powerful heroes, because they have an ego. But our destiny is to live in that alignment with power, consciously.

And when that shift happens, your life becomes empowered by the universal consciousness, the logos, and it manifests through you, one way or another. Then the sense of I, of the doer, I have to do that, goes. And that's good news and bad news.

Then suddenly, you achieve things when you have become free of ego, if not 100%, maybe 90%. It's enough for you to achieve great things. If you become free of ego, you achieve things that before the ego would have done anything to get you there.

But of course, you couldn't do it with the ego. And when you've achieved it, unfortunately, the sense of I did that isn't there. So you don't get that satisfaction.

You get a satisfaction of being in alignment with power, but you have no personal satisfaction. Oh, that's a pity. My ego would have liked to have written the power of now at the age of 25.

I did that. Of course, I couldn't have. The ego can't write that.

It's not in alignment with power, the power of now. The ego is a denial of the power of now, so it can't write the power of now. I'll just open it at random now.

There's so much good in here, it's so wonderful. Don't let your imagination be crushed by life as a whole. Don't try to picture everything bad that could possibly happen.

Stick with the situation at hand, which means the present moment, and ask, why is this so unbearable? Why can't I endure it? You'll be embarrassed to answer.

Then remind yourself that past and future have no power over you, only the present. And even that can be minimized, which means the power that the present circumstances have over you, even that can be minimized. Just mark off its limits.

And if your mind tries to claim that it can't hold out against that, well then, heap shame upon it. The simplicity, if you keep to the simplicity of the present moment, can I deal with this situation? Always.

The power is there. Can I deal with what might happen tomorrow? No.

You don't have the power to do that for the simple reason that it doesn't exist. It's not here. Will I be able to deal with?

No, you won't. You can only deal with the present. The power can only come into the present.

You don't need to have it for tomorrow. Oh, sorry, I forgot that you were there. So you see that the perennial philosophy of the spiritual truth runs through from the most ancient times to now the same truth coming through different words, different forms, it's there.

The truth of awakening, living in alignment with the greater intelligence, the truth of surrender to the present moment, the truth of letting go, of imposing stories on reality, the mind, not live in the mind, compulsive thinking, waking up to sanity. You can read a book like that. That is part of the perennial philosophy.

When you need it, you can read it because you need a reminder, a little pointer. You can even have several copies, one in your bathroom, one by your bedside, one in your office. Book like that, Tao Te Ching is like that, meditations by Marx Aurelius.

There's no continuous text. It's not, you can open anywhere, read a line or two. You can do it with Stillness Speaks also.

Open it, read a line or two. Even The Power of Now on New Earth, you can do that and other spiritually alive books. And they're to be used as a reminder, but not a substitute, a substitute for living it.

So if you use the device that is here meant to remind you and to point the way, if you, anything that is done to excess, no matter how good, turns into bad. So there is such a thing as an over-reliance, over-use of reminders, of pointers, where you almost compulsively read. Yes, you're taking in some energy.

Yes, it does something. And yet in your daily life, you're still not, you're not living it. And so it can happen.

It does happen to some people that the reading of spiritual books or going to seminars or workshops or retreats or listening to speakers becomes a substitute for living it in every moment of your life. So you need to find the balance between using the help that the universe offers you. It's beautiful in the form of a teacher or so-called teacher.

It's just, there is no teacher as such. It's only, teacher is a function. I am a teacher when I sit in this chair.

But when I leave this room, I'm not a teacher anymore. It's only a function. It's not my identity to be a teacher.

It's a, that would be a form identity. So, but use the so-called teacher or teaching as a help. Don't get attached too much to the form of the teaching so that you can't let go.

Some people get attached to teachers. That's not the case with me because I work mostly with large groups. So it's more difficult to get attached to me as a teacher.

It's all in you. And if this book is powerful or any other spiritual book is powerful, how do you feel? Where is that power that you feel that's in the book?

Or the clarity or the spiritual power that you feel is in the teacher? How do you know that this is in the, that it's in the teacher? There must be something in you that recognizes it.

Because there are others to whom a spiritual book would be meaningless. So that in them which could recognize is not awake. They don't, a spiritual book is empty words.

This is still the case with some newspapers and magazines. They just, there's nobody in the entire newspaper or magazine that has any inner access to spiritual teaching, any form. And it could be a, I believe the entire New York Times, although it's a good paper, they don't have a single person who is open to it.

So whenever anything spiritual is mentioned, I read something again yesterday in the New York Times, they have to kind of distort it and make it into something slightly absurd. It says a certain number of people in the States have said they've had some kind of realization of the divine or God. And when they report it, they have to make it into something absurd.

There must be a funny angle to that. They have a realization of God. This is weird.

So there are still people who don't. So when you see that you feel the truth of it, it must be in you, otherwise you wouldn't see it. So the power is in you.

And the answer is in you. And you are the answer to all your searches, whatever your search is. You are the goal.

You are the answer. It's never outside. And then, of course, a time comes when you don't need any more spiritual books, but you can still enjoy them.

And it's a different kind of reading. You read a spiritual book. Wow, this is beautiful.

Yes, yes, yes. You read like, oh, yes, yes. That's it.

And there is an enjoyment in reading it. That's beautiful. And you don't need it anymore, but you enjoy it.

If the impulse comes, write down your own insights. When they come, they may come to you. You can be like Marcus Aurelius and write down a little out of the stillness, little, oh, even if they seem not that significant, write it down.

Then perhaps more comes because you've given it some attention. It has come as an original thought and you've given it some attention. Everybody knows, well, psychotherapists who work with analyzed dreams, they know that if you pay attention to your dreams, then more comes.

You remember them more and more and more significant dreams. That's at least about what Jung said. Carl Jung said, if you give attention to your dreams then and write them down.

This is not what I recommend here. Daily life is enough of a dream. You can do it.

I'm not saying don't, but what I'm saying is you give attention you appreciate, then more comes. So if you give attention to an original thought that comes to you rather than saying, oh, this is not important enough to write down, just write it down, then perhaps more comes. And then perhaps after a while, you have another book like this or whatever form it takes.

You don't write. You don't write. You can't write a book like that.

I can't write a book that is powerful. You as the person, no person can do that and you don't have to. It's only if there's openness in you.

And again, it's the, if you're too much in the form, the power doesn't flow through. If you access the formless stillness space, that's where the power flows through. And it does it through this form.

And if some of you become spiritual teachers, in quotation marks, or you already are in some way, in some way you already, if that consciousness, if the awakening consciousness is arising in you, you cannot not teach because your daily life and your interactions with other people become, you teach by being present. You teach presence. Even if you say nothing about presence.

By being present in daily life and in your interactions with others, you teach presence. And so that is part of your purpose in life. Now, whether it or not becomes a more formal teaching situation, that may be the case or may not be the case with you.

But again, you can't do it. If you feel, I'm now ready to be a spiritual teacher, that's probably not it. But if you have the feeling, I don't really know anything, that could be it.

And not afraid of not knowing anything. If you have the feeling, I don't know anything, and you get what I should know, then that's not, doesn't work. But not knowing is the most powerful state.

I said that previously. Not knowing and then see what words come. You can start by giving, if you have not doing so already, give little talks in your living room or somebody else's living room or not to your relatives, because they may not listen to you.

Remember what happened to Jesus when he went back to his own village. Nobody wanted to listen to him. Who is this guy here?

Do we know who he is? He's the son of such and such. Who does he think he is?

And if they'd had newspaper at the time, they would have had self-proclaimed master misleading the multitudes. Well, thank you to the form of Marcus Aurelius. The consciousness, of course, wrote the book, The Timeless Consciousness.

But it came through the form. The form was transparent enough for it to come through. We don't need to ask, well, was he enlightened or not?

Irrelevant. It was transparent enough for that power to come through. And of course, in your life also, that's the important question, is not, am I enlightened?

Am I going to be enlightened or fully awake or whatever? No. At this moment, are you dense as the form, opaque?

The more negative, the more identified with thought, the more dense you are as an energy field, not transparent. So the only important question is, at this moment, are you that transparency? So the form is still there, but it has lost its density, that is the ego, that is identification with thinking, that is every negative emotion.

You become contracted and dense. And when that goes through acceptance, surrender, alignment with what is, space opens up rather than space becomes more important than form. And you feel that.

You feel that in yourself. The space that you are is more important than the form that you are. And you feel that in yourself as you feel that primarily, you are your space.

Very much secondary is, yes, you're also here as a body with a past and certain psychological makeup and some thoughts, but it's secondary. And with that comes an enormous trust. If you can feel that primarily, you are space, which you cannot define.

You can't say, you don't really have a concept anymore of exactly who you are. As long as you think you know who you are, that's not who you are. But when you no longer know who you are and become comfortable with not knowing who you are, then you're beginning to be who you are.

No opinion really anymore of who you are. You're just a space of consciousness. Can't really just say much more.

And so you're neither good or bad as that space of consciousness. You're not good or bad. You're beyond good and bad.

The opposites don't apply anymore. Your past becomes irrelevant if you are that space of timeless consciousness, which is what you are. Your past is secondary.

You can talk about it still and laugh about it, but it's not important, which is good news if your past isn't... It's good news if your past isn't that great. But if you're very proud of your past and your achievements, then perhaps you want to hang on.

So that can be an obstacle. The great things that I did, I did them. And so the trust that comes when you are a space, when you feel that you move around simply as a simple space of consciousness, fear goes, disappears from life, because fear is only...

Identification with form produces fear. Identification with space is freedom from fear.

2018 Eckhart Tolle Transmuting Suffering Into Peace Audiobook

[Speaker 1] (2:01 - 48:59)

The story that has not fulfilled itself yet, but is hoping to fulfill itself at some point in the future. That's why I'm always looking there. And when you're looking to future, you are immersed in your mind.

In the mind, the noise machine in the head is acting. So one could almost say that almost everybody is possessed. Not in a spooky way, don't...

But one could almost say everybody is possessed by their mind, which is the continuous movement of thought, out of which has crystallized a thought made entity. That consists of all kinds of identifications. My past, things that happened to me, my possessions, my this, my that.

Or it could also be in part a collective sense of identity, equally thought made, that is even more restless and unhappy and destructive, ultimately, than the personal egoic identity, the us, the tribe, the nation, our little group, our race, our political party or position. So most humans go through life mistaking the mind made entity that lives for the next moment, because it's never fulfilled in this moment. And the past wasn't all that great either.

It wasn't supposed to happen. So many things in the story of me were not supposed to happen. And usually, this moment, most of the time, isn't the greatest place either.

It's not supposed to happen either. I want something else, but not this. I want that, not this.

But unfortunately, this cannot be denied because it is. Is is something you can't really argue with, and if you do, you're insane. The form that this moment takes is already as it is.

But for most humans, there is the gap between I want and what is. They are not aligned. So humans are continuously out of alignment with the suchness the isness of now.

Internally, out of alignment. An unpleasant place to be, especially if you're there for most of your life. Now in nature, nature is so beautiful because things are aligned with now.

Plant life, animals, they're just present. Of course, every form has its own limitations. Animals too have their limitations, and in some ways, greater limitations than humans.

And yet, compared to most humans, the whole world of nature looks very sane, whereas the human world looks, to a large extent, quite insane, which means mad. So to be out of alignment with the isness of this moment is the normal state of the mind-made egoic self. How do we become free of that?

And the first, the most important step is being taken already at this moment, which is to see this. If you see that you are out of alignment or have been out of alignment with now, something arises in you, that which makes that seeing possible is not part of the egoic structure. It's presence.

It's only through being present that you can see the conditioned patterns in your own life. And only by remaining present and continuing to look can you avoid making the seeing of these conditioned patterns in yourself into a personal problem that you need to solve at some point in the future. The fallacy on the spiritual path of hoping, striving to achieve an imagined state of consciousness in the future.

Yes, but I'm not there now, so where else can I look for it except in the future? Who is speaking? The mind.

The ego. The ego telling you, the only way you can get there is in the future. That's the only place where you can find yourself.

Now, am I asking you to forget your personal past? No. There's no need to forget your personal past or to forget what you have learned, your personal history.

But if that gives you your sense of identity, that limits your life enormously. So remember your personal history. Of course, it's fine.

But don't look to it for yourself, a sense of self that can only come out of the aliveness of this moment. Now, you need to bring present moment awareness into your everyday life. Otherwise, you walk out of here.

Yes, you will have received an enormous boost of presence in this collective energy field. Most of you, except those few who are totally close to it and are sitting there at this moment thinking, what the hell is he talking about? As you sit here, most of you are absorbing as part of the collective field which can be quite powerful when people together enter the state of presence.

It intensifies it. So it can be very helpful. And yet, as you walk away from here, the momentum of the conditioning, the old conditioning in your mind, will attempt to reassert itself quickly.

At the latest, it will come when the first little challenge comes into your life where the present moment isn't as it should be. There's a traffic jam or something falls or somebody says something that they shouldn't have said. And you feel you have reason to complain again.

What are you complaining about? Well, somebody did something or the situation that... You're complaining about the now, which the egoic entity loves to do because it strengthens itself through every little internal...

You don't have to complain out loud. It's enough to complain in your head, which for some people is 80% of their mind activity. And they go through life unconsciously looking for the next thing to complain about.

Let's hope they don't find you because they find you, very soon they will find something in you to complain about. And to feel personally offended. And in that, the ego, in its imaginary sense of self, feels stronger for a moment.

You got like a little balloon. The complaining entity gets a little bigger. And you feel, I'm more fully myself now because I'm complaining about something.

And again, it's unconscious. And another unconscious aspect of this is that for that moment, the ego feels superior to the person or the situation that it is complaining about. That's another fantasy, of course.

And imagine superiority because when you can complain about a situation or a person, what he said and what he did and what they did and shouldn't have done and whatever, it could even be the weather. Why don't the government do something about the weather? It's a little exaggeration, but it's almost like that.

Some people continuously have arguments with God. They say, this isn't right. How can you do such a thing?

And some people angrily deny the existence of God because surely this moment would be different if I were in charge. So there is an imagined superiority when you complain about something because you feel superior to what you complain about. You're morally superior now.

And you're very right and somebody else is wrong. Oh, that's great. That makes me feel much bigger, says the ego.

The ego loves to be right. Now, to be right, unfortunately, somebody else has to be wrong. So as you walk away from here, you may notice habitual reactions coming back.

Habitual thought patterns and reactive patterns. And you may then suddenly lose the now, just as I demonstrated before. You go from alive to half dead.

When you meet a person like that, you know they are not really there. They are in their thoughts. But in most of you, there is enough presence to notice very quickly when an old pattern, conditioned pattern comes back, a reaction, a reactive pattern comes back.

And after a short while, you see it for what it is. So you're no longer totally in it. The moment you notice, you see, you are aware of an old pattern in you, you are no longer trapped in it.

The awareness frees you from it. You become present again, and you have a choice then. You choose to be in this moment instead of complaining about the traffic jam or whatever the situation is.

Or the bad food that you are given in the restaurant. Am I saying that whatever happens to you, you are to say yes to? Only internally, not necessarily externally.

Why should you accept a fish that's gone off if you're ordering fish? It doesn't smell good anymore, and it costs 20 euros on the menu. So some people misunderstand this teaching and think, okay.

I have to say yes to this moment and eat this. But that is not the case. An inner yes, yes.

That means you are internally not complaining about the situation. You are accepting that yes, this fish is not really fit to eat. You can't eat it anymore.

That's the reality. And then you told the waiter and say, oh, can you take this back, please? It doesn't smell good.

Bring me some fresh fish if you have some. That's not complaining. That's rectifying the situation.

But you are not personalizing it. You are not using the situation to blow yourself up as the ego. How dare you serve me this?

Me? To me? And that usually produces a corresponding egoic reaction in the other person.

And the waiter says, what do you mean? Nobody else has complained about the fish that we serve here. And that's one typical human situation.

So very well it is possible that quite often the situation may require a firm no. I am not eating this. And yet, do you notice a difference between the complaining no that feels personally offended and a clear no.

This is not what I want. Please take it back. Internally, there is still an acceptance of the fact that this fish you don't want to eat and you should take it back.

That's fine. So it is, as I mentioned briefly in The Power of Now, which you may remember, it is a high quality no. And high quality no's are fine.

They are often required in life. Now, if you were stranded in some place and there's no food and the only food there is is this fish that doesn't smell good, you may have to eat it. And then you say somebody gives it to you and nobody else is giving you any food and it's the only food there is in that place.

Then there would be the internal and external saying, yeah, okay, I'll eat this because there's nothing else to eat. That's fine. So at times you go along with the situation.

At other times you may have to say no. And yet, without the egoic involvement in the no that makes somebody wrong and makes yourself right, then life unfolds with much greater ease. You are less likely to fuel the unconsciousness in others if you are conscious.

If you are not there as an egoic entity needing to be bigger. So you're less likely and so your state always transmits itself to others. Whoever you come into contact with, your state of consciousness transmits itself to others.

And the more unconscious they are, the less presence there is in them, the more they will react and reflect back to you your state of consciousness. In order not to compulsively reflect back to people their state of consciousness, there needs to be great alertness and presence in you. And so, let's reverse the situation in the restaurant.

You are the waiter and the customer says, how dare you serve me this bad fish? If you are present, this is the isness of this moment, an angry customer wanting to be right and wanting you to be wrong. And you see that.

You see it without needing to label it. You see, there's the human ego and it does what it always does. That's all.

There's not even a person there. It's just the human ego operating through this being. There's a being underneath, but it's asleep.

There's a beautiful being underneath, but it's... And the ego is talking. Hello.

Welcome. It seems that we are going to be here together for three hours, except for those who leave early. That seems a long time when the only subject matter of our gathering is the now.

And the only real topic that we speak about is the now. And if you are not fully in the now as you sit here, the three hours may seem a long time. If you are not fully in the now as you sit here, which is the normal state, the normal state is not to be in the now, you're already becoming impatient at this moment.

Ultimately, what that means is not that you cannot stand the speaker because he's not interesting enough, but you can't really stand being with yourself for that long. But this gathering, the purpose of it is to help you in your ability to be present. So if you're not yet fully present now and thinking about tonight's dinner, or that you'd rather be somewhere else, or about something that happened this morning, or 20 years ago, that's okay.

I'm inviting you to be here, present, at this moment as if there were no past and future. Just pretend for one moment that there is no past and future. If the past is here, the future is here, you go and don't move away with your attention, your conscious attention, from this moment and whatever appears in this moment.

Sense perceptions, the room, visual sense perceptions, seeing, auditory, hearing, the voice, background noises, feeling perception, the body on the chair, breathing, and perhaps even the inner aliveness that is in your body. The cells are alive. You may be able to feel that in a very subtle way.

This is what appears in this moment. And to know it, you don't need to label it, just look at it. Let it be.

Allow this moment to be as it is. And if there is impatience with what we are doing, which is the mind saying give me something to think about, and it's not getting very much to think about, if there is impatience, allow that to be, observe it, there it is, that movement. So in addition to those things that make up this moment, outer and inner, is there anything else that perhaps we may have overlooked?

Yes. There is a presence in which those perceptions appear, are perceived. That is you.

A field of aware presence. A field of attention. There is enormous energy in that field.

And if you could sense that in the background of your life, always, but that is not a requirement, the requirement now is just this moment, because it's always only this moment. If you could sense in the background the presence that you are, you are putting this whole puzzle together. The floating atoms and molecules become a world.

But they wouldn't become a world without you. The conscious presence that you are. So you are the light that illuminates the world.

The light that makes it possible. So to sense, to be able to sense in the background of your life, which is always this moment, to be able to sense in the background of the now, your own presence. And you cannot grasp it because it has no form.

It is formless. And then it may start with feeling the aliveness in the inner body. That's part of the presence that you are.

A field of awareness. And then there's the world. There's the outer world.

And there's the inner world of thoughts, occasional thoughts, of feelings, emotions, physical sensations. And then when you go about your life, there are experiences. Things happen all the time.

Good, bad, continuous flux of things happening. And this is why people say there are so many moments in every day. That's not true.

There's only ever this moment. But it takes on form that changes. The form that it takes changes continuously.

Nothing lasts for long. Every form that this moment takes is fleeting. This morning is gone already.

You were having breakfast. Where is that moment? Gone.

You walking through the door here, that's gone. Your whole childhood, distant memory. And even our gathering seems very real at the moment.

And yet, eventually it will be just dissolved. Then there remains a memory. Except for one thing.

There is something deeper here. We are here to touch a deeper dimension that does not come and go in yourself. And that deeper dimension is inseparable from the present moment.

It is one with the present moment. So in essence, one could say, although it sounds a little strange, that you are the present moment. You are the now.

The field of now. The space of now. And you can sense that as your own presence.

As you sit here, allowing this moment to be as it is, and feeling that which cannot really even be named or grasped in the background of your life. Your consciousness, you could call it. And that's just another word again, a little pointer.

Knowing yourself as that and that there is an intense aliveness in you when you touch that. And you thought perhaps that all that you were or all that you are is confined to your personal history. What a dreadful limitation of the depths of who you are to believe that who you are can be defined through your personal history.

That little story of me. The unfulfilling and unfulfilled story of me. Hoping that one day it will fulfill itself and I will find the completion of myself, the fullness of myself that I'm looking for in the future.

Hoping to get what I think I need to add to myself, to make myself full, complete, alive, fully alive. Missing continuously the aliveness that is already in you. It is almost a joke how humans live.

How they look for something where it can never be found. How they look for themselves the fullness of who they are, the completion of their sense of self. How they look for that in the future, in some next moment.

And how compulsively they are driven to seek always the next moment. And how compulsively they ignore and even actively resist this moment that is the door that's always open. Not realizing that future has no reality except as a thought in your head that it can never come, that it can never fulfill you.

You can never find yourself in it because it's only a mental concept. When it comes, the future is the now. And then again, there's the next moment where I'm hoping to get to.

Now this is not the normal way to live. Most humans live predominantly for the next moment or the one after that. And that compulsion is deep seated.

The denial of the now which ultimately is the denial of life itself and the denial of your own reality is deep seated in every human being because inherited collective conditioning. And it can reappear at any moment. Even while you're sitting here it can reappear.

And if you looked at somebody at that moment of transition from being present to being lost in future which is lost in thought then you would notice an absence replacing the presence. And you can see it in people's eyes and in their expression. It goes like this.

Presence is beautiful, alive. And then a thought comes in and it draws attention, consciousness to itself. It sucks up consciousness and then you notice the aliveness and the power that you could see in the eyes is disappearing and it goes you're gone.

Now most people are gone all the time. They go through their entire life with perhaps a few rare moments of presence. They go through their entire life being absent from the present moment the only thing there ever is.

And of course also that implies being absent from themselves. And who are they? Who is taking the place of the beautiful alive powerful being that potentially they are?

Who is pretending to be you a little mind made entity called me and my story. And some there are I have met some waiters observed some waiters the way they deal with their customers is beautiful. There are some waiters who are like spiritual teachers and they go oh I'll see what I can do.

Certainly I'll take it back to the kitchen and if we have some fresh fish he will bring it to you. And then the person that wanted an ego boost from that situation will feel a little uncomfortable because of the lack of reaction it's not getting the desired ego boost and it might make another attempt and add something and say something else. I thought this was supposed to be a good restaurant.

I'm going to write to the papers about this. And again the conscious waiter says doesn't reply reaction I'll see what I can do. And then either comes back and says we have no more fish or bring something fresh.

So you will be confronted continuously in this world with people who want to use you without knowing it to enhance their sense of self. And if you then resent that I resent that you want to use me to enhance your sense of self you are personalizing something that looks personal but isn't personal at all because the ego is a collective entity there's nothing personal in it it is a form of unconsciousness that many humans in their current evolutionary stage manifest. That's all.

Nobody there. Just a form of unconsciousness. So you meet these people and that doesn't make you superior because the moment you feel superior you have fallen back into some identification with form as the me the egoic form without knowing it.

So if you feel spiritually superior you have another ego the ego has assumed another disguise. So as you walk away from here you will encounter many situations where the world often in the form of other humans most of the time will pull you back wanting to pull you back to its own level of consciousness wanting you to participate in the game of feeding egos and using others to feed yours and if there's enough presence in you you can actually choose not to participate anymore in that game. You can remain clear as people attempt to pull your get some emotional reaction or mental reaction from you and you need to you need to turn up the light of consciousness when you're confronted with a challenge when everything is going fine it kind of it's consciousness you're present it's good you look at this beautiful tree the sky feel the underlying presence that you are and then an unconscious humans comes knocking at the window of your car that's standing at the traffic light shouting obscenities

you idiot

[Speaker 1] (49:04 - 1:28:24)

you what you know what you just did no you what you my whatever it is it may be totally imaginary he needs an outlet for his emotion that's been he's been carrying for three or four hours and he's chosen you and at that moment not to be drawn into a reaction at that moment there's a critical moment either you will be pulled into his unconsciousness or you will stay present more intensely present than a moment ago when you were looking at the tree so looking at the tree is like this when you're present and when you're confronted with an unconscious human you have to go you have to look almost like a Zen master not quite as fierce and you have to be in touch with your whole body in that situation you can't just be in the head only if you feel the entire energy field of your body the inner aliveness that will provide the anchor for staying present and you can feel it it's almost tingle sometimes when you're very much in there with your attention and that anchors you in yourself your true being and prevents you from losing yourself in some egoic reaction emotional mental reaction calling the other person an even greater idiot in order to compensate for the ego loss because to the ego when somebody calls you something it's like the ego feels injured in its artificial sense of self as if somebody had come with a hammer and knocked off part of you when somebody calls you you idiot it feels to the ego as if somebody had come with a hammer and knocked off part of who you are and the unconscious repair mechanism immediately jumps in and will call the other person something else even worse so that you can repair your diminished ego when somebody insults you the ego feels diminished in its sense of self it then automatically reacts and insults back if possible even worse and that is the automatic ego repair mechanism expressed beautifully by an ancient teacher when he talked about somebody hitting you on one cheek the normal reaction is and it's totally automatic there's no nobody says okay now I'm going to hit you back I'm going to be as unconscious as you are just like that's of course not formulated because when unconsciousness is recognized as unconsciousness it's no longer unconscious so the compulsion to repair your ego is very strong the ego immediately jumps into action but the loss the diminishment of the ego that is experienced is actually an illusion because the entire egoic structure has no reality so it is also an illusory loss nothing is lost when somebody calls you you incapable fool are you talking to me now if ten people within the space of a week in your new job call you incapable there may well be something to look at in your life that is a different matter but more often than not those things are egoic games that people play and so what to the ego feels like a diminishment is not a diminishment at all and you can simply find that out if you allow an apparent diminishment of the ego to be there without reciprocating in any way so that looks like this somebody says you stupid fool and you have to be really present now in your entire body because you are not resisting any kind of resistance or shutting yourself off against the energy of the other person is not the solution it's intense presence you fool and you feel something in you wanting to react you simply allow it because you see the madness of it and that is a very strange thing if you allow what to the ego feels a diminishment just to be there immediately after you may experience a boost of aliveness that comes from underneath the ego so what who you are can suddenly emerge a little bit more and that's almost it's very strange some people get angry when I talk about these things because they say oh I should not defend myself in some cases you may have to say certain things in many cases defense is only a reactive mechanism and so this is of course part of the teaching of Jesus also dealt with this to allow the diminishment of the ego and simply be present with it and then you feel there's great power underneath it and there's a stillness in that it is a very still power and that's why Jesus said don't do to people what they do to you don't love your enemies it's a strange way of putting it and so life always gives you exactly what you need and you've had all the pain that you needed you have had to bring you here some needed a lot of pain to get here others may only have needed a little that's fine and then comes a point where you realize I'm done with pain I don't need it anymore now when that realization comes you no longer create pain for yourself and how do you do that simply by becoming externally aligned with this moment because it's only that which really creates pain and what happens to your pain body then when you say I'm done with the pain that will still come up occasionally because it has old momentum it's old momentum is still there it goes vroom vroom vroom but then a bit more slowly vroom vroom vroom vroom vroom it's gone the less you personalize the pain that you feel and associate it with this mental story that in your head the more you're able to allow it to be there and watch it the more quickly it becomes transmuted and it becomes fuel for your consciousness the pain becomes fuel for awakening so that may be the reason why there is so much pain but don't tell anybody because not everybody is ready to hear this and if pain is still if new pain comes into your life in some form as physical pain or enormous loss suddenly in your life you lose someone close to you your job and your home all within the space of three months and I know people to whom this has happened she left me I lost my house they sacked me from my job and the stock market has collapsed and then I crash my car and then the doctor says there is something wrong with the body life may do this it does that to some people what then if that should happen to you and you can bring it uncompromising surrender to what is to it and stick to this moment only because if you leave this moment you will be very unhappy especially if everything around you has collapsed stick to just what is there at this moment just this and the rest is surrender to what is as it is always then the enormous loss will become transmuted very quickly the more you surrender which is bring inner acceptance to something that is anyway as it is the more quickly the seemingly negative in your life will become transmuted not only will it become transmuted in you it will become it will provide the fuel for consciousness in you strangely enough it also becomes transmuted on an external level where once you surrender situations very quickly change and the more you are aligned with what is and that alignment needs to be uncompromising when what is looks dreadful on the surface collapse great loss and so on illness the doctor saying you only have a few more months to live and I personally know people who have gone through in deep one incredible awakening you can almost see they're shining like a sun and they may die in a few months they know life has taken away time from them no more future which really is the greatest thing that can happen to you because time is the ultimate illusion that you have more future to find yourself in you don't find yourself there anyway so if life takes away future from you all that's left is this and surrender to this and for some people what could have been the most dreadful thing that could happen to a human being through uncompromising surrender has become the awakening and the flowering of the entire being so if you encounter great suffering external things going wrong in your life it's a it is truly a great opportunity for transmutation a very great opportunity and in the absence of that you will have to make do with all the little things that continuously happen in your life the unconscious humans you meet the egoic entities the little egos that meet every day wanting this and wanting that and the pain bodies wanting something from you you have to work with that bring the yes to that let's take a little break now and move the physical vehicle without losing presence and return when the clock hand indicates number four in the present moment similar case would be to be wrong in a discussion you have an argument with your partner and suddenly to let go of your mental position that you have clinging to this is how it is and suddenly you let go of the position and are simply present at that moment and you feel much greater aliveness you haven't died when you're wrong or you might even say oh you're right I was completely wrong there you haven't died you're more alive to the ego being wrong is a kind of death so bringing into everyday life presence what I've said here what I'm saying here implies that there is enough presence power in you so to speak so that you can be there when those things happen you can be there as the witnessing consciousness when the old patterns are happening if you are not there there's nothing you can do no matter how much any teacher can say if you're not if you're totally identified there's nothing you can do because you don't even know what you're doing and then there's the pain body that makes that gives an added dimension to the momentum of the ego the pain body as you know is the accumulation of old emotional pain from the past in you all the pain that has not been fully faced and since humans very rarely fully face anything because that would imply they have to be present in the now there is an accumulation remnants energetic remnants of past emotional pain suffered especially in your childhood but also afterwards and not only that that's only the personal aspect of the pain body then it has another aspect and that is the collective aspect of the pain body whatever group of people you live with the surrounding culture or nation that you live in also will have some influence on how heavy your pain body is because for most people a part of their personal pain body is actually the collective pain body of their country or in some cases their race if the race has suffered a lot as a race so countries have different degrees of pain body you can feel it as a heaviness when you enter a certain country that's in the air everybody walks around looking heaviness in the collective there is also the pain body of humanity because humanity has suffered so much dreadful pain most of which is self inflicted in other words by humans on other humans that is inherited by every human who comes into this world it's probably in the DNA somewhere we could decipher all the information that the DNA carries I'm sure we would find there oh there is all the pain in that little segment there this is the human pain so the pain body that humans carry is one could say the shadow of the ego because they have lived through in and through ego for so long that so much pain has accumulated because the ego creates always more pain it lives on separation it loves conflict it loves to oppose it is continuously in a state of fear fearful that the little things that I have identified with are going to be taken away from me and fearful that I may not find all the things that I still need to be fully myself so all that continuous fear creates emotion continuous fear thoughts create fear emotions over thousands of years and the actual physical violence inflicted on humans whether you believe in reincarnation or not doesn't matter it is inherited pain to a large extent plus the personal enough for your own lifetime there's nobody you could come into this world without suffering pain and so therefore you live with the pain body which is an aspect of the egoic self and as you probably know the pain body for most people is sometimes dormant and sometimes active when it's dormant it's just in the background or you may not notice it at all and all there is of course is still the ego doing its playing its games but at times the pain body arises needing to feed on the experience of further pain so it works in conjunction with the egoic mind structures it's the emotional field that lives in you as a little emotional entity i saw a nice this film as a character in the lord of the rings that to me is a beautiful image of the pain body a little little devious being and that is really an image of the human pain body the emotional entity that lives in you and is cunning and knows exactly when the right time has come to move to rise into your mind and then the emotion the old emotion in you is looking out through your eyes and that is another thing i've already demonstrated what happens when presence is obscured by identification with thinking the lifelessness that comes now a somewhat different thing happens when presence is obscured by an arising pain body something different than comes through the eyes and not only through the eyes it emanates when it's strong it emanates through every pore of your body and people around you if they have a minimum of a minimum of sensitivity even if you did not utter a word and try to smile they could sense the energy that you are emitting at that moment and it would feel heavy some psychics may even see it visually as dark dark force coming out of you but let's just talk about the eyes when the pain body rises then this raw painful emotion that is looking through your eyes out into the world and it's looking for some feedback of pain who can give me more pain sometimes it will inflict pain so that it can experience a dramatic painful situation or it may provoke someone or a situation so that I get an emotional feedback so it looks and it's cunning it knows it's the right moment to come up and look through your eyes at the world and occasionally you meet people in the street or in a place and they are looking at you and you know there is an active pain body looking at you and it's better not to interact too much with that person unless you are so present that you can stand and look back into the eyes of that person without feeling corresponding emotion you look into the emotion the turmoil of it holding that your feeling sensing your enormous power of presence that ultimately you are and that is like probably what Jesus did who walked around continuously meeting as it's described in the new testament every village he went into every town he went into he meets all these people possessed by evil spirits are there so many people possessed by evil spirits in every town in every village or is that just one way of putting it and his presence was such that he only needed to look and the pain body would shrink so that is possible but if there is not enormous presence in you and you are confronted with the pain body it's better to move away move out of the way don't interact too much because very soon a provocation will happen and then the pain bodies are so clever to getting what they want this is the game played between partners most frequently people two people living together feed my pain bodies the name of the game and so that if ego were not enough pain body amplifies or magnifies the madness of the ego they are they work together they are ultimately one you could say pain body is the emotional aspect of ego so humans live with old pain that periodically needs to experience more pain now recognizing it in others of course is easier than seeing it in yourself you can probably see it in your wife or your husband when it happens now that's already great because then you don't mistake the pain body for who that person is periodically most people who live together as couples will go through their pain body episodes and usually you know it is pain body when a relatively insignificant thing that one partner says or does provokes an enormous reaction in the other person that means the pain body is using it as an excuse for coming up and once it's taken you over it wants more it doesn't want an end to the pain it doesn't want peace it wants more until it has fulfilled itself for a while taken on enough new energy through the feedback of others or if you are a hermit or live alone the pain body then will have to look to your thoughts to feed on in that case when the pain body awakens suddenly your thinking will turn very negative every thought will say something negative about yourself or about the world or about other people or about the place where you live anything but it's all negative it's all dreadful my life is dreadful people are all dreadful or it may focus on one person that once was in your life and that spoiled the rest just knowing that person spoiled the rest of your life my ex wife my ex husband whoever it may be my mother my father what they did to me and I'm not saying that humans do not do dreadful things to other humans yes they do but is the emotional residue left by something dreadful that somebody did to you once and the memory left by something dreadful that someone once did to you is that going to determine who you feel and think you are is that becoming the foundation for your identity for sense of self do you want to give so much power to an unconscious person that years ago was in your life unconsciousness and make the memory of pain and the feeling of emotional pain into part of who you are how dreadful and yet many humans are so identified with the emotional pain they feel that it's they don't want to let go they feel this is who they are they talk about they may even say I'm a survivor of this or that it's wonderful that you survived this dreadful thing that happened to you in your childhood it's wonderful but to make an identity for yourself out of that limits you enormously what a dreadful limitation for the rest of your life you are a survivor of physical abuse it's you make yourself very small and you say this is my identity and then the resentment or the grievance remains as a thought form in your head that needs to be revived periodically you need to think about what somebody once did to you and then you feel the corresponding old emotion and so people then become so identified with certain thought forms old thought forms the thought form has self in it I am that that thought I am I am the grievance I am the resentment the resentment is an essential part then of the ego so some egos consist they are they don't they consist of many different things that you identify with there are some egos that consist 80% of one chunk of memory or emotion one huge grievance that has taken hold of your mind and wants to stay there for the rest of your life so we all meet people like that and again if you see it in yourself it may not some of you may have a little bit of that also I am just describing the more extreme forms that are also quite common and if this should be the case for some of you you may notice somebody is getting angry at hearing this because the identity is being threatened who is angry you or the egoic identity that feels threatened and if you can bring awareness to that you can see it and become the one who sees and feels the emotion in you so that the emotion itself is not denied or repressed but it is becoming depersonalized you are no longer deriving your sense of self from it the pain body when you notice it in yourself that emotional pain is it's very important as you feel it to be very alert and to sense not only the pain but also the one who is feeling it the looking at it the awareness through which you can feel the pain body the power of attention that is there the light that is shining on the pain in you so if you wake up in the middle of the night in emotional turmoil the emotion will want to survive in you as long as possible and use your brain to renew itself through your thinking every thought is an energy field that can feed the emotion the old emotion and then the mind becomes hyperactive and you don't know that you are feeding through your thinking the negative thoughts feeding the old emotion and people can be stuck in that for a long time so if that happens you wake up at night emotional turmoil be there in the body start by feeling your hands or arms the inner aliveness use that as an anchor for presence and continue to feel the turmoil that you feel perhaps in your chest area or belly area and watch feel it and feel also the power of attention that is the light shining on it you don't need to think thoughts about it it is unnecessary you can just look in the same way you can just look at a fruit on apple you hold it there and you look and you can also look internally and feel what you feel and realize that you are the light that is shining on it on this little movement of energy it doesn't like the light shining on it which means it doesn't like to be made conscious because it lives only as long as you are unconscious of it only if it can pretend to be you can it continue to revive to renew itself through you so that's beautiful practice and then the pain body is no longer renewing itself and all it has then is its old momentum and every time it comes up and is recognized it loses some of its energy charge and that energy charge in the pain body is not lost really it becomes transmuted because it was trapped energy that couldn't get out held in and then it becomes transmuted and the image that I would use to compare it to is like a block of ice that the sun shines on it and then it becomes freed so as the energy that was trapped in the emotional pain body is freed through simply watching it then there is much greater energy in you that provides a sense of aliveness grows in you because the aliveness was trapped in here in a low frequency vibration and then it's freed and it goes

ah

and so it's because it is often people with heavy pain bodies that are suddenly make the fastest progress on the spiritual path because it's too painful there's it's pain is an enormous incentive for becoming conscious until you have the direct means of becoming conscious in the absence of any spiritual teaching or teacher pain is great life does that life gives you pain it's part of living as a form identity so pain pushes you everyone here nobody here would be here if they hadn't had the pain that they did have and certainly I wouldn't be here if I hadn't had a heavy pain body so heavy that I couldn't live with it anymore and something had to give and then you realize you reach a critical point where the pain ceases to be your spiritual teacher but it's brought you to this point that's great it's worked it worked no matter what pain you suffered you're here now you're not watching TV or whatever playing video games so it's brought you here it's I'm enormously grateful for the pain my pain because the inner transformation would never have happened if I had had a comfortable pain body that I could live with it would just mean okay every two weeks I get a mood or I throw something at my wife or whatever but not so bad and then after a few hours I get out of it again but a pain body that wakes you up every night and you're actually shaking in agony of fear a pain body that makes the whole world appear like a that almost as Jean-Paul Sartre once described in a book nausea the whole world gives you nausea makes you feel sick that's hard to live with we're all back well most of us are back and reentering in case we lost it temporarily the present moment of course you can't lose it you can be lost to it but you can't lose it because that's all there is but it becomes obscured the bell is the awakening into now and the bell for you can be any form of suffering that arises in your life little or small let it let it push you back into presence some forms of suffering don't look like suffering on the surface anger while the ego is angry it loves the anger it doesn't look like suffering at all but if you could examine what happens to the body the physical body while that is happening you would see that it affects many functions of the body the body suffers when there's anger but the ego loves it as you know to say don't be angry anymore that doesn't work but to recognize anger as an egoic reaction and to watch it when it happens that brings consciousness to it feel the energy of it we may have some questions one or two questions somebody just gave me written question I'm a woman a widow and I had a very fulfilling love relation to a married man during eight and a half years who was very lonely and unhappy with his wife the only wish he had was to live with me but he felt too much responsible for the care of his wife as he could not find his way in this situation he killed himself five weeks ago how can I find peace in the moment of now and get power from the moment of now it takes a long time to leave the emotions it seems that you loved this man what you loved was not the flesh and bones that are no more or in the process of decay now when there is true love there is always the unseen that which loves in you that which you love is a recognition of yourself in the other and the other in yourself recognition of oneness the flesh and bones and also the story that in many cases is a tragic one in many people's lives neither the flesh and bones nor the story of our life situation is destined to survive and most stories don't ever really work themselves out it seems when somebody dies too soon or in the middle of a seemingly unfinished situation or when a child dies or somebody dies through an act of violence by the hands of someone else or by his or her own hands through suicide it makes it a little harder to accept for those left behind but the human form is very fragile there's no guarantee that any one of us in as this physical form is going to make it even to the rest of this day the end of this day when you love someone not the egoic sense of love that always wants something that always wants to use the other but when there's true love I recommend if there's someone in your life that you love that sometimes you look at that person or if that person is not with you you look at a photo of that person and feel the love arising and when you feel it fully close your eyes and let go of the image of the form of the other person and only feel that love inseparable from your being and then the other not in form is also present there because that which you feel is that which is the answer the underlying oneness between what seems like different human beings millions of human beings most of us can only recognize the underlying oneness in a few one or two individuals in their lives with increasing consciousness comes the ability which is beautiful to recognize the underlying oneness in every human being that you meet and that recognition is love and it is ultimately nothing to do with the form of that person the physical form or the external life situation the story the often unhappy story that a person is trapped in it goes beyond that the forms already are always destined to dissolve so there is a reality there that is timeless in every human being a timeless essence that is formless and timeless love is the recognition of that essence in the other through your own if you can love at all there must be even though you may still have an ego the ego it must mean there is an opening in the egoic structure through which reality can shine and it's only through that opening in the egoic structures true love can appear so if you love that being feel that love in yourself and feel the presence of the other ultimately not separate from who you are so shortly after the sudden death of a human being it is inevitable that some sadness will come in waves and that is simply something to be acknowledged and accepted when the sadness comes and after somebody has died in the weeks after that days weeks sometimes months you feel waves of sadness coming and then leaving you again and then coming back and when that happens surrender to the sadness that you feel and if you have to weep allow yourself to weep focus even attention on what you feel and surrender it completely surrender to that when you surrender to sadness accept that it's there don't feel I shouldn't be sad or this shouldn't have happened this surrender means there's no arguing with this moment and this deep sadness you may find when there's true surrender to sadness that there's peace underneath it one could almost say you see the other side of sadness as peace it turns around and you can be weeping and feel inner peace at the same time the weeping is to do with the form that has dissolved and when the acceptance of that is there the inner peace is to do with the recognition that life that is the essence of each human being does not die events happen that seem meaningless you do not understand why this should have happened especially when someone commits suicide or dies violently or prematurely or when a child dies it doesn't make sense and there are events that we cannot figure out through the mind why they took place but everything that happens strangely has its place within the totality of things no event is separate from the totality and even seemingly senseless events have their place within the totality of things everything is connected and once you can accept that you don't try to find some explanation work out in your mind to make you feel better work something out and this is not what I want to give you here work out some explanation in the mind that gives you some consolation it's more it needs to be something real and the answer is in the love that you felt and if you don't mistake the love for the form of the person can still feel now that is real and now that this is springtime look at the flowers the blossoms and feel that that too is an expression of love and then close your eyes because those flowers and blossoms are not going to stay around for that long either all human beings are expressions of the one the one life the one consciousness assuming temporarily a physical form and then perhaps a little longer another form that is non physical or if you believe I don't want to put any idea in your head it's irrelevant whether you even believe in reincarnation or not but just to see that there's more to me than the flesh and bones there's more to you than the flesh and bones that seems clear you can find your loved one in every flower that you look at one more question on the piece of paper and then there may be some questions that some people may want to ask do you accept people as disciples well you may know the nice beautiful eastern saying I don't remember whether it is from sufism or some other eastern tradition the teacher and the taught together produce a teaching the words that are being spoken here could not be spoken if you were not sitting there this event is one event one phenomenon that arises I do not see myself as a teacher it is not an identity simply a temporary function it looks as if this form were a teacher it's not quite right depending on how you want to use words from a more superficial level you could say anybody who reads the power of now is a disciple but that's a conceptual thing that wouldn't be very helpful at the moment the teaching happens in this way there are no disciples as such and it is spreading to many thousands of people what form the teaching will take at any time I don't know everything is continuously changing if ever the form changes and I work with just a few people for a certain period of time I'll let you know at the moment this is the only form that the teaching takes that's all I know if there are any questions before anybody asks questions just a little reminder if possible ask questions that are vital and alive a vital and alive question concerns perhaps yourself or somebody close to you but that is your self it's something that is that you truly need or want to know a non-vital question is an abstract mental question such as do the people on mars have pain bodies or your concept of this or that doesn't quite agree with what I've read somewhere else so those are questions that are not truly alive the mind likes to play around or be right or say this is in an exact contradiction to the ancient scripture so such and such could be if one looks at the surface of things things are full of contradictions if you only look at the form every religion seems to be totally different if you look a little deeper it's all one so please I don't know where the microphones are there must be somewhere

[Speaker 3] (1:54:39 - 1:54:40)

hello

[Speaker 1] (1:54:41 - 1:54:41)

hello

[Speaker 3] (1:54:42 - 1:55:41)

my name is Margaret and I have one situation what I would like to tell last night after your teaching I came home cold tired hungry etc and I fixed it this morning I woke up with this terrible headache which is familiar to me and the name is migraine what I did because I wanted to be here again today what I did was I took a lot of medication which was effective so now I am here but my question is I asked myself if this is the most effective way that I am dealing with it and maybe I would like to hear your view on this problem which is happening more often in my life

thank you

[Speaker 3] (1:55:43 - 1:55:44)

am I expressing myself clearly

[Speaker 1] (1:55:44 - 2:14:33)

yes thank you many recurring forms of pain or illness tend to disappear as you bring more presence into your life there may be a number of reasons why these migraines appear but there could be a pressure of something that is not yet been fully lived there could be pressure of unexpressed emotions it could be as some forms of pain are actually physical manifestations of the pain body the pain body can manifest itself also as a physical symptom so the quickest way to heal your body is to bring as much consciousness as possible into the body to give as much attention as possible conscious attention to the body and that is the practice of inner body awareness so you feel the aliveness that is in the body and in that bringing consciousness in that may also sometimes activate a dormant pain body there are some pain bodies that hardly ever express themselves and only manifest as physical symptoms and they thrive on your reaction against those physical symptoms that's what they live on because they need some kind of food so as you bring more consciousness into the body you may encounter suddenly certain emotions arising inside you that you didn't know were there the pain body you're shining the light on the hiding pain body that is the case with many people I'm only suggesting that as a possibility there are other reasons why such pains can be there including even a very rapid transmutation of your entire being there was a physical teacher there was a spiritual teacher called Krishna Murti who for many years suffered extreme pain in the head almost every day to the point of unconsciousness falling unconscious and nobody even he did not know why he never saw a doctor about it he knew that the doctor in his case would not have the answer but he believed it was a kind of transmutation that was happening to him and he said sometimes they are working on me no matter what the actual cause is I believe it will either disappear the condition will disappear or the cause for the condition will reveal itself and then become transmuted as you bring more consciousness into yourself in the meantime you may occasionally need to take some medication pressure of something unexpressed is often the case of migraine headaches but not necessarily it may well be that you never find the answer of where it comes from and yet it may suddenly dissipate in the meantime while the pain is there and not just that pain any kind of physical pain it is your job to surrender to the fact that right now it's there and I have met people for whom physical pain became a teacher I have met some people who suffered pain for years almost constant physical pain and one or two people I met they had never heard of any spiritual teaching they had never read a spiritual book but what happened to them when I met them I saw they were intensely alive and they were still in pain and yet something had happened I recognized the pain that was going on for years eventually drove them into surrender very hard to surrender to physical pain but it drove them to surrender and it eroded their ego because in surrender the ego dissipates the ego can only exist in the state of non-surrender we could even say the ego is the state of non-surrender and so some people were driven to surrender by physical pain and few others I met by having a so called incurable condition and some people through surrender became cured quite frequently that happens I read some years ago a book written by a doctor about healing and he found the greatest number of healing happened in those people who were not those people who internally considered the illness as an enemy but who came to an acceptance of their condition a deep acceptance and that was the state he found through research that it was most likely to lead to a healing that acceptance my father is 86 now and he's a strange person I love him dearly and one of his characteristics he's always refused to see a doctor and he's always had aches and pains nothing too acute but quite a few things that were with him for years certain pains ear some head bones and a number of symptoms that would be there with him always and people said you have to see a doctor about this and that was one area of his life where he early on in his life learned to surrender in other areas he still has a big ego but in that area he had this wonderful thought that came to him he said I live in pacific coexistence with my illnesses and he said if I attack one of these illnesses a greater one will develop so that was I'm not giving as a recipe for everybody not to see a doctor bringing awareness into the body is essential in any case that is always absolutely essential if you have a pain when you go home from here if something happens in the next day today or tonight or in the next few days and you experience a pain that you have not had before or rarely have then it could have something to do with being here and an inner change happening I know that some people who have fairly heavy pain bodies and are now very present with their pain bodies that means the pain body tries to come up and not that presence ever pushes the emotional pain down it never does that presence simply looks at it but when a pain body needs to come up and he finds that you are very present and you immediately detect it it will shrink back it will go oh and then it will lie in a little corner and wait for a better opportunity and you think it's asleep it's not there at all but it's very much like when a cat is asleep the cat is never really totally asleep and that's an amazing thing if you watch a cat it knows any kind of noise you can make and it will go but the slightest thing an unusual noise a little tapping that is could be a little animal walking past or and suddenly you know there's always some some something in the cat is always awake because there could be a mouse there something in the pain body it's always like this and then it waits for an opportunity and an opportunity for pain body to arise in a moment of less presence in you could be when you're suddenly for example you're upset in a situation you're just fed up with the what somebody is doing or the traffic isn't moving and there's a moment of reaction and the pain body will go ah there's my chance and suddenly the reaction will become magnified and from being an irritation with the traffic will quickly turn into how dreadful my life is anyway what and a huge stream of negative thinking what did it all start with a little upset about the traffic and the pain body and the was there waiting another opportunity for pain bodies to watch bad films where violent things happen and of course those films are made by pain bodies the script writer it's written through the script writer's pain body the producer has a heavy pain body and the people who pay money to watch these dreadful things are paying money to feed their pain bodies while they watch and they love feeling bad they pay money to feel bad and some almost advertise it this film will make you feel really bad and all the pain bodies running to the box office thus is the state of our society our civilization so when you're very present the pain body may want to wait and if there's very little opportunity after a while the pain body almost says this is not I can't renew myself in this way anymore if the pain body doesn't actually think but it has an intelligence there and then it sometimes happens that it produces physical symptoms in people who before didn't have them usually not serious it's pain here back pain there this that headache and aches and pains and suddenly there are people sometimes who sit in our intensives and who suddenly experience some extreme physical pain they haven't had before can't sit anymore and can't pay attention anymore I need to get out of here the pain body wants you to get out of here and because there's too much presence here it's the only way it can do that is by creating some physical pain now pain bodies can also create illness and they sometimes do and that is usually in people in whom the pain body does not have a chance to express itself in their everyday life and those would be people for example who repress their emotions because they conflict with the self image that they have it has happened in the past with Christians some Christians who misunderstood the deeper truth of the Christian teaching which is beautiful but they misunderstood and they tried to live up to an image of myself as a good Christian who cannot who just does not do certain things a good Christian loves his neighbor he doesn't get mad at his neighbor so I can't allow myself because it would conflict with my self image to be angry with somebody close to me my children my wife and so I can't afford myself to express these emotions I need to they need to be pushed down because I I'm living an image which is an egoic thing to do I'm living this image of myself as a good Christian because that is sin and so then after a few years the pain body is being pushed down and down and finally a serious illness develops the emotion has created the unexpressed emotion has created a serious illness and then that makes me unhappy and then the pain body has something to feed on so it's better to than to repress is to express if you have to but be there while it happens be there as long as it happens see if you can be there as the watcher of what happens be there as the watcher of your pain body when it happens a marvelous thing to do never misunderstand this teaching and try to okay I mustn't have a I can feel something coming on I mustn't have a pain body attack I must remain present and then you notice the body gets tight and will power comes in meditation this is sometimes what you do when westerners meditate meditation of course is surrender to what is there's only the now that's all that meditation is about to show you that this moment is all there is and so that it's all about the surrender and then you can see even eastern people even buddhist monks I'm impressed they say oh they sit there they can sit for 3 hours wow what an achievement and there's a boiling there's a lid on a boiling kettle and should the door open while they meditate and the child or the wife comes in leave me alone I'm meditating another question

[Speaker 2] (2:14:38 - 2:14:49)

my name is Purnima and I want to ask if you can speak a little bit about forgiving forgiveness something I find very difficult and in the light of your teachings

[Speaker 1] (2:14:51 - 2:29:03)

yes thank you non forgiveness is there when you mistake human unconsciousness for a person when you make an identity for someone and this is what the mind does when you make an identity for someone out of the movement of human unconsciousness when what somebody did once to you or to someone else or to large numbers of people somebody injured someone inflicted violence on someone showed cruelty perhaps your father your mother whoever it may be there's a temptation there is the tendency for the mind to make an identity out of that whereas all such actions they look as if somebody there knew what they were doing but all such actions are expressions of human unconsciousness the expressions of the collective ego expressing itself through one so called person and the expressions of the pain body which also is not personal it is human pain so it's only when you mistake that the expression of human pain as violence or cruelty or the expression of the human ego with its absurd needs to use others to enhance itself to make itself stronger when you mistake what is collective a collective state of humanity you mistake that for an identity then you create a perpetrator somebody who did something and that is a mind made identity for someone and of course then you have it is impossible to forgive when you believe that there is actually an identity behind what was being done there is someone there whose identity it is to be responsible for that now the question arises so what does that mean is nobody responsible for what they do this can't be right is no human being responsible for what they do for the evil that we see in the world the cruelty ultimately no and yet all human beings suffer the consequences of their unconsciousness whoever manifests unconscious behavior will experience further unconsciousness from others it's called karma so you suffer the consequences and in the process of that pain arises you inflict pain and you suffer pain it's what all humans in life what humanity in life has been doing inflicting pain receiving pain in varying degrees and in that process that looks pretty mad out of that occasionally here and there somebody woke up out of that cycle and recognized the fact that when such things are being done ultimately there's nobody there doing it it's unconsciousness when you see that compassion arises compassion even with the one who became the instrument of unconsciousness compassion with yourself because the equivalent of non-forgiveness towards another is to harbor feelings of guilt in yourself and both are very strong in the egoic mind if you cannot forgive yourself that is very similar of course to not being able to forgive another you are making an identity for yourself out of something that you did because you didn't know any better which is a colloquial way of saying you were not conscious enough to know better so there are some people who there are parents now who think back and say I made dreadful mistakes when I brought up my children I am guilty of that you didn't know what you were doing you acted according to your conditioning you acted out your conditioning and this is what people do in the same family for generations and generations one generation after another acts out the same conditioning there are people in America now whose families immigrated three generations ago from somewhere in Europe and the dysfunction the particular kind of egoic dysfunction in that family may go back to Roman times two thousand three thousand years and it's a cycle the parents teach the children the same particular kind of unconscious dysfunction because unconscious can take different forms often it's violence it can be other forms cruelty using others whatever it may be and so you can see the same thing handed down from parent to children they grow up they do the same to their children until finally one person is there who wakes up and sees it for what it is and so forgiveness happens by itself when you recognize that none of that is personal it's it is something to do with the evolutionary stage of humanity and you happen to be here on this planet somehow you ended up here on this in many ways mad planet as far as humanity is concerned also potentially paradise as far as the planet itself is concerned paradise in many ways potentially and you happen to be here in the midst of considerable unconsciousness so you cannot try to forgive it's not possible unless you look through the form that this unconsciousness took you recognize it as not nobody there ultimately then forgiveness happens automatically but there is something in the egoic mind that doesn't want to let go of a grievance or a resentment and that's another aspect there is something in here because resentment or grievance is very powerful ego food there are some egos that keep themselves alive through one big grievance one big resentment that I have harbored for years and in other areas the person may be engaged in spiritual work and experience states of presence experience peace and yet there is something hanging on in there in here and what it's hanging on to is my this big resentment and the ego is enough one big resentment is enough to keep the ego going and that's why it's got its teeth in that thought form that thought form is there and says I'm not going away I am you I'm who you are and so there's a reluctance even once you see the unconsciousness it's not personal you can still feel there's something in here that says no no I'm hanging on to this grievance I'm not letting go I've had it for years all those years are going to be wasted and then you see that and the seeing seeing means you have already one foot out of it and then once you see it for what it is it will change it's whatever you bring consciousness to will become transmuted and what you bring consciousness to that is false in you a false identification will dissolve if anything you bring consciousness to that is real deepens that's the beauty of it so two levels here to work to become aware of as far as forgiveness is concerned recognize it for what it is and see in yourself perhaps the reluctance even though you have already recognized that ultimately it's human unconsciousness no more than that and it's been going on for thousands and thousands of years millions of humans inflicting acts of cruelty on others it's going and it's going on even now in varying degrees the unconsciousness varies from person to person the roots of it are in everyone so you recognize that and then level 2 is observing in yourself that something in there does not want to let go and then say oh isn't that interesting and watch it it even has a feeling quality to it there is an accompaniment of an accompanying emotion perhaps that reflects that thought it's become an identity it's become an identity I don't want to lose my identity I'm hanging on in here but once you see it it won't survive for very long because it needs your unconsciousness to survive and so the beautiful words of Jesus he actually tells us why we should forgive it's all there forgive them for they know not what they do he not only tells you that you should forgive he tells you why a modern Jesus would have said they are completely unconscious that would be the modern translation of for they know not what they do another question

[Speaker 2] (2:29:04 - 2:29:42)

thank you I'm Sasha I would like to ask a question the pain

[Speaker 1] (2:29:44 - 2:37:39)

good good thank you you have to watch in yourself to see if the crying is associated with a story that goes through your head perhaps an old one it is possible that the crying happens as soon as the story replaces itself in your head of something that happened or something that never happened but should have happened who knows what the story is there is the crying could be something that I never got but deserved or should have had life passed me by that is a big one a usual one for many people I am missing out it is too late now I didn't make it or there may be the crying because of something that happened once an event and it is being replayed and as long as you are in the story in your head the emotions are there and the two work together you are not observing the emotion you are mainly fueling the emotion and the emotion is giving further energy to the story when you watch directly you feel the emotion itself sadness whatever it may be and watching implies that of course you allow it to be if it is there you cannot fully watch it if you are not happy with what is there you are not really watching it it is just there it is and you are watching and if that is how you are watching it and if then it stops that means simply that the emotion is being dissipated through your presence there is no repression here if you are truly watching the moment you look at it it stops that is possible that means the emotion may have been long-standing but not as deep as a pain body and then simply by separating cutting the link between the story and the emotion you have already done the most important thing and this cutting sounds almost violent you don't have to do anything to cut it but simply recognize the connection between the story and the feeling so you could think about if somebody died some years ago or some months ago or somebody left you or whatever it may be and that is the story that creates the emotion and then you dismiss the story and pay more attention to what you feel and then it may dissipate very quickly when you just give it attention and don't fuel it anymore and then suddenly there is peace underneath it so that may be happening to you and then the same mind thing may come in again and then the same you watch again pay more attention to what you feel than what you think I mean you know full well that it's those thoughts that create the emotion and so certain thoughts in the head have their own momentum too and some thoughts get lodged many thoughts pass through like clouds but there are other thoughts that stay in there they find a little corner in your mind and say okay I live here and I'm not going to go away and periodically the same kind of thought comes and creates the same kind of emotions and they just won't go away they're refusing to go away and it can also happen that one big thought obliterates most of your mind and that is almost regarded as pathological but even within a normal human being it can happen that thoughts can become obsessive and those are the recurring thoughts that say I'm not going anywhere and come back again and again what do you do with that watch the thought be there as the mind gets into your body so that you can sense yourself as the underlying presence then your mind becomes a ripple phenomenon you are the ocean or the deep lake that's here the depths of who and the deep in the depths the ocean or the deep is still on the surface there's a wave movement that's your mind so if you are rooted in yourself the movement of the mind can't drag you along with it totally you're here and then you just watch the movement and then it calms down because you're not identifying with each thought and that would even be the case in people who would be regarded as clinically insane for example people who have who hear voices which is no more than the normal voices that you hear in the head that everybody hears as their own thought processes some people hear them as auditory things auditory comments and that is usually regarded as insane if you cannot be drawn into what the voice says and this applies both to the pathological condition of hearing actual voices and to the normal condition of simply having the voice in your head which are your own thoughts if you can be there as the witness then they don't have power over you instead of being drawn in totally or reacting to them which creates further thoughts the in the film a beautiful mind which some of you may have seen which is about a scientist a brilliant scientist who goes mad and sees people that don't exist in his life he has these hallucinations everything they look very real but they don't exist but they're just right there in front of him he doesn't know it he thinks they're all real and the viewer of the film cleverly also thinks they're real until the moment he realizes that he's insane that these people are not actually there at that moment the viewer also realizes it but the important thing here for this character that is the beginning of his healing when an awareness arises so he doesn't need to react anymore he recognizes it as not real he knows he's mad and anybody who knows they're mad are not completely mad anymore the really mad people don't know that they're mad and many humans don't know that they're mad of course is there another question oh there yeah

[Speaker 2] (2:37:39 - 2:38:16)

thank you hello my name is Lotte I would like to know something about the effect that this process transformation into consciousness has on your old relationships friendships because I really feel it's difficult to be that compassionate tolerant open minded person that I feel I am when I'm alone but that's easy so I feel even that I get less tolerant and less um patient with people around me

[Speaker 1] (2:38:16 - 2:52:29)

thank you thank you yeah yes I this is sometimes what not infrequently do I hear that and somebody else asked a very similar question not long ago when she said I can be very spiritual when I sit alone in my room but the moment I go out and meet people it's gone now your question may not be quite as extreme but there's something similar here of course the ultimate challenge are people when you are alone with yourself some people find it it's considerably easier to be present when you're out in nature which doesn't mean not everybody's present when they're alone some are totally in their mind too but it's probably yes it is easier there and so really the most challenging thing in your spiritual evolution is other people and it reminds me of I believe Jean-Paul Sartre who said hell is other people or literally translated hell is the others and so yes humans are very challenging and you lose patience with them and think why can't you be more conscious why you have to act out this is same kind of stuff with your friends your acquaintances your family that's perhaps the most difficult for many people because the more past you share with a person the more difficult it sometimes seems to stay present when you're together with them so for some people the ultimate test is being with their when they're grown up visiting their parents and this is why Ram Dass made the famous statement if you think you're so enlightened go and spend two weeks with your parents so observing in your case be more interested in your reactions than in what seems to cause your reactions so if people's behavior causes your reactions or seems to pay more attention to the reaction itself what the mind is saying or what the emotion is expressing it sometimes happens that people who are evolving spiritually quickly they find sometimes that they don't enjoy being with their old friends anymore they don't enjoy participating in what they loved before for example getting together to gossip about others and that was so enjoyable for years gossip is a favorite ego one of the activities of the ego that the ego loves because whenever you can criticize somebody you can feel superior you feel more yourself more deluded of course but that's how the ego works so for years you loved gossiping and suddenly it's so empty and you think why are they doing that and suddenly you don't contribute anymore and you just sit there and at dinner parties where you used to tell your exaggerated story to make people laugh you exaggerated every story just an example and everybody loved inviting you to their dinner parties because they loved your so entertaining the way you exaggerated what people said or did and suddenly you don't want to do that anymore and then people say what's happened to you you've become so boring and it may be that you don't take part in the drinking sessions anymore like to get drunk together and feel free liberated and it does happen sometimes as you evolve quickly some people around you don't want to see you anymore and others in other cases you don't want to see them anymore but it also happens that people around you become affected by the change in you without you wanting them to change they notice something in you and then suddenly they also become interested they may ask you one or two questions and you may notice or not even that their behavior changes simply because they are around you simply because the old games are not working anymore sometimes between two people two old friends the same type of interaction develops but condition patterns that have been operating for years both are playing a kind of role and let's call it their friendship they play this one plays this role the other compliments it with that role and they play it out twice a week they meet and they are their game and suddenly you don't play anymore and then of course the other person's role collapses because it needs to feed the role what's going on and then either they will leave you or a change will happen in the other person but if you are reacting to perhaps what is unconsciousness in others that before perhaps you didn't react to because you were part of it then that is also still a form of ego in you that's the awareness that you have of others you have it for a moment and then it becomes a judgment so there is presence for a moment where you see oh they are completely stuck in their old behavior you see that the stuckness but it doesn't remain a seeing the seeing the the presence is lost and then the mind turns it into a judgment and then the reaction comes allow the people as long as they are around you and they can only be around you at this moment so they are part of the form that this moment takes if you are with them why not accept the way they are at this moment what else can you do you become unhappy otherwise so you bring an acceptance to whatever they do with that comes a compassion allow other humans their unconsciousness allow them as long as they manifest unconsciousness by getting angry about their unconsciousness nothing is changed in fact you turn unconscious yourself for god sake wake up why can't you be more conscious and of course what the ego is going to reply is you talk to me about consciousness look at yourself and the cycle starts again or they tell you what's this airy fairy stuff about consciousness what's happened to you you've gone are you on drugs or something so as long as these people are there in front of you in the moment that's the isness of this moment nobody can act beyond their level of consciousness although a few try and the wonderful thing is change in others happens most when you no longer need them to change their behaviour when the expectations that they should behave in a certain way is dropped and in that way even old standing relationships like with your parents become healed and become whole again when the expectation that your father or your mother should behave in a certain way towards you is dropped when the expectation that your father or your mother should understand you is dropped because there we have the gap between what I want why can't you understand me what difference does it ultimately make to you whether this person understands you or not none what is added to you if your father or mother understand you do you become a more fulfilled no nothing really so when that demand that demand is dropped that they should behave differently they should know better should understand me they should accept me I want them to accept me yeah but they don't and there you have the gap between I want and what is and strangely all those demands and all that fruitless wanting is actually fuel for more unconscious reactions in you towards them so you're back in unconsciousness and see what happens if you don't make demands that people should behave differently from the behave they behave at this moment this doesn't mean you cannot tell a child don't walk there you might fall off come here these are practical matters not talking about that so bring acceptance to whatever behavior they manifest and see you may be surprised especially in your relationship with long standing relationships a change is when you don't need them to change anymore to make you happy when you don't need those people parents whoever to change anymore to make you happy then very often it's almost a miracle change happens in them and suddenly they are more open and when you didn't need them to understand you anymore suddenly there is an openness and they ask questions about your life whereas before all they could do was criticize and all you could do was react against their criticism and get upset and every meeting every time you visited them it would end in that way it's amazing how in long standing relationships people almost go there when they meet with their scripts as if they were reading their scripts and every time they go they have to act out the same script and in the end they get angry and doors are slammed and of course it's in the script perhaps one or two more questions

[Speaker 2] (2:52:32 - 2:53:28)

hello my name is lucy and i have a question for you um i'm thinking of the suffering of so many animals and i can somehow deal with my own pain my own fears but i'm shocked and infuriated when i see that millions maybe billions of um innocent animals are slaughtered or exploited by human race um nothing triggers my pain body as much as that and um then i think what can i do about it but most of the time it doesn't make any difference now i would like to ask you please enlighten me what what can i how can i handle it how can i deal with it

[Speaker 1] (2:53:28 - 2:53:29)

thank you

[Speaker 2] (2:53:29 - 2:53:30)

thank you

[Speaker 1] (2:53:30 - 3:03:03)

thank you it is true that what humans are doing to animals in factory farms where living beings are treated as objects shows extreme extreme unconsciousness and in such situations there's always the external level and there's the inner level the primary level is the inner so that whatever you do does not come out of a deeply negative inner state because any action because sometimes action may be needed but be careful that action does not flow out of a deeply negative inner state so how can you not feel negative about that and this is not to be seen perhaps in isolation it is to be seen within the totality of what human beings are doing to other life forms on the planet to nature and to themselves to other humans they are also doing it to humans 20th century I believe more than a hundred million human beings were killed violently so at this very moment on the planet all this is happening humans are killing other humans humans are killing animals and treating animals as if they were inanimate objects simply for profit for greed for more which is the ego the greed of the collective human ego and the ego doesn't see what it is doing when it destroys the forests which perhaps are the very basis for life on the planet there again when an ego looks at a forest when in other words what does it mean an ego an ego sees is the human mind the ego is thought and to look through abstract thought it's something looking at an animal or a tree and you look at it through thought and thought will evaluate what it sees according to its form and what it can get out of it the tree will get a price put on it or at best you cut it into little pieces and examine it to find out how it works that's what the human mind does I'm not saying no more science but we have the tendency of the human mind is to de to make lifeless what it falls upon if there's nothing else in you except thought and you approach reality only through thought whatever you perceive only through the screen of thought you're going to make lifeless in other words thought cannot sense the life that is there thought cannot sense the holiness the sacredness that is in every life form because thought is an abstraction so all humans who are trapped in their heads and that's all especially those who run the big businesses but everybody to some extent is trapped politicians and so on I'm not saying there's one category of human that is worse than others but they see only what has become made lifeless through their mind and so through the dimension of being is missing and they don't know what they are doing when they kill life on the planet because they've already killed it they've killed the feeling of their own aliveness because they live exclusively in a conceptualised sense of self an egoic sense of self the ability to sense to feel the deeper being that is the sacredness of life in every life form is not there they don't find it in themselves the sacred stillness the sacred space that is within and if you don't find it in yourself you haven't touched it because you're totally in the mind movement you cannot recognise the sacredness in others so humans are suffering from a form of mental illness collective mental illness which is to be trapped exclusively in the upper floor of your being and so this is the closest perhaps if you want to use words that you can express the truth of this is to say that when humans engage in such behaviour they are simply manifesting a form of collective illness mental illness for hundreds of years Zen Buddhism actually has occasionally used that word the sickness of the mind use that expression the dysfunction of the illness of humanity which is such that they will destroy themselves if it doesn't change so you have to see that cruelty within the context of the whole which is the illness of humanity and when you see it as illness perhaps a little bit of almost compassion arises it doesn't make it less dreadful what is happening but perhaps when you see it as an illness there is no longer the need in you to make these the people who do this into those who are considered as evil that always we have to come back to Jesus they don't know what they are doing they don't know what they are doing and then you can still you will feel sad of course you will when you watch that you will feel the sadness and you can accept that you feel very deeply affected by what you see but when you see it in the larger context of human illness you may be able to be free of anger and if that is the case then you may be able to take also some action on the external level and the only action or the most useful action is not to try and convince people that what they are doing is wrong but simply to show them what they are doing because not enough people have seen it simply to show what is happening show them through disseminating information or whatever and many humans will be shocked many haven't really seen what's happening and anybody who is not totally trapped in their minds will feel something and there may be change coming but the true change happens through enough human beings to go through this inner transformation not until then will the collective illness on the planet become healed and our gathering here is part of that maybe one last question

[Speaker 3] (3:03:04 - 3:03:43)

good afternoon my name is Marianne thank you for being here I read in your book the power of now that women can be especially vulnerable to their pain bodies just before their menstrual period I recognize that and somehow I feel that it is not only my personal pain body it's bigger than that it also relates I think to the question that was just asked but could you please say something more about that yes what you feel there is the I've spoke before of collective aspects of the pain body we mentioned countries and so on and there's also such a thing as the female collective pain body because we've lived in mainly patriarchal societies for several thousand years before then there were women where the female was respected greatly there were even there were matriarchal societies there was a time when most gods were goddesses they were female and then as humans moved more and more into their minds they created male gods more and more and then the female became more and more devalued and so because of violence inflicted on female on countless women who were over the centuries were treated as slaves sometimes sold treated as goods almost and so not not respected raped killed used exploited of course that happened also men they also did it to groups of men but talking at the moment just from that aspect so something that we could call the female collective pain body developed and that's the many women's pain body most probably all women's pain body is partly collective and so it's when your womanhood manifests itself most clearly it's through menstruation which should be a joyful time that tends to activate the collective woman pain body in women and many women are now conscious of that and actually become more alert when it happens because what how much of your pain body as a woman goes back to your personal pain and what portion of it is due to the collective female pain body ultimately doesn't matter when it arises and you begin to observe it you begin to become conscious of it and many women are now working in that way and are actually becoming more conscious at that time because they know they need to become more alert just as the time approaches they already know okay and then they may feel the first movement as a reaction as a thought as an emotion and then it depends on what level you can catch it with your attention you no longer need you don't need to question when you observe it in yourself is what I'm feeling now collective or personal it doesn't matter from the perspective of consciousness it's enough for you to look you don't need to know know its origin this applies to any kind of emotion that arises in you not just in this context for it to be transmuted and dissolved you do not need to know its origin although sometimes its origin will reveal itself to you as you pay attention to it but many things that are inside humans many emotions have their origin in at almost at the very beginning when you still lived in the sea perhaps and you got eaten up five million times that was already a form of pain so the it goes back sometimes you cannot trace it back and at other times it will suddenly see oh that's where it came from that's fine so allow the origin to reveal itself if it wants to reveal itself for the process to work it is not necessary for the origin to reveal itself although it is nice when it does so all that is required is your conscious presence as the emotional field becomes activated and if possible don't allow it to rise into your thinking once it gets hold of that then it's more difficult to be present you may need little reminders it really is like and not just in this context the female pain body any manifestation of pain body is really like going to sleep acting out a dream you may need little reminders as if you were going into a dream sometimes you see strange films like that and in the dream you could have a reminder that you are dreaming so you could put little reminders in your home so that when you walk into the bathroom you can have a face that looks like you know the masks the traditional masks for theatre comedy and tragedy one mouth goes up one mouth goes down you can have one with the mouth down and have a question mark pain body as a little sign to watch because you may be immersed in pain body so you walk into your bed into your bathroom and on the mirror you see that image with the question mark and then you oh it might wake you up there's no guarantee that it will another possibility is you will tear it down I don't want to hear any more of that nonsense about pain body sometimes it works sometimes it doesn't or you tell your partner to wake you up when the pain body attack comes wake me up when I fall asleep sometimes it works sometimes it doesn't so these are all things that arise as presence arises those things will arise also in the field of presence occasionally they will obscure presence temporarily but now that presence is already active has become activated in many of you long before you came here in some of you perhaps today presence has become activated in you there's no going back it can only become obscured temporarily and probably will that's fine at any given moment see if you can be accepting of that moment see if you can be not a walking pain body not a walking storyline but presence who you truly are consciousness taking on form temporarily as this body and this mind but you are more than the body and the condition mind the underlying consciousness knowing yourself as that at this moment you don't need to be present or surrender for the rest of your life that would be a problem oh no now I have to surrender for the every day of my life from now on that would be a big task ahead of you stressful am I going to make it but you don't need to only at this moment that's not a lot thank you

It seems almost paradoxical we are going to spend some time together tonight in order to explore a dimension of consciousness that is beyond time. We are spending time together to move more deeply into the present moment and to experience a dimension of consciousness that opens up when your attention is completely present in this moment. And there are two levels of teaching, if you call it that, it's not really teaching, there are the words and there are the silent spaces in between the words.

Usually people don't pay attention to the silent spaces between words and in this, our civilization there actually aren't many silent spaces anymore. In your head there may be an almost continuous dialogue unless you are beginning to encounter within yourself a dimension of stillness. What happens when you pay attention to a gap between sentences or between words, a silent space, immediately there is some stillness inside you because it's only through the stillness that you can listen to the silence, to become aware of the silence of the gaps.

Now what does stillness mean, that's just a word, we could use other words, I sometimes use the word presence to describe this state of consciousness that is now emerging collectively on this planet, although at the moment only relatively few people are able to access it, but there is a state of consciousness that is emerging on the planet that is very different from the consciousness that has been dominant throughout human history. And compared to that new state of consciousness that is emerging, a state that has been pointed to by many teachers in the past, but has always been misinterpreted, the original purity of all those teachings has been misinterpreted by the human mind and completely misunderstood.

So what does it mean, stillness? The human mind says stillness isn't interesting enough, it's a state of consciousness that is free of thought and yet you're fully alert, fully awake, fully present. It doesn't mean you will never think again, thought will come in again, but you will always be rooted in that state as you learn to live in that state and this state emerges more fully, and us sitting here together this evening, what's really happening beyond the personal level is that this state of consciousness here is emerging.

On a personal level it might look as if I were telling you useful things, how to live free of problems, free of suffering, free of conflict, but it goes far beyond the personal level and the main, the essence of what I speak about and point to, you cannot actually understand through the mind because the essence is precisely beyond the mind. And by mind I mean thought activity, mental noise. Most humans are trapped in that continuous mental noise and identify with the mental noise as themselves, as me, and there's a continuous monologue or dialogue going on in the head and that grows already, young children start to develop it and gradually you identify with the mental noise, an image arises as this is, that's me, and you are completely trapped in this continuous stream of incessant thinking and that is, your sense of self, of me, gets identified with that, so my problems, my suffering, what about me, what's going to happen to me, it's a mental image of a sense of self that is never really at ease, never feels really at home, is always trying to get somewhere but never quite gets there. Many times it thinks it's got there but then realizes, oh no, I'm not there.

It tries to get to some state, some relief, some state of happiness or fulfillment, completion, perfection, in whatever way, no matter, the bank robber is trying to get there in some way but he's robbing a bank in order to get the money because he believes that the money will eventually enable him to feel a more intense aliveness, a more deeply rooted sense of self, of identity, and that's of course an illusion, but even the spiritual person who is practicing certain techniques for years is trying to get somewhere, a state of perfection, a future, this mind-made sense of self is always reaching out to the future because it believes there's salvation there somewhere for me, at some point in the future I'm going to make it, whether the making it is becoming wealthy or the making it is becoming a spiritual master or enlightened, basically it's the same mind structure still at work. So to be condemned to an almost continuous state of unease, something is never quite right, I need to get somewhere, this moment is never quite right, or very, very rarely, only when a desire has just been fulfilled there's a moment of relief and then immediately something else arises. That's something to observe in oneself, that state of unease with what is, with the present moment, that's part of the old consciousness, it's embedded in the very structure of the human mind, so no matter what you do you can't get rid of it on the level of mind, and then gradually all this mental noise becomes self-serving, it's simply is there to reinforce itself, you go around in vicious circles, and all we are doing here is allowing a deeper dimension of consciousness to emerge because it wants to emerge, otherwise there wouldn't be much chance, you can't make it happen, but you can allow it to happen. The very fulfilment of your existence as a human being on this planet is the flowering of consciousness, stepping out of the conditioned self, the conditioned mind, all the mental noise is conditioned by the past, stepping out of a conditioned sense of self, my history, my story, me, equating your sense of identity with your story, your history, all that's the conditioned, and it is possible to step out of that, and what is there beyond the conditioned little me, that little sense of self derived from the past, and that needs the future for its fulfilment, and at the same time feel threatened by the future, because the future is going to kill it, so it's a double edged sword that continues running towards the future, away from this moment, seeking fulfilment, at some future moment I'm going to get there, but at the same time feel deep down the future is also going to kill me, so humans live between these two, fear and desire movements, and for most people all their motivations, all their actions arise either out of fear or desire, they're all connected with future, and that also is embedded in the very structure of the human mind, it's interesting to observe it in oneself, even to observe that you're not at ease in this moment, even to observe that just ten seconds ago you were thinking about your dinner tonight, or the problem that you're going to have to face tomorrow, even to observe that is already the beginning of another consciousness emerging, if you can observe what the mind is doing, that is not part of the mind, you're not judging it, you're simply watching that, that is the stillness emerging in you, that is the dimension of consciousness that is deeper than the mind, vaster, of infinite potential, it contains infinite vast potential, and once you access that, you will be able to see that you are finding it amazing that humans have lived for thousands of years, trapped in a sense of self that was so limited, to see themselves as a little person, with a little history and a little future, and to be trapped in that sense of self is such an illusion, and it's so, it's a prison, so just to watch, even at this moment, is, am I at ease, am I not at ease, or is there some part of me that wants to be somewhere else, do I want to be in the future, or am I trying to get away from this moment, that's always, that is the essence of the old state of consciousness, and when you observe it, that's the beginning of a new consciousness, I sometimes, it's sometimes called the witnessing consciousness, you observe what the mind is doing, so you are not totally trapped in it, and that is only the beginning, that is only the beginning, and then it emerges more deeply, more fully, as the state of stillness, which you may get glimpses of even here, and perhaps at this moment, when the mind is not moving anymore, you are alert, completely present, completely open to the aliveness of this moment, and most humans are totally unaware of that, that the fact that there is an infinite source, potential, for aliveness, concealed, is not in what looks like so insignificant to the mind, and that's this moment, it's like the atom, the tiniest of things, contains vast energy, once it opens up, so the very life energy, the energy that sustains the whole universe, you can have access to it, through the little doorway that opens up when your attention moves into this moment, and it always means you become very alert, very present, that's stillness, stillness, alertness, presence, they are all one.

So stillness, don't misinterpret stillness as meaning you are going off to sleep, or the kind of stillness you have after a few drinks, you might drift off a bit in life, you can't remember your problems, so you feel a little bit better. But even drink can sometimes mean, people sometimes drink to get rid for a little while of the torture of their mind, telling them what their problems are, the problematic sense of self, the me, so they drink and for a moment they don't remember their problems, but of course there's a price to pay, because you go, there's a lowering of consciousness, so you go lower towards the vegetable realm. And what we are doing, we are not moving in that direction here, it's fine for vegetable, plant life has unbelievable beauty and aliveness to it, and in many ways it's more enlightened than humans, because it doesn't inhabit a world of problems, this flower has no problems, and even when it comes to die, it's not a problem, it just dies, and yet there is an aliveness there, and it's also an expression of consciousness, a beautiful expression of the divine consciousness, just as you are. So we are moving beyond thinking to a more awake state, a more alert state, a more present state, compared to which the thinking state is a dreamlike state.

To be immersed in thinking, this mental dialogue, you are only peripherally aware of your surroundings, because you might be walking in the woods in the most beautiful surroundings, but you are thinking about your problems, my problems, what about me? You are not there. If then something happened that would give you a little shock, you would suddenly, for a moment, enter a state that is present and alert.

If you were suddenly confronted with a bear, you would come out of your thinking state, out of your problems, and there would be the bear, and that's not a problem, it's a situation that requires probably some action. Either you move away, or you make a noise, whatever. But the difference between that state is so, and this is a state that can happen to some humans accidentally in certain situations.

You're driving, and suddenly something goes wrong, and you know an accident is imminent in two or three seconds. And you've been driving for two hours, immersed in your world of problems, stress, this, that, to deal with, and suddenly all that drops away. This is an example when the state of consciousness that I'm pointing to emerges accidentally, and many people have reported they knew an accident was inevitable within two or three seconds, or five seconds, and they suddenly found themselves in an inner state of extreme calm and serenity, and they were totally there, totally alert, all fear had left, and later they survived to tell about it.

They said, this was amazing, how could this be, because it's such a dangerous situation, and I felt so serene suddenly. There are many reports, many similar examples. So this state of consciousness can sometimes emerge briefly usually, accidentally.

Some people seek it out through dangerous activities. It's the only way they can be free of the burden of their mind. The burden of the problem personality, of the me, the burden of this problematic me that they think that's their reality, because when they're climbing up the wall of the mountain, they can't think about that.

They have to be present, totally alert in the now. But when they come down, they get back in their car, they re-enter the world of problems. So they can't be in the state, they think they need to be engaged in that activity to be in that state, but that is not the case.

You can choose that state now. If you're sitting here, what I'm saying now might not yet apply to all humanity, but if you're sitting here, there's enough consciousness in you to choose a state that is free of the problem-making mind. And you realize when you enter the now that there is no problem ever in this moment.

There may be a situation that you need to deal with. That is never a problem. Anything that comes into the now, you may need to take action, do this or that, and you do it.

It arises out of that state of consciousness, of presence. But dwelling mentally on situations, investing the situations with a sense of me, self, and going around in circles, lying in bed at night, sleepless, and wherever you go, you can't stop this machine, the noise machine in the head, because you don't remember where the button, the off switch is. That is torture.

The most wonderful realization is that in the state of consciousness that I call presence, there are no problems. Perhaps challenges, but they never turn into problems. If you cannot take action, everybody in this room is involved in a certain life situation.

Some better than others. Some life situations are relatively good and comfortable. Other life situations may be problematic.

There may be a shortage of money. There may be health problems. There may be relationship problems, work, and many kinds of completely fictitious problems created by the mind.

What if this happens, or that happens, or I lose this, or I don't get that, or he leaves me, or she leaves me. So another level of problems is total fiction. It comes about through the incessant mental noise.

It's a very radical reversal of the normal way to live. Take your attention, whenever you think you can't stand your problems anymore, and it's getting too much, and you wake up in the morning and say, oh, not another day. No human is meant to live like that, waking up in the morning and saying, I can't face another day.

And nor in nature that doesn't happen. The flower too, when the sun rises, the flower opens up, because it responds to the sun, and no flower has ever said, I can't face another day. No animal has ever said, I can't face another day, except perhaps animals that are suffering deeply because of what humans have done to them.

But no animal in the wild would, an animal wakes up, and a plant, a flower wakes up, and immediately is in a state of aliveness. And you can see it. Jesus talked about it, when he often would say, look at the flowers.

And when he said, look at the flowers, he meant it. He wants you to really look and see the incredible beauty and aliveness. And if you look deeply enough, you will see that they are actually celebrating life.

And this is how life is meant to be. Humans are meant to celebrate life too, in a completely different way. They also are an expression of the divine consciousness.

Now we impose our world view also on nature, so whatever world view you have gets projected. So humans these days say, the whole of nature is a struggle for survival, because that's their own life, that's their own mind. If you were free of that mindset that says everything is a struggle for survival, you would actually see that most of the time, nature is celebrating life.

And the moments of struggle are very short. Animals mostly live in a state of ease. When they get hungry, they might kill.

That's a very brief moment compared to most of their existence. So to carry this burden of survival is a burden of problems, which is the mind, which gets heavier as people grow older. Often the burden increases.

Past gets heavier and heavier inside. You carry a heavier and heavier burden of past. But even young people carry a heavy burden of future.

And gradually you can no longer feel life. You can no longer feel the aliveness that is in the very depths of your being, because of the mental noise. It covers up an incredible deep sense of vitality and aliveness that is life itself.

But it's covered up by mental noise. Jesus talked about it. He said, I want you to have life and more abundant life.

I want you to have more abundant life. He didn't mean more abundant consumer goods. He didn't mean more shopping malls.

He was not talking about the things in life. He was talking about life itself, the aliveness of life itself. And if the only place where you can be in touch with that is through the stillness underneath the mental noise, the vibrantly alive stillness presence underneath the mental noise.

There you get, because the stillness is also a feeling of intense aliveness. That's the place where you are connected with something much vaster than the little me. When you touch that incredible sense of aliveness, the only place in time where you can do that is now.

When you touch that, a vastness of life is there. And as you have access to that more and more, you begin to, that begins to be in your life, not just as a glimpse, but for longer periods, you dwell in the state of connectedness, as I sometimes call it connectedness with being. Where life feels good.

It feels good to be alive. This is the most simple terms I could, even a child would understand that. It feels good to be alive.

But in that goodness that is life itself, out of the goodness that is life itself, things emerge out of the vibrantly alive stillness that is in your very being. Things emerge out of that. Thoughts may come suddenly out of it, but they will be creative, new thoughts.

Not the old gramophone records that you've been thinking about for 10 or 20 years. Insights realizations come out of that, because that's the source of all creativity. So you're touching life itself, not the manifest it was.

Life before it becomes something in its original form, or rather no form. The formless life that you are. That is your essence.

That is to be connected with that, is to become free of the world, of attachment to the things of the world, of grasping and clinging and needing. And there's an incredible sense of you suddenly know how precious you are as that life. No matter whether on the external level you are an important person or a non-important person, that's the world telling you you are important or the world telling you you haven't made it, that has nothing to do with finding that place within yourself where you become free of that and you no longer believe what the world is telling you.

Because after all, the world is insane. And if you believe it, you believe what an insane world is telling you. If you doubt that the world is insane, pick up a history book.

Or switch on the news. It may not be 100% insane, but let's say 90%. So you're allowing an insane world to tell you either that you are important and believe that, and a few years later the same world will tell you that you are no longer important.

You've lost your position and somebody else is chairman of the board now. And you thought that was your identity. And you might even have to return your American Express Platinum card.

And that is painful. If your sense of identity was in that, something that is funny really to that person would be very painful. My God, I'm nobody again.

And I thought I was somebody. How can I survive without the Platinum card? And then somebody else believes it when they tell you you are no good because you haven't made it in the world.

Oh, I failed. Life has treated me unfairly. I've missed out on life.

I never had a chance. Or I had a chance, but I didn't use it. So the world telling you, the insane world now telling you you're not important or you're nobody.

Look who is regarded as important in the world. Actors, singers, whatever, politicians. And most of them are miserably unhappy with the facade of happiness.

And those are the idols of the world. So your sense of self is no longer derived from that. And that's a wonderful liberation.

You don't, what the world is telling you becomes completely irrelevant because your aliveness has such depth to it. You know that nobody could take that away from you. And you need nobody's confirmation that your life is incredibly valuable.

And self-esteem, you no longer need to tell you that you are good enough when you are in touch with the very goodness of life itself. Until that, it may be helpful to have little affirmations telling you that you are good enough. Then you move beyond when you are in touch with the very goodness of life in yourself.

Then you no longer need mental concepts of who you are. And this is what Jesus meant when he said, I have overcome the world. Not that he had any worldly power.

So that is, that depth of aliveness is here in you at this moment. But you need to be open to that. A very helpful point of entry and many of you are living it already, is to feel the aliveness that is in every cell of your body at this very moment.

Every cell is vibrant with life throughout your being. And to feel that, to be connected with that. You don't have to, and you'll notice when your attention moves into the body, the inner energy field of the body, I sometimes call it the inner body, but you could also call it the joy body because there is deep joy in that aliveness.

When your attention is there, you're not, the noise suddenly subsides in the head because the attention has moved from the head into your being. And you're then rooted in the now. You're rooted in your being.

And it's almost as if your whole body were coming to life suddenly. That's what Jesus meant when he said, your whole body will be filled with light. That is the light of consciousness.

And then there's still plenty of consciousness left to perceive the world. As you sit there and feel the aliveness in your being, you're rooted in the now. You're rooted through that, that's the opening, that's the doorway.

You're rooted in being. Everything is an expression of the divine consciousness, one form or another form. Every organ and cell, DNA and so on, has vast intelligence that the human mind could never understand.

Even a thousand years we'll still be exploring how the body works. It's so easy to be connected with an intelligence that is greater than the mind. Simply feel the aliveness of the inner body and you will soon come to a place of, feel there's joy there.

The joy of life itself. And it doesn't depend on what's in your life as the circumstances, because circumstances come and go. They may be negative at the moment, they may be positive at the moment, they rarely remain the same.

If they're positive now they may be negative next year. There are constant fluctuations out there, but there is a place that is free of that. And people in prison who have written to me are practicing that and living that and finding an intense joy and aliveness despite the dreadful conditions of their external circumstances.

So those external circumstances, I call that, that's your life situation. Good, bad, indifferent, it changes. You lose things, you gain things.

Life situations continuously fluctuate. And even the greatest success story eventually will move into old age, loss of beauty or loss of wealth or loss of the ability to move. On the external level nothing lasts.

The Buddha discovered that. Everything is impermanent on the external level. And yet there is a place where you're free of those things.

Those things can no longer influence, affect your state of being. So you become free of the world. And it doesn't matter if you're homeless now, you might think, OK, first I need to find a home and then I will practice going within and going deeply into the now.

Because there's a fear which is the mind's conditioning, if I go deeply into the now now, I will be stuck in this now that I don't like that I'm in now. That's a very subtle thing, a very subtle resistance. I don't like my life circumstances, the mind says, so I'm not going to go into the now because I don't want to be in the now.

I want to get to the future, and once I get to the future, then I'll go into the now. Perhaps the American Express Platinum Card will take me into the now. And of course the miracle is you do it now, no matter what the circumstances of your life are, there's no excuse for not doing it.

And the quickest way out of undesirable circumstances, homeless, even prison, penniless, or even physical condition, the quickest way out of that is to enter the present moment and find the now. Connect with the vast aliveness that is there, just waiting for you to touch it. And then, that vast aliveness, you're not just practicing that when you're sitting still in your room, it's not just a meditation practice, it's a way of being, so you begin to dwell in that state of connectedness, and you will notice how suddenly there's more creativity in your life, there are more insights, realizations of what is the right thing to do.

You will wake up and suddenly know, oh, this is what I have to do. Because they arise out of that state, life itself begins to live through you and move through you. The little person struggling to make a living, or to be a success, or to make it, is not really needed anymore, the struggling little me.

So life itself begins to move through you, and it does it much better than you could ever do, because ultimately, you are life. By you, I mean the fictitious little me in the head. And then, very quickly, life situations actually emerge.

And then you improve, because you bring to every moment that deep sense of aliveness, of being there, and you can honor this moment fully. That means immediately a sense of deep care flows into what you do, all your interactions. When you're completely there, you give your complete attention to whatever task is at hand, and even if you were in a job that the mind tells you is boring and you want to get out of, the quickest way out of that, and you might have been stuck in it for years, thinking, I need to get out of it, is to bring a different state of consciousness to it, giving care even to the tedious things that you have to do and bring that to it. That is meaning, that means the resistance to the now suddenly goes.

And the resistance to the now is an essential aspect of the conditioned human mind. It is always fighting this moment in one way or another. No, don't want to be here.

I need to be somewhere else. And that's when the resistance to the now goes, then life can move freely through you. Then problems disappear.

And of course nothing is made into a problem. Challenges still come, but you respond to them in the now, out of that sense of presence and aliveness. You see, what can I do about this situation now?

And you become still. And then action arises out of that state. No longer the agonizing, oh, me and my problems.

And you never again will wake up in the morning and say, I can't face another day. It's a dreadful condition, but many humans are in that. You will then wake up and you will open your eyes and the mind is not going to start immediately and tell you what your problems are, so immediately the burden descends on you of, oh, I can't face it anymore.

You wake up and immediately connect with the aliveness that is in every cell of the body and hold that state. It feels good to be alive and the mind hasn't, why does it feel good to be alive? Because the mind hasn't started up yet and reminded you of your problems.

Because underneath that, it always feels good. Life is always vitally alive and beautiful. And so life becomes a celebration continuously, not a needing to get to some future moment to become happy or become somebody or to make it.

And the miracle is that everything flows with greater ease then. And you're even likely to be more successful as if it mattered. Because whatever you do in that state is done with care and even love.

You honour the now. You honour life itself. You open your arms to life itself.

That is love. That is a deep sense of care that you give to whatever arises in the now. Yes.

How can life not be cooperative if that is your state of being? And how can life be cooperative if you continuously say, no, I don't want to be here. I want to be somewhere else.

Or even I want to be somebody else. So it's like being closed, resisting the now, denying the now, running away from the now. Anything but this, the mind says.

And then the shift happens. You honour life. Then life can help you.

It's been trying to help for years. You just can't get through. The sun tries to shine.

It doesn't mean you are big and powerful, so you can keep out even life. You're not separate from life. If you keep the shutters closed in a room, the sun just won't come in.

It would love to come in. But if you keep the shutters closed, the sun doesn't really mind. But it would love to come in.

So that is the state of non-resistance to the present moment. The most miraculous transformation of consciousness as a human being. Once you enter that state, it's there.

And there's always, as we started off by pointing to the stillness, when you do not resist what is, the incessant mental noise slows down, subsides, huge gaps arise in the mind stream. Because almost all the mental noise is continuous resistance. So you open yourself up to just this moment.

That is the ultimate spiritual practice. And nothing could be more simple, and yet it seems so difficult because of the conditioning of the mind. This concludes Session 1.

Our program continues with Session 2. Sounds True and Namaste Publishing present Living the Liberated Life and Dealing with the Pain Body, Session 2 with Eckhart Tolle.

[Speaker 1] (55:06 - 1:52:39)

So the sense of power or aliveness that dwells there, this is what they talk about in trust, the word trust, trusting in life, to have to trust. It's hard to make yourself trust when your primordial condition is fear, which is the primordial human condition in the mind identified state. Fear and trust can't go together.

Trust is simply the absence of fear. So you cannot make yourself trust, or even affirmations won't do it. You can even repeat affirmations and put them on your bathroom mirror.

I trust in life. I trust that life is supporting me. But eventually you have to go even beyond the affirmation, and the trust arises naturally where you actually don't need any more affirmations because you're there, the reality of it is there.

Affirmations are maybe a transitional stage when you haven't quite arrived at the reality of it. Then you say, I'm wealthy, but when you have 50 million in the bank, you can take off the affirmation from your bathroom mirror. It's obvious you know you're wealthy.

You don't need to say it anymore. Bill Gates doesn't have the affirmation on his bathroom mirror. And that's only external wealth.

He's not, this is not going to save him. Even with that, he cannot buy peace. But just giving that example to see when you have, when the reality is obvious and it's there and you don't need the signpost anymore because every affirmation is a kind of signpost that points you in the right direction.

But there comes a point when the signpost isn't needed anymore because you have arrived. So that the trust, trust, when you feel you go into the inner body and then there's the first very subtle and then you feel increasingly more intensely the power, the aliveness, the stillness and yet the incredible energy behind that. And then you know that that is actually, that is most, on the most fundamental level, that's, I am that.

I'm not the little me in the head. And that is going to, that lives and acts through you. That power is there.

And when you know yourself as that, that's trust, then you suddenly trust is your natural state. No longer something you need to figure out how to get there. Trust is your natural state so that even the concept trust disappears because it's so natural you don't even have a word for it anymore.

Many concepts disappear when the reality that to which the concept points arrives. The very mental concept of it is not really necessary anymore. I rarely talk about love, although I did this morning, but I don't talk about it too often.

It arises naturally out of the state of presence. And you don't even, you don't need to keep the concept in your head and tell yourself that I'm loving, a loving being. It's not needed anymore.

I sometimes surprised when people tell me things and I say, oh, people sometimes, because I'm kind of present and people say, oh, you're so patient. Oh, I'm so patient? I didn't know I'm patient.

I hadn't thought about it as patient. It never occurred to me that I'm patient. I didn't have the whole, this concept at all because patient still means that you're trying hard to be here.

There's some kind of effort involved in being patient. But when true patience is there, you don't even know you're patient. You're just present.

Patient still means you're halfway, you're half there and half not there. You're practicing to be patient. Okay, I'll be patient for another half hour, but then I've had enough.

So it's wonderful when these, the world of, all these concepts are not really needed anymore. But there is a stage when they may be helpful. There is a stage when the affirmation on the bathroom mirror is okay.

But there also comes a time when you go beyond that. You wouldn't want to be staring at a signpost. If you want to get to Rome, you wouldn't be staring at a signpost for years that says Rome that way.

And then there are the collectors of signposts. They have a whole bunch stored up and then compare them. This compares to that one and this tradition and he said that and he said that and this.

And if you become a collector of signposts, then it's hard to let go because you have a precious collection. In a way, all teachings are signposts. And you don't need to even identify with any particular form of teaching.

There can be certain traps on the spiritual path. To identify with one particular form in which a teaching comes and then he says, okay, I'm a Buddhist. And the other says, no, I'm a Sufi.

And the other says, well, I'm a Zen Buddhist and you are Theravada. Zen is actually superior. Again, images come in and they can be obstacles when you identify.

Ego on the spiritual path can creep in at any stage. So to look out. Now ego means a new image has formed again in your mind of who you are.

Ego is a very subtle thing you can observe in yourself. Comparison. Ego likes to compare itself.

Comparison is an ego device. So ego compares itself to others in a subtle way. And whenever ego is a feeling of inferiority or superiority arises, as against others.

Both the feeling of, okay, I may not be as good as that person or as knowledgeable or as spiritual as that person. That's ego. Or feeling I'm more spiritual than that person.

I've been practicing for longer or my tradition is better than that person's. Then that's the superior ego coming in. Even to have an image of yourself as spiritual, let the ego go into that.

Trying to live according to an image in your head, trying to be spiritual, to see yourself as spiritual, that's another ego trap. And then you become more unconscious in a way. Ego means unconsciousness has returned.

And despite your meditation practice, then you find there are lots of things that if you have an image of yourself as spiritual, then there are lots of things you can't, you have to deny that arise inside you and that would be, if you looked at them openly, they would be telling you, oh no, you're not that spiritual. You have to push them aside. Anger, whatever comes up, if it no longer fits your self image, you push it aside.

And then it goes building up momentum like a boiling kettle, a boiling pot you have put the lid on, and the steam is building up. And then suddenly you get an outburst or a wave of depression. In Christianity, often they have tried to live according to what it's like to be a good Christian, trying hard, and anything that doesn't fit the self image of me as a good Christian has to be pushed aside.

And then you can't push it aside forever. At some point, the unconscious will again emerge and overwhelm you as rage, as anxiety, as depression, a mood, dark mood suddenly coming in. And so presence is to live free of self images, because that's mind, it's conditioning, free of needing some image to tell you who you are.

You don't really need that. And this is why I said you learn from animals, although animals have no self image. They are themselves.

They act naturally, spontaneously, or rather, life acts through them. They have, of course, the limitations of their particular form. And yet, they are more deeply connected to the source than humans, humans in their normal state.

So that's again, that's why it's so helpful to learn to botch an animal. It doesn't live through a self image. It is itself.

It's a natural, the natural state. And what we are returning to is the natural, that's in India, as I sometimes use that expression, the natural state that humans lost a long time ago. So that's wonderful.

You're returning to that. So simply observe when some new self image has formed, or some old self image has returned. Look so often, be aware of comparison.

Comparison as an ego device. In a subtle way, you're feeling better than or not as good as. There's the ego.

Better than, not as good as. Another sign that you're living through a self image is defensiveness. Defensiveness arises when somebody questions your beliefs, questions a statement that you've made, doubts this or that, that you associate with your self image.

So observe defensiveness coming in. And it's always, you're always defending an image, because who you truly are doesn't need any defense. It's so powerful, cannot be attacked, it's totally beyond anything that could be injured or attacked in any way.

It doesn't need any defenses. So observing when it happens. When you observe it, you're no longer trapped in that unconscious movement.

When you observe that an image has arisen in your mind, and you've identified with that, at that moment, oh, that's the, again, the unconditioned has come in. You're suddenly aware of it. When you're observing that you've become defensive about a position you have taken, may even be something spiritual, my mental position, it's, you've identified with a position, which means an image has formed in your mind of me, and that needs to be defended.

Therefore, the Course in Miracles says, it has some wonderful statements, whenever you become defensive about anything, know that you have identified yourself with an illusion. Whenever you become defensive about anything, know that you have identified yourself with an illusion. But the knowing is not part of the illusion.

That's the beauty of it. The moment you know that you have identified yourself with an illusion, the knowing is not the illusion. You have recognized the illusion, and in that knowing, you are free of the illusion.

So the more illusions like that you discover in yourself, the better. Because every time you discover a mind pattern, an old mind pattern acting itself out, a self-image, defensiveness, grasping, clinging, the moment you become aware of patterns, the awareness or the knowing is not part of that. That's why it's so wonderful.

The more you discover that's unconscious in you, the better. It doesn't mean that you have failed. Discovering it is, this is how it works, to recognize it.

To recognize illusion as illusion is not illusion. You have recognized. The recognition is not part of the conditioned mind.

The recognition is the unconditioned. It sees. It just sees.

So this is the wonderful thing that means you can afford the luxury of allowing whatever arises inside you to arise. You don't have to deny anything when we do this work, if you want to call it work. You don't need to deny anything, which you need to if you live through a self-image.

Anything that doesn't fit the self-image is denied. But in this work, whatever arises, you allow it. Emotional patterns, mind patterns arise, and there comes the recognition as they arise.

When I say allow whatever arises to arise, you might ask, well, doesn't everybody live in that way? No, they don't. The allowing implies that there is an awareness, and the awareness is not part of the conditioned.

When I say allow, it implies there is a presence that observes the pattern as it unfolds, either in your head or externally as a behavior pattern when you're talking to someone. So just watch. The more you see, the more consciousness grows.

The more unconscious patterns you discover in yourself, the more consciousness is growing. So it doesn't arise anymore to say, oh, I shouldn't be feeling this. I shouldn't have that thought.

I shouldn't. This doesn't arise anymore. The deep, the allowing of inner states, it's a wonderfully liberating practice.

And then you know that there's no inner state that is actually you, no inner, no conditioned state is who you really are. That's why you're free to allow them. Otherwise, if anger comes, and you identify with it, and say, oh, I shouldn't be that.

I've been on the spiritual path for so many years, and I'm still getting all this anger. I shouldn't. Then you want to repress it or deny it or say, no, I'm not angry.

I'm just, I'm never angry. Don't accuse me of being angry. You are angry.

The typical ego interactions, me unconscious, you are the one who is unconscious. And observe how mechanical defensiveness is, the mechanical nature, the condition. It arises almost like clockwork, almost automatically.

Somebody pushes a button and the reaction comes. And when people know you after a while, then if they want a reaction, they just push the button. It's like a robot.

A few months ago, I was walking in Stanley Park in Vancouver and by the pond. Just an example of, I was, I'm always watching around me because one can learn so much by simply watching people. Now, I don't mean, I also, animals, of course, are deeper learning, but you can learn about dysfunction by watching people.

There was a man, an old elderly man, feeding the ducks with breadcrumbs. And then two youngsters, teenagers on bicycles, 16 year old, came up and they were wearing a badge, some voluntary workers, ecological voluntary working brigade or something. And they talked to the man who was feeding the ducks and said, Oh, do you know that feeding the ducks is actually bad for them, feeding them breadcrumbs, because it fills up their stomach and doesn't give them enough nourishment.

And he was eating. And then he said, Yeah, yeah, I know. And he continued to feed the ducks.

And then they said a bit more. And then the defensiveness came up. He actually admitted that he knew it was bad for them.

But somehow, perhaps it gave him pleasure. Maybe it's the only interaction he has in life to feed the ducks. So the pleasure he derives from feeding the ducks was greater than knowing that it's actually harmful for them.

And then he said, Okay, well, no, I'm not stupid. Nobody's going to tell me what to do. I'm not stupid.

So ego reaction came like a like clockwork. And he started talking angrily and defending himself didn't make much sense, because you can't defend behavior that you've just recognized as wrong. But the ego doesn't care.

It was an automatic defense mechanism. And he talked for several minutes getting more and more angry, defending. Now, what was he defending?

A mental position, a mental image, his ego. And finally, the youngsters who were perhaps were present, seemed quite present, or well trained, at least. They said, Thank you for listening to us.

Bye, bye. And then the man walked on. And I walked on into 50 yards further on, I could see him, he was again feeding the ducks.

But it's now, let's just see if, if presence had been there in him at that moment. Let's say, let's replay the same scenario. He's feeding the ducks.

The youngsters come, say, Do you know it's harmful? And he's perhaps the first statement was actually true, is it? Yes, I know.

And then he would say, I know you're absolutely right. It just gives me so much pleasure. I can't help it.

I just feel that I need to feed the ducks. But you're right. I'll stop now.

Or I'll just give them the rest of what I have. But I know you're absolutely right. But it's just that I love the duck so much.

And it gives me so much pleasure to feed them. No, that is, that is his true power would be arising where the ego would have said, No, this is, you become annihilated. This is weakness.

Defend yourself. But if he had honestly expressed that, not needing to defend an image, then a true power would have arisen in him. His true power would have come forth.

And to the ego that looks like becoming vulnerable, like becoming vulnerable, but it's not. It's true strength. And the whole interaction, the quality would have changed with it.

There might have been a true communication between two human beings, the youngsters and the old man. There might even have been love. It could have been a wonderful encounter.

But the ego didn't allow that. It needed to defend itself. That's, you get, people get more and more trapped in that.

And this is just a tiny example. Now imagine somebody living like his whole life in that way. And most people are.

Not so much, perhaps, perhaps everybody in this room recognizes a little bit of that, sometimes more than a little bit, in their own lives. But most people in this room are not totally, nobody in this room is totally trapped in those ego patterns. Everybody who sits here, there's some already areas of freedom where you go beyond ego opening up.

Otherwise, you wouldn't be here. The ego wouldn't have allowed you to come here. Or if you had come anyway, it would have become too painful.

You would have gone home by now. Now, the interesting thing, when this, when presence, the dimension comes in, and you observe defensiveness, then, oh, God, there it is. And then sometimes, through the simple fact of observation, you go beyond it, because that's the power that is where you don't need the defensiveness anymore.

And then there's the shift suddenly. And always the mind will tell you, dangerous, defend yourself, protect yourself. So you learn by observing other human beings, and then observing yourself, of course.

The spiritual teaching or teacher, if it is true, says, okay, do you realize that you don't need to suffer anymore? Are you fed up enough with suffering? Or would you like to hang on to suffering?

Anybody who has come here today has already suffered enough. Otherwise, you wouldn't be here. So in a way, your suffering has been wonderful, because it's taken you to this point.

I know that I wouldn't be sitting here without having had dreadful suffering and pain. So it's, it's taken you here. And now the message that comes is, further suffering is not necessary if you voluntarily step into the new state of consciousness.

You choose the kingdom of heaven. Life doesn't have to drag you into it, kick you into the kingdom of heaven. It's painful.

It did that to me. But now my job is to tell people that you don't have to wait for that to happen to you. Choose the new state.

And you're able to do that. I wouldn't tell this to anybody, but not anybody comes here. If you come here, your level of consciousness, the new consciousness is sufficiently emerged already for you to understand what I mean when I say you can choose to live in the state that is free of suffering.

You can choose the state in which suffering is not possible anymore. Unhappiness does not arise. Not a state in which you close yourself and you become, okay, nothing can touch me anymore.

Protective shell, nothing to do with that. Because if nothing can touch, if you have a protective shell around you, that means that all the beautiful and good things can't touch you anymore either. That's not what it is.

It's a state of complete openness, a state of such intense presence that unhappiness has nowhere to cling to anymore. Because unhappiness can only cling to a mentally made sense of self, a little me, a past which moves continuously in past and future and continuously ignores the now. So the realization that in the now, there are no problems and there is no unhappiness.

And the unhappy me that lives through past and future dissolves as you become present. That's the teaching. That's the very same message that the Buddha gave 2,600 years ago and a few people got it.

And then misinterpretation started because the mind started getting in there and say, okay, let's work this out. What does it really mean? How can we categorize it?

How can we make a system out of that? So this heavy superstructure of mind stuff arose on top of the beautiful teaching. So this always happens.

The mind tries to get in there and so the heaviness of religion arises on top of the purity and simplicity of the original teaching. And this is the simplicity of the original teaching. We are going back to that freedom from pain is possible now.

Now first, that means you understand how pain arises. It arises by not being present to this moment, by running away, by fighting, by denying, by running away internally from what is. So that's how pain arises always.

When you accept what is, the new state of consciousness immediately is present. So you can't separate acceptance of what is from the new state of thoughtless awareness. The moment you fully accept what is, the new state of thoughtless awareness is present.

The whole mind stuff is resisting what is. Its very existence, the very ground for its existence is the continuous state of resistance to what is. So resistance to what is and the old consciousness go together.

So our practice is to not resist what is and thereby access the power of life. And yet, that may not immediately free you of all pain and suffering because humans have been in that state for many thousands of years. And there is an energy field of pain that every human being inherits simply by the very fact that you are born into the human condition, into the unenlightened, painful human condition, in ultimately mad human condition up to this point.

You are born into that so every human being has a share of human pain that comes even from very, as you're born into this world, you're already born with a burden of pain. So this is a very important part of our practice and realization. This is not a facile thing of saying okay from now on we can all be happy.

It goes deeper than that and we are not running away also, we are not running away from the fact that in you there lives an energy field of residue of past human pain. On a personal level, pain from childhood that leaves residues, energetic residues, different things, painful things have happened to you in childhood and of course far beyond that in time. But let's just talk from the level of your present existence in this form.

Pain that is carried over from your childhood and beyond and leaves, doesn't go away completely, it leaves residues of pain and energy fields. Everything is energy. Then those energy fields get together because they feel they vibrate at the same frequency.

So emotional pain gathers into one mass of pain, contracted energy that isn't flowing freely, an energy that I call the pain body that humans carry inside, an energy field of pain. If you don't recognize that, no matter how much spiritual practice you do and even what we are doing here, if you do not see, if you do not recognize how the pain body operates, it will trick you every time and you will lose consciousness through it. So I want to address it now.

So first we realize there is an energy field of pain in me that may manifest either as turbulence, anger, heaviness, like depression, tightness, fear, whatever way it manifests, it's not pleasant, it's painful, it's past pain, residues, but very much alive still. You carry it inside, but you're not always conscious of it. And I talk about it briefly in one chapter of the book, so we go into it a little bit more deeply now.

And now there's the added energy of presence that we take into the pain body. The pain body is sometimes dormant and sometimes active. It becomes active when you suddenly feel it very strongly, when it needs to feed on further experience of pain, as it always has to do regularly, like it's a little entity almost.

It needs feeding temporarily on the experience of further pain. And you will know that this has happened when a relatively insignificant trigger produces an incredible outburst reaction of pain. A minor thing goes wrong, or somebody says something, or your partner does something or says something, and there's suddenly a deep, or even a thought comes in, and suddenly it serves as a trigger for an immense, the arising of deep emotional pain.

At that moment, the pain body, this energy field, has come up out of its dormant state. It is ready to feed on more pain. It produces, first, two ways in which it, I haven't quite put it that clearly in the book.

I'll explain it in the next book. There are two ways in which it produces, it feeds on the further experience, because that's all you can feed on. You cannot, the pain body consists of that energy of pain.

It needs, please, where can I get more pain? It feeds on your thoughts when it's ready to rise up. It will control your thinking.

It rises into the mind, and the mind, which is your thought activity, becomes aligned with the pain body. Every thought you think is destructive and painful. And the pain body loves it.

It gobbles up the energy of every thought that you think, every destructive and deeply negative thought. It eats it up, so to speak, and it's having a good time. It's feeding.

And at that moment, one way of putting it is, one could say that that is the addictive quality of human pain. Addictive because it loves its pain. When the pain body has taken you over and has succeeded in pretending that that's who you are, all your thinking is completely aligned with it, and it's feeding on it.

At that very moment, the least thing you want, the last thing you want, is to be free of pain. At that moment, pain is what you want, because at that moment you are the pain body. And anybody who tells you that if I came into your life at that moment and gave you this message that a life free from pain is possible, you would hit me over the head.

Because the pain body would be there, and I would be talking to the pain body, and the pain body would be talking back at me. So the pain body needs to come in periodically, and you all have experienced it with partners, finding the ideal partner, and after a few weeks, realizing that there's another side to them, that periodically they become a little monster. And then thinking, oh, I must have made a dreadful mistake.

You haven't. Everybody has a pain body, including yourself, but it's a bit more difficult to see the little monster coming up in yourself. Now, the pain body will use your thinking.

It will feed on your negative and destructive thinking. It can go on. Now, how long the feeding time lasts of a particular pain body varies greatly from person to person.

It could be a brief one, a pain body that feeds very quickly, could be an hour or two. Some pain bodies have a feeding time of several weeks, even months. That's extreme.

And in very extreme cases, there are some pain bodies that have virtually no dormant stage. They are continuously feeding and active, but that's more rare. Much also happens.

You sometimes meet people who are, and you look into their eyes, and you can see the pain body is looking at you through their eyes, and they are waiting for an excuse to have more. They want you to give them a painful reaction. They want you to be angry with them.

They want you to attack them. That's people who are totally possessed by the pain body. So, level one, pain body feeds on your thinking.

Level two, pain body feeds on the feedback of emotional pain from other people. So, it'll not only use your thinking, it might even predominantly use somebody else's reactions. In relationships, when the pain body is ready to arise and feed, it will provoke a reaction in your partner, or the partner does it to you, pushes the right buttons, because it wants pain.

The pain body loves the drama. This is why drama is an essential part of most relationships. The pain body needs feeding, and you could be saying, suddenly it comes in.

At the slightest trigger, there it is. So, it feeds on the other person's reaction, and that's where drama arises in the relationship. And it'll give me more pain, please.

And the mind is aligned with it, so the mind will find wonderful ways of rationalizing why it'll add to it, through heated discussions or shouting matches. So, it's totally, and then the other person's pain body awakens, and the two feed on each other, until feeding time is over. And the two pain bodies subside, go to sleep, digesting food, and then the relationship, for a while, is harmonious again.

And then the cycle starts again. So, pain body feeding on thinking, pain body feeding on other people's reactions. Now, I mentioned the unhappy me, a mind pattern that people are identified with, an unhappy sense of self.

This mind pattern, when the pain body is active, becomes amplified, its energy, the energy of the unhappy me, when the pain body moves into that mind pattern, that already has been telling you, your life isn't good enough, and so on, and you may not make it, and life has passed me by, and so on. Now, the pain body moves into that mind pattern, and its energy gets amplified 10 times, 20 times, 50 times, 100 times. In other words, the unhappy me, when the pain body arises and flows into that mind structure, the emotion flows into the mind structure, the unhappy sense of me becomes dreadfully unhappy, and loves its unhappiness, because that's what it consists of.

Now, all that it is, it is not a foreign body that lives in you, it is, there's nothing that is not life energy, even the pain body is life energy, except that it isn't flowing freely, it's got stuck somewhere. And when energy gets stuck and cannot flow freely, pain arises, like a river, if a river cannot flow, the water accumulates, and pressure accumulates. But it's really, it's beautiful life energy, the water is still beautiful, but there's pressure accumulating inside, that's what the pain body is.

Now, as we bring presence, this consciousness, into the pain body, it no longer, can no longer fool you into completely identifying with it. The presence, as the pain arises, from now on, and many of you are already practicing that, pain arises, the pain body comes up, and at that moment you will recognize it as the pain body. That's the beginning of freedom from it.

The recognition, when it comes, slight trigger, provocation, even a thought, deep pain arises in whatever form, in some people it's a very active pain, active aggressive pain, in other persons it's a passive form of pain, poor little me, victim pain, doesn't matter which pain bodies have different qualities in different people, it may be turbulence or heaviness or tightness or constriction, it doesn't matter what it is, as it arises, you will know there is a witnessing presence, and you watch, oops, there's the pain body, and you feel the energy field of it in your body, often you can feel it in the solar plexus or stomach area, sometimes in the belly, as a dreadful sense of heaviness, or some people perceive it as a big hole, some gaping hole inside, or it may be intense anger. But whatever it is, you watch it, this is why sitting here is so helpful, because the witnessing presence, which is part of this new state of consciousness, gets so much strength simply by sitting in this energy field. So the watcher will be there, watching the pain, so the pain cannot use your mind anymore, it cannot feed on your thinking, because you're watching it directly, it cannot creep into your mind, and then become an unhappy me.

So all that's left of the pain is an energy field of turbulence or heaviness, but the pain has not become an unhappy me, an unhappy sense of self, of who you are. That's the beginning of the end of the pain. But our practice is allowing what is to be, and that also applies, as long as the pain body is there in you, allowing the pain that is there in you also to be.

That is a very powerful practice. So I'm not saying we are not fighting the pain, we are not even trying to get rid of it. But you bring the consciousness, which is a very compassionate state of allowing what is its very powerful state, it implies you are present as the one who is able to allow.

You are the one who is able to allow the pain to be. You know you're not creating this pain at this moment, because you practice accepting what is. So it's not pain that you are creating, it's old pain.

You bring the acceptance to the old pain. This wonderful state, this powerful practice, it does not just concern what happens to you externally, allowing this moment to be as it is. It includes the arising of pain in the pain body.

You watch it, feel it, allow it. So you bring presence into it. You meet, the presence meets the pain body.

Here's the pain body, and there comes the silent space of presence. Okay. And you hold the state of presence as the turbulence happens.

Then the pain body is not replenishing itself. You've cut the link between the pain body and your thought processes. It's not feeding on your thinking anymore.

You're watching it. Now, the best time to catch it and watch it is as it first arises in you, when you first notice it arising, to immediately become very alert with every cell of your body and feel it. There it is.

And stay alert, stay present, continue to watch. This is the beginning of the transmutation of pain. The more you watch, the less it can feed.

It loses its energy charge every time you stay present as the watcher of it. It's not gaining new energy. In fact, it's losing energy as the pain body, but the very energy that was trapped in there as the pain body becomes part of the aliveness of who you are.

Many people's life energy is, to a large extent, trapped in their pain body. They have little access to their aliveness because the pain absorbs so much of their aliveness, and it's all trapped in there, in a big, unhappy me. And nothing is flowing.

There's no flow whatsoever. There's only a big, huge contraction. Many human beings are one big contraction.

It's amazing, the egoic state. It's one big contracted, nothing flows. And as the energy becomes freed that's in the pain body, there's an incredible increase in aliveness and vitality.

And of course, pain goes. It won't, it will not go the very first time you do it. You will have to do it many times.

It will, many times it will try to arise again, and it will arise. Many times you will lose it. You will lose yourself in it again.

That's right. It's all part of this. There will be times when it will take you over again.

And afterwards, you remember, oh, there it was, and I missed it completely. You might have gone through three hours of drama with your partner, and afterwards you say, oh, that was the pain body. I missed it completely.

That's all right. Next time, maybe you'll catch it and know that it's there. The good thing is that the pain body becomes actually your ally in your presence practice.

Because without it, very few people would have enough motivation to enter the new state of consciousness. Every time the pain body comes, until you know this fact, the pain body will trick you every time, and you will lose consciousness every time. But now that you know this, whenever it comes, it becomes incorporated into your practice of presence.

So the more often it comes, the better it is. You're lucky. If you have a strong pain body, you're lucky.

It's good for your practice. It can become a great teacher. That is the most, actually, the most powerful part of your practice, is to work with the pain body and see how quickly the transmutation happens when it no longer is an unhappy me.

It's simply pain. Not pleasant, but you can allow it. And there's an incredible intensification of presence every time you bring it to the pain body.

Now those of you who have very dense or heavy pain bodies will need more intense presence. Most people who are that I know who have gone to become almost free of pain, they're not yet many who are completely free, but they will be, are people who've had very dense pain bodies, because their motivation is stronger to be free.

Session three with Eckhart Tolle.

In Eastern terms, we are talking about karma. Karma really, ultimately, is all the conditioning from the past, including the past pain that you mistakenly believe is who you are. Karma is to be identified with all past conditioning and to be condemned to relive and act out continuously your past conditioning.

So pain body is an important aspect of karma. So what we are addressing here is going beyond the unconsciousness that is karma. What we are talking about here is actually the dissolving of karma.

There would be no end to karma otherwise, because it renews itself. That's why it's often likened to a wheel. It renews itself continuously.

This is an end to pain, an end to suffering. Use your relationships in your practice and realize that no matter who you choose as your partner, they will have a pain body. Don't look for the ideal partner without a pain body.

And that's good. And use the relationship because it's so much easier to become aware of your own pain body in a relationship than if you live alone. Great opportunity for practice.

Both of you, if both of you understand how it works, you could have an agreement that you will help each other when the pain body arises in the other person, so that the other can stay very, very present. Instead of going into reactivity, stay very, very present. And if the partner gets taken over by the pain body, stay so present that you allow it without reacting and thinking that that's who that person is.

Allowing it. If your partner doesn't want to cooperate, you just do it for yourself. It only takes one person ultimately to be free.

It's great if he or she does. For many women, pain body arises as the approaching menstrual cycle comes. I mentioned it briefly in the book, because there's so much collective female pain.

One aspect of pain body is collective human pain. Now collective may be the pain of a nation that you belong to. Certain nations have more of a heaviness to them than other nations.

The new world has relatively less heaviness to it than the old world, because the old world, Europe, Asia to some extent, there's so much past there, there's so much the heaviness of past, and the heaviness of past pain is very much apparent. Certain countries, you just get off the plane, and if you're sensitive, you feel the energy field of the collective pain body. Eastern Europe, in many countries, you can feel it the moment you step.

Germany, I feel it the moment I step off the plane. Russia. And every individual who lives, part of their pain body is the collective pain body.

So it's not just a past. Pain body is never a personal problem of yours. It's a human condition.

It's your share in the human condition, not a personal problem. There are no personal problem. Every pain that you have in your life is your share of the human condition manifesting in a particular form.

So there's one aspect of the collective pain body is the nation, the national. The United States has some pain body, but less karma. There's less karma here than European states, and certainly some European states.

And even such a thing as a relatively short-lived, like Vietnam War or something, adds a bit to the collective pain body, the experience. 50,000 men killed in some distant country, and Secretary of State at that time in his autobiography now says, well, in retrospect, it was probably a mistake. Human madness, just one more manifestation of human madness.

But if you, and some of you were actually, I know, had to go there and suffer pain there, and that's fine. You work with that now. Now there's also female pain, collective pain body, just as there's a male collective pain body.

The female collective pain body that every woman partakes in has to do with dreadful pain suffered particularly through women being treated as slaves and as worthless property for thousands of years. Not always. There was a time before that when women had their rightful place.

But for thousands of years in most countries, women became victim of the patriarchal, mind-dominated state of consciousness. So that becomes particularly pronounced when the menstrual cycle starts, the very thing that is the femininity in you on the biological level is very painful. It awakens the female pain body just as it happens.

And this is in the old traditional teachings in Buddhism, they say, no, women can never make it. They can't become enlightened because every time they go through their cycle, they lose consciousness. So they say, okay, we'll have to exclude women.

And they did. And so it's become more and more lifeless by doing that. And it's become more and more mind-dominated.

The very fact is that the opposite is true. If women can use that, knowing that that is the time, particularly when the pain body arises, and become present at that time, it will be through that, that women become very quickly now free of their pain body by bringing presence into, especially when the pain body arises at the approaching menstrual cycle, bring presence into that and become very alert, watch the pain arising, watch it, allow it to be, be compassionate towards it, which is what the allowing is, be compassionate, the compassionate one who allows the pain to be and who is able to hold it, to hold the turbulence.

And it's the state of presence is always a gentle embracing of what is. It's bringing a gentleness to it, which is a very powerful gentleness, bringing the gentleness to it and embracing what is and holding it in that embrace. And you stay present as you hold your pain, the pain, and watch the turbulence of it.

Hold it. The more you hold it, the stronger, very, very quickly your sense of presence grows much, much stronger as you hold the pain, and the pain will slowly lessen. But it no longer matters because your acceptance of the pain is so total, you're not making that moment into a means to an end because I want to get to the end of my pain.

Your acceptance of pain is complete and that's where your spiritual power lies, in fully accepting it. But of course now it hasn't become you. It hasn't become an unhappy me.

You are fully there. You're fully present with it. You fully accept that there is the pain body vibrating in you.

And you may have to hold that pain for quite a while when the cycle comes. It can go on for a while, and then you may lose it, and then remember again and be present with it again. By losing it, I mean it may succeed in moving into your mind and control your thinking again.

And then suddenly you'll remember and you hold it, holding it. So that pain becomes incredible teacher, and every time it happens you bring the presence to it. That's why women are going, it's already, there's always more women coming to consciousness groups than men.

Women will move forward more quickly now than men. I've seen that. I'm seeing it all the time.

And part of the reason is that they'll be able to work with their pain bodies, which up to now has looked, has been a great obstacle, now becomes a great help as you bring the presence to it. Men still have, are less in touch with their bodies, more, women of course are also in the mind, but men even more deeply entrenched in their mind structures. So there's a different, they of course also have pain bodies, but the predominant thing for men is identification with their head.

The predominant thing for women is identification with pain body. So that's, these are just the focal points. Wonderful practice, and I'd love to know, those of you who have already been practicing after reading the book, how you're doing and how it's, what obstacles there are, how, where it is becoming difficult or any questions that arise out of that.

But it is, it is so, this practice is so easy and so wonderful and so powerful that it's amazing that it's taken humans so long to get to this point. But transformation can be very quick now, very quick. So make your pain body into your ally, your pain body is not your enemy.

When you make it into an enemy, that's the old mind's thing starting over and making even the pain body into a problem. How can I get rid of it? Forget about getting rid of it, just watch it.

That does it. Just watch, hold. And then at first the pain seems overwhelming, and the more you bring the, your presence to it, you realize how powerful your presence actually is.

And that the pain ultimately is a, just ripples on the surface of the vastness of who you are. All human pain ultimately is surface ripples or little waves pretending to be very big waves. And when you realize the vastness of your being, then very quickly you realize it's only ultimately, it's just a little bit of pain, but it blew itself up to gigantic proportions.

That's the practice of liberation. And it doesn't take long. People ask me sometimes, well, how long do we have to do that for?

That can vary from person to person depending on the density of the pain body and other factors. It doesn't really matter. The practice itself is beautiful, but I have seen people with extremely heavy pain bodies going, reducing the energy charge of their pain body by about 80 to 90 percent in two years of practicing this.

Now that's people with incredibly dense pain bodies. So that is possible. It is not that you need a lifetime of practice to become, or even as some traditional, you will make it, you will need, some teachers may tell you, okay, you need five more lifetimes.

Or this is, you will make it in your next lifetime. Or in 20 years time, I will give you liberation if you, after you've given me all your money. And let's ask a question if one arises.

Would you want to ask a question? Is the microphone going there? While the microphone travels there, we are present, not waiting for anything to happen.

[Speaker 2] (2:09:27 - 2:09:52)

I'm wondering how you handle when two people's pain bodies collide. For example, there's, well, my wife, who I love very deeply, there's my raging pain body, and then there's my pain in the ass body, which sometimes rages back. And I'm wondering how one handles that.

[Speaker 1] (2:09:52 - 2:21:32)

Yes. Now use the relationship as an essential part of your practice. The pain body is not there continuously.

As you know, it arises at times. And it will start arising in one person, either you or your partner. Be there as it arises in yourself.

Watch the beginning of it, the beginning of pain. That implies, I wouldn't be telling this if you did not have the necessary degree of presence to be there as the witness. But you have now, if only after sitting here for three hours, there is enough presence for you to be there as the witness of the pain as it arises.

If you catch it at an early stage, it's easier to stay present and it won't take you over. If it arises so quickly, and that happens in certain pain bodies whose energy field predominantly is anger, anger has a fiery quality to it. And an angry pain body, as opposed to a heavy depressed pain body, an angry pain body, you have virtually no time to watch it arising, because it arises like an explosion, and is there fully fledged in one second.

So if it's an angry pain body, it's very hard to watch it arising because it arises explosively. If it's a different pain body, a heavy one, fearful one, it's easier to watch it arising and trying to get into your mind. So being there as it starts, the partner can be very helpful because you may already at an early stage become identified with it and start to argue, and of course the arguing will already be energized by the pain that lies behind the mental rationalizations and arguments.

And your partner may still be present and become intensely present and watch as your pain body arises, your partner watches the arising. If you can't watch the arising of your own pain body, which sometimes you may not be able to yet, your partner can do it for you almost. That's wonderful how the relationship can work.

Your partner becomes the witness. If you lose the witness, your partner becomes the witness. That can be a very powerful practice.

So what then happens if I'm with a partner, I can see the pain body arising and already creeping into her mind, wanting me to react, enter the state of intense presence, which is also a state of great openness. And you feel immediately every cell of your body vibrates with life. And you hold that state of complete openness and presence and you watch the arising of the partner's pain body going through the mind.

Now it will try every trick to pull you into unconscious reaction to the pain body. Pain bodies have extreme cleverness. Your partner will try every trick, it will try, it will push buttons that have worked in the past every time in making you unconscious, say just the right thing that he or she knows is going to make you unconscious and give an emotional reaction.

And you stay present. Do it for them. If they lose themselves in the pain body, you hold the presence and watch how the pain body tries every trick to get you, to pull you into unconsciousness.

And that presence is always, it emanates as an energy field around you. So if you're with someone, if you stay intensely present, there's an emanation of presence around you. It's very hard for a pain body to remain active for long in the energy field of presence, even if it comes from another person.

Now it may be that the pain body will remove itself, the person will run out of the room, or jump in the car and drive off, or there will be a sudden, and this can happen and it's miraculous, in the middle of being taken over by the pain body, there's an awakening and there's a sudden aware presence that suddenly is able to watch the intense pain taking place. It could even happen in the middle of a shouting. You're shouting at your partner and at that moment the presence arises.

And what that feels like is like you're waking, you're an actor on stage acting out a script, a very powerful script, forgotten that you're acting out a script and suddenly there's a remembering that this is just acting out, an acting out of a conditioned pattern. And there's suddenly a watching presence there. That's amazing.

So you help each other. If the other person loses him or herself, you stay present. Presence never means that you withdraw or protect yourself.

And you need to be, this is why being here is helpful, to become familiar with the state of presence. Some people mistake it for a state of aloofness, when let's say you're being attacked by your partner's pain body and then you go into withdrawal. It looks like this.

That's not presence. And then even the little me can say, okay, I'm beyond that. I'm not touched by the pain body.

I'm beyond such unconsciousness. So presence is open, complete. It's the allowing.

You allow your partner to be where he or she is. It's a deep allowing. That's a vast power comes with that.

And again, you're embracing, whether you embrace your own pain or you embrace your partner's pain, and you can remain in a state of love and you realize there's the movement of pain. And you don't need to point it out through words. That probably wouldn't work anyway at that point.

But also be careful that the pain bodies are very cunning. It is possible that your pain body may be arising and projecting something at that moment and saying to your partner, there's your pain body. All kinds of things can happen, but if you're present, that'll be fine.

I know of some couples who give themselves a secret signal when the other notices the pain body arising in the partner. And for some that works, a little hand signal or the just, but it can be, sometimes it doesn't work at all when the pain body has a, it can, the pain body is already there and is being told something. And of course, the reactive force can be very strong then.

One signal that definitely doesn't work that somebody suggested to me is this. So it is, it's helpful sometimes after you've had an interaction governed by the pain body to talk about it and see where it started, where it came in first, how it used the mind, how it used arguments and mental positions of me being right and you being wrong, how it moved into those mind structures, and talk about it afterwards. So it's a good practice occasionally to retrospectively bring presence into an event when you got completely taken over by it.

So after consciousness has returned, you kissed and made up and had a nice meal, or whatever else you have afterwards, and then talk about it. And isn't that, that was the pain body, did it start in you and me? Let's see, let's trace it back to the beginning.

There it was, the beginning movement when you didn't phone me to let me know you were going to be late, or you didn't put the garbage out. It can start with very insignificant things. So retrospectively to bring presence into the whole growth of it, and then next time see if you can be present as it happens.

Wonderful practice. And whenever you lose it, afterwards see where you lost it. Not in some kind of, oh I have failed to strengthen the little me that isn't good enough.

No, just looking at it objectively, see that's where it started. That's where the whole pain movement started. That's good practice too.

So see, talk to your partner and see, so you can help each other in it. It makes it easier if you help each other. Because it's always one partner when it comes into one person, the other will still be for a little while conscious.

So that can, that's a great advantage. The next time I come, let me know how it's going. The mic is coming.

[Speaker 2] (2:21:37 - 2:21:48)

I wanted to ask you about consciousness in children and if we can prevent them from having the pain.

[Speaker 1] (2:21:48 - 2:39:46)

Oh that's a good question, yes. Asking about consciousness in children and if we can prevent children from having or developing a pain body. Now many children absorb pain body at an early age from their parents' pain body.

That adds greatly to, some pain is already present in every human being, even as they come into this world, but that adds greatly to the personal pain body. You absorb the pain. It happened, my pain body grew very quickly in the first six, seven years of my life because my parents' pain bodies were both there with great intensity.

Many homes are like that, so children absorb their parents' pain body. Now of course this, you're asking the question for the people in this room and they're all, there's consciousness moving in. The most helpful thing you can do with children is to bring consciousness into your own pain body or if you live with a partner, you do it, both of you do it, so that you don't emanate and act out continuously pain body and then they absorb it.

Now, but even those, even children where parents are not getting lost in their pain body, they will still have a certain amount of pain and many children, even four, three or four year olds, you can often observe how an angel within a few seconds can be transformed into a screaming monster. It's, the transformation is so amazing, we take it for granted that that's normal. This beautiful being, light shining out of his or her eyes, not much mind started yet, the egoic me is not very strong yet, so there's still a lot of being flowing through their eyes and suddenly they go into dreadful contraction and throw themselves on the floor and start screaming.

That's the pain body. And it's relatively short-lived with children because it doesn't, their mind isn't developed enough for the pain body to hang on in their mind for a long period of time, so it goes through quickly and leaves them, it subsides again quickly. Now, the greatest thing you can do for children is to point out to them that there's something happening after an event like that, a screaming fate, or what other children may do other things, extreme withdrawal or something, to say what happened when this energy, when, do you remember yesterday when you had the screaming fate?

What happened there? Who was that? I see by talking, by pointing out that there was an energy movement in the child and perhaps giving it a name, you can help the child to stay present and watch it as it arises.

You can't do it in the middle of it, you'll have to do it afterwards. You can't talk to a screaming monster, but when the angel is back, you talk to the angel and say, who was that monster? Not to induce any guilt or anything like that, in an interested way, isn't that funny, where does that come from?

Has he got a name? And then next time it happens, just as it arises, oh, there, so-and-so is back. You can say it even while it's happening, although of course that won't wake them up at that point, but a little bit of awareness will be there at that point.

And after it has subsided, you say again, oh, there it was again, wasn't that funny? And if you can catch the arising of the pain body in the child just as it first starts, you can say, oh, it's coming on, can you feel it? That means very quickly the witnessing presence in the child will grow, and they can actually watch the movement of the pain body in themselves.

And that is wonderful, that's something that every parent, everybody who sits here can do easily. So you're not trying to get rid of it, it's almost like it's a phenomenon that you and the child together contemplate, say, wow. And you have to admit openly, if your own pain body has taken you over, you can say, you know what, that was the same thing happened in me, what happened this morning.

You talk to the child, that was mine. And a point may come when the child may tell you, oh, there's your pain body. That is a truly functional home when that happens.

And children can do that. And they would love to be there as the watcher. It's like a game, it's fun.

Here's something to surrender to. Now, even with something, before we ask the next question, even with something like that, this is a minor irritation, unless your pain body is ready to awaken, in which fact it could be a big irritation. Oh, unfortunately it stopped now.

Anything like that, you can practice even with little irritations, practice, see if you can be in complete acceptance of that, what was up to this point, irritating, just completely allowing it, allowing it totally. So you work with it, whatever it is, you work with it, allowing it totally, and see what happens. Anything that you allow totally takes you into peace, into the state of great peace.

It's amazing. Anything that you allow completely. So that's the work with children, it's wonderful.

All of us have pain bodies, as you point out, and most of us go to a job. And I'm wondering, if you can recommend ways in which we can use what we do at work to become free. Thank you.

Now at work, usually you go into an environment that is dominated by little me's and egos, and big ego structures, unconsciousness at work. Many big organizations are still run, there are maybe a few exceptions, but many organizations are still run by that consciousness, that state of consciousness. So, a great help is not to expect others to be conscious.

Not to expect consciousness where there isn't consciousness. You will be very often, as you do this practice for yourself, you will very easily observe unconsciousness and pain bodies arising in other people at work, being acted out through their mind. And it'll happen continuously, in some companies more than in others.

And it's the same practice because it's basically a relationship. It's bringing presence into relationships. When pain body arises in somebody else, don't go into the reactivity that would be the little me fighting somebody's pain body, which can easily trigger your own pain body, and you get a big argument.

It's, the practice is relinquishing the reactivity of the little me, so you allow unconsciousness in the other person. Doesn't mean you give in every time. There's a great, it's getting hold of the state of presence and bringing presence into your work, to the conference table, to the committee meeting, and as you sit there, little egos having their battles all around the table, you watch and perhaps for a moment you remember this moment, and that brings back the state of presence.

And then you sit there in the state of, you feel intensely connected with the body, and you watch everybody's contribution without mental judgment. You bring presence to the conference table, to the committee meeting, not the reactivity of the me, where you watch. And then you may find yourself making a contribution and saying something out of the state of presence.

And it will bring a different quality to the whole interaction. There's one person there who brings in a different consciousness, and then see what happens. So instead of, there's nothing you can do to change others as such.

And most of the world still lives in unconsciousness. That's how it is. Don't expect it to be otherwise.

So it's allowing, it's in the allowing people their unconsciousness. This, by the way, also implies to your relationships with other people, like long-standing relationships with parents, which to many people, or children, grown-up children and parents, for many people that's very problematic area, because there's so much past in there. There's often so much unconsciousness and dysfunction in families.

So the most beautiful thing happens when you can, let's say it's your parents, when you can allow your parents completely to be who they are. You give up, which is really the little me, you give up the desire to be understood by them. The little me says, you need to understand me.

They won't. But you will feel a weight being taken off your shoulders when there's a relinquishing of the need to be understood by your parents. Oh, that's a relief.

They don't need to understand me. And then there's a letting go, as this all comes with presence, there's a letting go of wanting them to be different, wanting them to behave differently, accusing them of having done this or that, or having failed to do this or that. There was nobody there to have failed.

There was just unconsciousness in motion, nothing personal in it. They did what they could do according to their level of consciousness. Really, there was nobody there to ever have done anything or not done anything.

It was unconsciousness playing itself out. That's why Jesus said, forgive them, for they know not what they do. When you realize they didn't know any better, there wasn't enough consciousness.

If Jesus had lived now, he would have said, forgive them, for they are completely unconscious. That's what it means. It's just unconsciousness playing itself out.

And then even that drops away, the feeling that they should have done something differently. And the more presence arises in you, the more you realize nobody ever did anything to you. The presence, it's only the little, the identity of the little me feels hurt or injured.

When the dimension of presence arises, presence always remained totally pristine, totally pure, totally fresh, and knew nothing ever happened to it. The reality of who you are, nothing ever happened to that, no matter what pain was inflicted on you in your childhood. As presence emerges, you realize there's a dimension in you that was never touched.

And then forgiveness happens automatically. You don't have to try to forgive. As long as you try to forgive, it's not really working.

Oh, I should be forgiving because I'm spiritual. You cannot really make yourself. Forgiveness happens naturally as presence arises and you feel the vastness of who you truly are beyond the little me.

Forgiveness is just there. You don't even have a word for it anymore. So it's really towards all relationships, whether at work or with parents, between parents and children, the most powerful tool is to allow everyone to be who they are, which is an aspect of allowing this moment to be as it is.

On the canvas of this moment, very often people will appear in it. Very often this moment will come to you as a person. It may come to you as a person's pain body coming out of this at you.

Okay. The practice is allow it to be. That's where power flows through.

The mind says, no, you can't allow it to be. You should be doing something about it. The most powerful transformation happens through allowing to be.

So when I say allow the present moment to be, very often that means allow this person to be. Allow the unconsciousness to be there. It's fine.

And then you will notice relationships with your parents improves dramatically when you give up the desire to be understood. You don't need that anymore. You realize there was nobody there who ever did anything to you or failed to do anything.

So you can see miraculous transformations in situations through allowing. That's where the vast power comes through. Whether it's at work or with, you can try it out.

What's coming up soon? Thanksgiving? Wonderful place to practice when all the family gets together.

For some people it's agony having to go through that. Now this time, see if you can bring in complete acceptance of what is. Everybody around the table happens to be part of this moment then.

Allow this moment, including the turkey dinner and whatever it is. People acting out their conditioned behavior. You can predict what they're going to say next because they said the same thing 10 years ago.

[Speaker 3] (2:39:46 - 2:39:52)

Allow it to be.

[Speaker 1] (2:39:52 - 2:40:15)

And then your next practice will be Christmas. They get together again. That's always a good and the ultimate test is parents.

Ram Dass said his famous statement, if you think you're so enlightened, go and spend a week with your parents.

[Speaker 2] (2:40:16 - 2:40:34)

Can you say a little bit about the intense pain of losing somebody through death, somebody who you're really close to, or the pain of a marriage dissolution?

[Speaker 1] (2:40:35 - 2:48:03)

Yes, thank you. Now the pain of great loss, either loss of a loved one through death or loss of a relationship, which is also a close relationship, is also a kind of death. There may be some situations where surrendering to what is seems impossible.

Some situations are intrinsically so painful that you just, no matter, you may have been successfully practicing surrendering to what is, but suddenly something happens and you just can't and intense pain arises. And this is the second level of surrender. The first level of surrender is surrendering to what is.

That's the most perfect surrender. But this may not always be possible yet. The second level of surrender is to surrender to what you feel.

So if pain arises because you couldn't surrender on level one to what is, it just wasn't possible, if pain arises, you surrender to the pain. You accept the pain. And that is a strange thing at first.

Everything inside you says, no, this is dreadful. I don't want the pain. The pain may flow into your mind, but if you surrender to the pain, that can be a wonderful opening, the pain of loss, deep loss.

Feel it and accept the pain that you feel so completely that almost as if there's not a person there anymore who is suffering the pain, there's only the pain. And there's complete acceptance of that. At first it seems unnatural to do that.

But as you continue to accept it and be with the pain instead of running away from it, after a while something happens and the pain turns around and there's suddenly a vast peace underneath the pain, which is not a denial of the pain, it's only by going into the pain and allowing it, you touch it suddenly. Whenever there's loss, whether a big loss or a little loss, it's an opportunity. You're the fabric of your existence, but suddenly a hole appears in it, something vital is gone.

That is an emptiness. The great loss leaves a feeling of great emptiness. And that great emptiness at first is deep pain because there's a reaction.

The emptiness is painful. The reactive me reacts, oh. Now if you allow the emptiness to be, that is there where there was that being is gone, there's a hole.

The winds of grace blow through that hole that is left when there's great loss. There's an incredible opportunity there if you only allow it. In the absence, whenever there's an absence of something that had been greatly valued, it leaves a nothingness.

The nothingness is at first very painful. As you surrender into the nothingness, there's a fullness that is hiding underneath, behind there. And some people have done that.

They have had, they lost everything all at once. There have been reports of people losing their position, their family, and their homes all at once. It's almost as if the fabric of your existence only holds in it now.

And at first there was an influx of incredible, unbearable pain, and then there was complete surrender, and suddenly there was what Jesus calls the peace that passes all understanding, coming out of what was intense pain through surrender. And so that, when somebody dies close to you, surrender to the pain, surrender to the feeling of the pain, and see how it becomes transformed. And what happens after that, it is, there's such an intense depth of peace and aliveness, if it could speak, of course it doesn't speak, if it could speak, it would say, all is well, there is no death, if it could speak.

That's what it feels like. But you don't even need the words. And it will happen to everybody.

Some loss, some great loss will come into everybody's life. Somebody close to you will die. Another great loss will come, your own death at some point will come approaching, and you can see, oh, and by, perhaps everybody in this room by then will have already gone beyond identification with the little person and the little me, and already has access to a dimension that is beyond death, the reality of who you are that is beyond death.

I don't want to give you any belief. That's why I don't want to talk about it too much. We are here to experience, to be the timeless consciousness, the timeless state of consciousness that is beyond birth and death, that is your reality and everybody else's reality.

It is often through pain that you have access to it, and here it's an easier way. But if pain is happening in your life at this time and coinciding with being here, that is wonderful. Life has given you this at this time.

The two come together, and that's beautiful. So anything you cannot accept externally, and pain arises, or something, whatever arises as a feeling, accept. Surrender to what you feel.

Surrender to what is. If you can't, surrender to what you feel about that.

2019 Eckhart Tolle Retreat For Those Who Serve Hoopla 8h27m

[Speaker 7] (0:28 - 0:45)

Sounds True presents, for those who serve, practical guidance for being of benefit to others by spiritual teacher and author Eckhart Tolle. And now session one, how to be here.

[Speaker 1] (1:02 - 2:32:06)

Welcome to our retreat. This evening, probably I'm mainly going to talk about how to be here, about your state of consciousness here. In other words, about the retreat itself.

I'm saying probably because you never know what comes out of the present moment. The most important thing here, which, by the way, is also the most important thing in your entire life. But it's easy to lose sight of that, because you get distracted by so many things.

But here in this protected setting, you can really practice remembering that the most important thing is your state of consciousness, no matter what's going on in your life, where you are, who you are with, or what you're doing. The primary factor in whatever you're experiencing is your state of consciousness, because it is through your particular state of consciousness that you experience things. So if you are heavily identified with the conditioned thinking mind, and all its preconditioned beliefs, opinions, judgments, then that's the way you perceive the world through the veil of that.

If there are turbulent or heavy emotions running through you that you identified with, then you will experience the world around you, other people, situations, through the veil of those emotions. And you think that's how the world is. That's reality.

So you know all that. And if you are present, then you experience people, situations, and whatever is going on in your life, places very differently. This opportunity here is for you to practice being absolutely present and make that the main focus the next few days here, rather than anything else.

Leave your mind as much as possible behind. Easier said than done. Your state of consciousness not only determines your life, it even becomes two, three, four, five times more important when you, as most of you, or all of you work with people in one way or another.

And no matter in what capacity you work with people, whatever your state of consciousness is, it will transmit itself to the people that you work with. Even if you, that doesn't matter, let's say you're working with a certain part of the body, if you're a reflexologist, if you're not just treating the body through the medium of the feet, there's all your state of consciousness also is part of that. It transmits itself.

And if you're, let's talk about the bottom, and if you're the top, if you're a hairdresser, you might think, I don't know if there are any hairdressers. I don't know whether they count as helping professionals, but they could be because they help people to have better hair, but there could be an additional dimension because they give a lot of attention to a person. And so if you're a hairdresser, also your state of consciousness transmits itself because you focus on the person.

So it transmits itself even more than in ordinary encounters when you are focused on another person, whatever the modality is that you work with. So here, this is as ideal as you can get for the practice of presence, but it won't be a hundred percent ideal. If you had a place that is a hundred percent ideal, it would not be the most ideal place because practicing presence is working with all the things that the mind would judge as not being perfect.

So you might think, well, this is a nice place, but I don't like my room that much. They should have given me a better room. If I had a better room, then I could really practice.

Or you could say, what I really miss is the massage treatment sessions. And I really need a spa. I can really completely relax into them now.

And if I had that ideal environment and just give me a week in an ideal environment, I could probably achieve enlightenment. If people came and gave me the most exquisite food, most healthy food, pure food, and treated my body, and that would be everything is no nothing disturbing around me. I have my own space.

I need my own space. I have my own space. And you would find most likely at the end of the week, when you go back into the normal world, you wouldn't function that well.

And you might even have gone to sleep, so to speak, a little bit. And because it was so, you were not being challenged, if that were even possible. You were not being challenged by any situation.

It would be like going to a movie and seeing a movie, and the characters in the movie are not challenged by anything. Everything goes so beautifully. That would be the most boring movie.

You would fall asleep. Nothing happened. Nothing went wrong.

So the characters didn't develop. They were not challenged. It was completely uninteresting.

So things, there need to be little things to challenge you. And sometimes there are big things to challenge you. But little things are everywhere.

Little things to challenge you occur all the time. Even here. You can arrive here and say, I didn't realize it was so cold here.

California was supposed to be warm and hot, I thought. Don't they grow lemons and oranges and things like that? Where do they grow?

So you can have your mind starting to comment and complain. And then you have a gap between what is and what your mind expects. So be aware of those things here, so that you can make it your practice to surrender into what is, and don't resist the challenges that come.

If anything can be changed, if your room is not good for some reason, you can ask if you can have another room. And if you can't, then that is the perfect room for you. So make it your practice to say that whatever happens here is the perfect situation for you.

It doesn't mean you cannot walk away from if somebody's talking too much, and you say, okay, I'd rather sit somewhere else next time, or this time. But whatever is, is the perfect situation. So let go of the judgmental mind, the complaining, entity, and see what happens if you approach each moment in that state of surrender.

And then the depths will reveal itself to you that you hadn't noticed before, because you were trapped in the veil of the judgmental mind. The very wonderful thing is being here with many others from all over the world, who are also awakening, or many of you already awake most of the time. And I was asked not long ago, when you travel, somebody asked me, how is it that you go to different countries and you meet different people, different nationalities?

Do they, how are there big differences in how people receive these teachings? And I was surprised when I answered, because I hadn't known it before, because I hadn't thought about it. Actually, all those humans who are in the awakening process, begin to resonate at a certain frequency that is the same for all of them.

So you may find here, when you meet somebody from a very distant country, I will read to you in a minute, that's why I brought the folder, the different countries here that people have come from. You may find, there may be some exceptions, but you're more likely to find when, let's say an American, many of you are from this country, meeting a Russian person, for example, or whatever, Chinese, and both of you may find that you resonate more with each other than with those of your own country, who are completely conditioned still, collectively and personally. So that you will, you find something that unites you, that transcends cultural conditioning and social conditioning.

And that's a wonderful thing. So it's because, it's almost like a new species is coming out of the old. And you are part of that.

And no matter where you go in the world, you will very quickly recognize those who are also in the awakening process. So I will tell you from what countries you can meet people here, although some of them are only one or two people per country, but that's okay. United States.

That reminds me, I was going to put this on before coming on stage, but I forgot. I've had it for years, a badge somebody gave me. It says USA if you read it vertically, but if you read it horizontally, it says United States of Awareness.

Now that is a work in progress, of course. And I need to find out where you can get these. And one interesting thing that might be helpful is to send one of these to each member of Congress in Washington.

Of course, the United States of Awareness would be the entire country. It would be all the awakening humans. And as humans awaken all over the planet, that would eventually become the United States of Awareness.

So we have people from Australia, Canada. Those are the two largest contingents. And then we have participants from Argentina, Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Czech Republic, Denmark, Egypt, France, Germany, Hong Kong, Hungary, Iceland, India, Ireland, Israel, Italy, Japan, Malaysia, Mexico, Netherlands, New Zealand, Peru, Singapore, Slovenia, South Africa, Spain, Sweden, Switzerland, Turkey, and the United Kingdom.

I expect there to be a lot of interaction between us on this retreat. And I expect there will be many questions that people want to ask, whether there are any answers coming through this form here. We don't know.

We'll see. But there will be many questions. And now let's just focus, because it's the introduction to our retreat.

So let's focus on your state of consciousness right now. It's easy, relatively easy to be present as you sit here. The retreat, however, is not confined to our sessions, no matter where you are during the retreat, no matter what you're doing.

That is all part of the retreat. It's a totality of this experience. So use every moment here, whether you're walking, sitting, standing, eating, to practice presence.

First of all, nature. Nature that surrounds you here is remarkable. And there are not really any other parts of the world where you find this kind of vegetation.

There are trees here, and there's a magic to nature here. There's a magic to nature everywhere. There's a special kind of magic here, which part of that is the sky, the ocean, the fog that comes drifting in every hour, every couple of hours, you will notice.

And there's no fog. That kind of fog is unique to this area of Northern California. So there's a magic to just watching nature as you walk or sit or go to the beach.

And as you watch nature, be there as, not as a person, but as a conscious presence that is perceiving all that amazing magic. You listen, you might, all your senses are alert because that is part of presence. And you not only look, you listen, the sounds, the wind, birds, or the ocean.

You can feel the breeze on your skin. You smell the air. And this practice is, you're practicing being in this world as a walking presence rather than as a person with a history that's still going to be there.

Don't worry. You still have your history. Remember who you are or your past.

But that is, the shift is that the formless you, the timeless you, which is consciousness itself, emerges more and more fully through the gaps in the temporal you, through the gaps between two thoughts. It emerges even through the cells of your body so that there's a likeness to who you are. This has nothing to do with your physical weight.

There's a likeness to who you are as presence emerges and you as the personality loses, the personality loses its opaqueness, its density. If you look at any human who has not, has no access to the spirit dimension, has had no separation yet between who they are as consciousness and their thought processes and emotional processes, there is a density to those humans. And it doesn't mean that the spirit dimension is not present in them.

It is, but it's being obscured by the density of mental, emotional conditioning. And this density of mental, emotional conditioning is called a person. And it has a name tag attached to it.

And that's me. And all the things that make up the identity of the person consists of accumulations of certain predominant emotions and certain predominant thought patterns that go through their minds. So the combination of those predominant emotions and thought patterns make up the personality.

Whatever might be happy looking or predominantly looking out for the next thing that's going wrong, it might be a fearful conditioning, emotional, mental, where's the next blow that the universe is going to give me, going to come from, or predominantly angry, looking for another excuse to be angry again. Please make me angry. I'm waiting for something.

I'm waiting for something to react to. So you have the person, some persons are relatively well adjusted, but no person is really happy for long. No person has really any depth to him or herself.

Well, they do, but they don't know it. So if you have a depth, but you don't sense your own depth, you just live on the, yours is a surface reality, then it's as if you didn't have it. As I've said, you could be a beggar sitting by the side of the road, because you've forgotten that you have $10 million in your Swiss bank account, and you can't remember the number.

But this is nothing because $10 million wouldn't make man happy either. So it's not a good analogy, but it's the best I can find. But this is an experiential thing.

And I believe that almost everyone here can verify in their own experience, what it is that I'm talking about, because many of you will experience yourself, sometimes what the personality predominates again, sometimes in certain situations in your life, the heaviness, the opaqueness, the density of the personality returns when you become very reactive. It happens easily in family situations, which are always the most difficult training ground, but the best for staying conscious, usually relationships, close relationships, and then come work situations, and so on. You get challenged, and the personality reasserts itself completely, and you become just as unconscious as all the others who've never gone through any awakening process, and then you wake up suddenly after a few hours, or a day, or a few minutes, if you're lucky, and say, oh, what was that?

And then whatever words you used to describe that, you said, I lost it completely. What did you lose? I lost it.

What? I lost, well, of course, you lost consciousness, awareness. You didn't know who you were anymore.

You thought you were the little person again. So a retreat situation is ideal for practicing being the presence rather than being the person, because you don't need the person that much here. The one, the most challenging thing in the retreat situation is interacting with others.

Although everybody here is awakening, it does not mean when you start talking to somebody that their personality will not, especially as you start discussing something, their personality will not very quickly come up and predominate so that the presence is lost and recedes. It's covered up. It's not lost.

It suddenly gets covered up again. That may happen to you too, because the awakening humans are like transitional entities. They are hybrids.

The awakening humans are hybrids. I can compare them to, we all know the caterpillar and the butterfly, the most incredible metamorphosis when the caterpillar dies and the butterfly becomes transformed into the butterfly. The awakening humans, many of them are like a butterfly that's emerging from the caterpillar.

And then as it emerges from the caterpillar, it still experiences him or herself as a caterpillar. Although he or she is already emerging as a butterfly, then he still falls back into thinking he's a caterpillar and behaves like one. Although he's already become a butterfly.

So then the butterfly starts behaving like a caterpillar again. Can't fly anymore. And then you need something to remind you that you're not the caterpillar anymore.

So the caterpillar in this analogy is the person without any awareness. Now, as presence arises in you, it does not mean that certain aspects of your personality will not remain. Certain aspects of your personality will remain because you have a form identity.

Everybody has a form identity. There are certain things, certain ways in which you do things. There may be ways in which you speak.

And if they are not dysfunctional, but just certain characteristics, they may remain. So if they are dysfunctional, that means there's an unconsciousness and those will dissolve as awareness shines through the person. So then what happens to us is, yes, you are still a person, but a different dimension of consciousness that is not conditioned shines through the personality.

And as that grows, the personality of the person recedes more and more and just enough remains so that you can function as a form in this world. All that remains. You can function well.

You may find in your daily life fluctuations in the intensity of to what extent you are a person and to what extent you are the presence. And in your work situation, and we will go into that in greater depth in the next few days, in your work situation, you will be of the greatest benefit if the personality can operate as little as possible. If the personality is in the background so that when you work with people, you are predominantly presence.

And that is a wonderful shift. I noticed that there was many years ago when I went through my shift in consciousness, people started coming to me to ask questions initially. Later I said, okay, I'm doing counseling sessions, but at first it was just people asking questions and then I would give answers.

And one of the first people who came to me was this lady who was a former Catholic nun. She had spent, I think, 20 years in a monastery, nunnery, whatever it's called. And she couldn't find God there, so she left.

And then she came to me, not because I'm God, well, I am God too, but so is she. She came to me to find herself. She realized it wasn't a question of finding God, it was finding the depths of who she is, and then she would find her connectedness with source, and that's God.

So, and as I listened to her talking about her difficulties and so on, and this was not the first time, but I was beginning to realize when I listened to people and when I spoke to them, there was this intense, peaceful, but a very intense presence arising, whether it was arising within or in the room or both, I didn't know, but it was there. It seemed to be within and without. And then she said, in one session, she stopped speaking suddenly and she said, oh, I can feel it, you are doing healing on me.

And I said, am I? Because I wasn't doing anything. But there was definitely what she could sense was the energy.

There was this intense energy field of presence filling the room. And so it wasn't just within, it was there. And I believed her when she said, you are a healer.

And then she talked to other people about it, and then people started coming to me who wanted physical healing. And that was fine for a while. Some got healed, some didn't.

And then I realized the people who wanted just the physical healing were not interested in anything else. So that's not right. I'm not really a healer.

So I stopped doing that kind of healing. But the important thing here is when you work with somebody, there is you, there is the other person, there is whatever modality you apply to that situation that you have learned. You might be a doctor, which you spent many years accumulating knowledge, and you apply that modality to this therapeutic situation.

You may be a nurse. Also, you have to study several years to be a nurse. You apply that.

If you're a therapist, you probably have gone to therapy training, university. You have certain modalities of how you approach the therapeutic situation, how, what kind of questions you ask, what you're supposed to say, what you're not supposed to say. Or if you do body work, of course, you have learned that.

That's your modality. Whatever it is, that's fine. This is what you practice.

But if that's all there is, you, a person practicing a modality of a therapeutic modality, then the most vital element is still missing. So there's always a third element there, in addition to you, the person practicing the modality. And that can only be there if, despite the fact that you have to use your mind to some extent to help the person, if you're a doctor, very much so, because you have to think, okay, what can I, how am I going to treat this person?

What is this person suffering from? But in between, there needs to be that alertness that you bring to the situation, which basically is, there need to be moments when you're not thinking. That's basically, and that is how presence arises.

When, if you are continuously thinking, when working with somebody, what to do, how can I be, how I want to be helpful, it's just say something that can really help this person. If you let go of that and become comfortable with not knowing for moments, then this depth dimension begins to come into the room through you. And that really is the sacred dimension of two people being together.

So you invite the presence and the presence is the really, what really matters there. Many of you know that already. Many of you probably have been doing it for perhaps for quite a long time, perhaps without even knowing it, that this is what it is.

So we have a line in the Course in Miracles that says, a healer does not heal, he lets healing be. So even though you practice a modality, it's a balance between still applying your knowledge to the situation, whether it's physical knowledge or whatever it is that you do, and yet not be confined to that in your interaction with that person. So this is the balance between what you know on the level of form and inviting the other dimension into the situation.

And that is the real healing in a wider sense, which may result in physical healing, but there's a deeper healing that is much more important. Because what that really means, the deeper healing is the awakening. It's the realization who you are beyond the person.

And that can come to whoever you are working with, if you are not there predominantly as a person. So I'd love to, in the next few days, answer questions about that, how that works in specific situations. But that is the essence of the healing situation, no matter what you do.

So here we practice being the presence rather than the person. This becomes challenging the moment you interact with people here. Some of you may not want to speak.

I believe we will have some tables set aside for people who don't want to talk, who just want to be on a silent retreat. And for them, it's enough to come to the sessions here and the rest of the time, they want to be in silence, which is wonderful. Others may want to connect with others and speak, which is also wonderful.

But here the challenge is, and I'd ask you to use that as an opportunity, because the moment you start to interact through your mind with the mind of another, you can very easily get pulled out of presence. And before you know it, after two minutes of talking, you're completely in the mind, which is your ego. And especially if there's a disagreement or something like that about spirituality.

And you know absolutely that you are right. This is, a particular skill is required, and I ask you to practice here if you interact with people. To stay present while you speak and listen to somebody, so that you don't get lost in the mental stream, which is often accompanied by certain emotions too.

Don't get lost because it can drag you along. That mental stream can pull you, and then you say all the usual stuff that you've been saying for years. All the old positions and all the things that you're so sure of, and that is how it is.

Now many of you are not that deeply entrenched anymore, but it could happen that you fall back into this caterpillar existence. So to remain present when you begin to use the mind to interact with another, it requires enormous skill and alertness. Now how does that look in practice?

Well first of all, you bring an alertness to the situation. First of all, when you listen to the other, you're not preparing your next statement in the mind. There's complete listening, and that's of course in any client situation also, that is a vital practice, even though you might have an enormous amount of knowledge about what this person needs.

And there needs to be, before you apply this enormous amount of knowledge that you have, which is good, there needs to be a space where you're not applying it yet. There needs to be a space where you give this person complete and utter attention. So you are there as an alert, receptive presence with the other person.

Do not get buried underneath your knowledge that what you have learned to help others, but you can, this can completely occupy your mind to such an extent that there's no space left to even realize that there is a human being there. We all know the cases of certain physicians and doctors, some of them who do not, don't see you anymore as a human being. They see you as a symptom.

They only address the symptom. There are some doctors, of course they wouldn't be here, they're not here, but there are some, I know there are some doctors here, but they are different, they are conscious, that's why they're here. But there are many, quite a few doctors who, of course, they have little time, they have so many patients, they hardly look at you.

Okay, good morning, what's the problem? And then they're already looking at their papers. Okay, yeah, okay.

So then they think about what the symptoms are. Okay, that's it. Okay, I'll give you that, take these pills and come back in a week's time.

Okay, next please. There's no, you're not a human being anymore, and it's a pity because they themselves are lost, they lost themselves in the system, in the mind, in their knowledge, in the pressures exerted upon them through the system that they work in, lost. So no matter how much knowledge you have acquired, don't let the knowledge absorb you completely, don't let it, so that there's no longer the spaciousness in you.

The more you know, the more important it becomes, the more vital it is. Some of you may be here who are practicing spiritual healing, in which case your natural state would be to be in that thoughtless awareness, and you're not, you wouldn't be thinking about, okay, what can I prescribe this person, or what, what is the history, or what are many different types of healing? Anyway, I hope some healers will also ask questions.

So, as you are with the person, there need to be spaces when you don't know anything. No matter how much knowledge you have acquired, you need to have spaces with that other person, they don't need to be long, spaces, it's hard, I don't really want to put a figure to them, but let's, even if it's just 10 seconds, you have 20, 10, 20 seconds of when you're just looking and listening. And during that time, you're not searching your memory banks, or in your mind for the thing, what is, how can I help this person, what do I need to do?

And after you've given that person your complete attention, then the mind may operate, and then you're, okay, this is, you may get insights, or you may apply your knowledge, and then you do that, and then again, there comes a moment when you're just, you give a fullest attention, and then you can, if you're a doctor, you suddenly, there's a true relationship, you're not relating to a patient predominantly anymore, yes, on the level of form, he or she is a patient, but you are also there as a human being.

As I say, you might have heard me say, I like the fact, for a long time I thought, what a pity that the English language doesn't have a word that means both man and woman, as German has, but now I'm quite happy that English doesn't have one word that means both man and woman, the German word would be Mensch, which is human being, the Yiddish Mensch is a slightly different thing, it has a particular meaning, it means a real human being, so the human being, the human is the form, your person, your body, your mental conditioning, your mind, the being is the formless dimension in you, so you are coming together of form and formlessness, that's basically the two dimensions of who you are, you are both form and space, the essence of who you are is space, you can find the same when you look into the night sky at night, what do you see?

Space, well you don't see space, there is space and there are stars, things and space, so you'd also, this entire universe consists of space, without which nothing could be, but it has no actual, you can't say here is space, you can never point to space, where? And the same thing, you cannot point to who you are in your essence, you are formlessness, formless consciousness and form, human being, there are many humans in whom the being has not emerged yet, it's covered up by the human, so as you practice, don't be a practitioner who is only human, without any access to being, that's a very impoverished life and a very impoverished therapeutic situation too, when you are just there as a human, so the being element is that, so no matter what you do, have the courage to be there both, not just as a person and as whatever you are, nurse, doctor, therapist, massage therapist, yoga instructor, whatever, hairdresser, not just, you are both a person and the presence, in the therapeutic situation, the presence intensifies, the moment a person comes, the session, whatever you call it, begins, there's the presence arises more than it would be in a normal situation, this is I encountered as soon as I started many years ago, seeing people privately for counseling, the moment they came, they came into the room, first they were on a park bench and then eventually they came to a room, and the moment they came in, they sat down and the moment I looked at them, and they started speaking, and there was not a single thought in my head, nobody had taught me that, it just happened naturally, and I didn't have much knowledge about psychotherapy and what to do or what to say, later I read some books about it, but at the beginning I didn't, so there was just, my mind was totally still, and there was just, okay, and then they started to talk, and then I could feel the presence, and it was, it is a wonderful intensity, but a peaceful intensity to it, and out of that usually came the first things that came out of my mouth, and often it was an additional question, what about that, and another question, again without any prior decision what I was going to say, it just came out of that field of presence, so I was lucky that I didn't know much about therapeutic situations, so there was not that much knowledge that I had to relinquish for those moments, I realize now that that is the essence of every therapeutic situation, or every, any helping situation, is that factor, and that can only come in if you know, it sounds a little drastic, if you know how to stop thinking in that situation, for just brief moments, not by suppressing thought, because you could stop thinking if you stop breathing, you can by forcing yourself, you can keep thought at bay, but the moment you start breathing again, you also start thinking again, and then you'll be thinking two or three times as much as before, because you have some catching up to do, so it's not through willpower, and I want to get some feedback, not tonight, but in the next two days from you, how many of you are already able to, by choice, not by willpower, but by simply relinquishing the need to think, in other words, stop thinking, without any pushing, without any pressure, without any, without any exerting any kind of violence or pressure to yourself, none of that, simply by being so alert, raising the frequency through that alertness, that thought just doesn't happen, so you can start with, I sometimes, it helps to, you can, you can say, while I hold this, this represents the space between my two hands, represents the moment of no thought, and you go like that, you don't have to do it now, but you go like that, and let's say, let's give it 10 seconds right now, later you'll give me some feedback, are you able to simply let go of thinking, and just remain as an aware presence, here and now, start now, okay, that was about 10 seconds, now, some of you may, you may feel it's almost like saying, don't think of a white elephant, or something like that, and the moment you say, don't think of a white, are you thinking of a white elephant, you may find fragments of thought coming, like little wisps of, like the fog that comes in from the ocean here, and it comes and then floats past, and if you don't follow it up with your attention, it floats into that space of presence in your mind, like a fragment, and then disappears, and then it could be that another fragment of thought floats in, but if you give it attention, then it'll become a full-fledged thought, and then you follow it where it wants to take, where it wants you to go, this is the essence, really, of all spirituality, is to be able to relinquish thought, and not by falling below thought, which would be getting sleepy and tired, so you can't think much anymore, because you're too tired to think, this is your falling below thought, and it feels good, it's better than a tortured mind, you might think, and that would also be the state of the fool in mythology, who doesn't think much, but he's more connected with source than the more highly developed human in mythology, but no, this is not falling below thought, we are talking about rising above thought, so it's not, if I act it out, it's not necessarily like, although I must say, it probably feels good, I tried it, we were in Amsterdam a few years ago, and somebody got it for us, and then in the hotel room, I mean, I'm sorry, it doesn't, it's fine, but it's, I mean, it's just a little plant, so why not smoke it?

It was interesting, oh, but it was, I wouldn't want to do it again, because my usual state of consciousness is preferable to that, but I can see how somebody who is very burdened by the, by his or her mind, experiences that as an enormous relief, but it does tend to pull you, especially if you overdo it, below thought, and if you overdo it a lot, then you can become lethargic, so I'm not saying don't do it, if you enjoy it, it's probably fine, but we don't really need it, we are rising above thought, this is what, this is, and no, this is, applies, this is the next step in human evolution, is transcend thought, transcend doesn't mean it doesn't happen anymore, but you go beyond it, you can use it, but you're no longer confined by it, now those humans who are not awakened are confined by their thinking, they are trapped in the conditioned mind, and so we are becoming free of this prison, which is the being imprisoned by your conditioned mind, and mistaking it for who you are, this is the essence of not knowing who you are in reality, so the practice then, practice it here, when you are not thinking, you are still there as the essential you, is still there, and it's there more strongly, I believe when I wrote in the little book, stillness speaks, I think in the first sentence, it says something like, you're never more essentially yourself than when you are still, that is the true essence of your being, that you can feel that as consciousness, as presence itself, that is who you are, so stillness, really when I use the word stillness, it means rising above thought, it doesn't matter right now for how long you rise above thought, little moments of presence are enough, and you will find if you are able in your daily life, and practice here, because here, it's a very conducive environment for practicing, practice rising above thought here, in whatever city, walking, looking around at nature, perceiving nature, what do you need to think? You don't need to know that this is called the Monterey pine tree, you know that already, so when you walk around, you don't need to think, oh here's another Monterey pine tree, this one, this one is particularly big, I wonder how old it is, and you have all kinds of men, there is a place for that also, there is a place for thinking about trees, but not right here now, there's a different purpose, you actually, there's two ways, let's talk about the Monterey pine tree, there is a way, there are two ways of knowing this tree, or anything else, or human being, you can know it through conceptual mind, through your knowledge, this, you know how old it is, how it grows, what kind of climate it grows in, and so on, you know, for example, the amazing fact that when the cones fall, I read that, I was in the green room, when the, when the cones fall, they, the seeds are trapped in them, until there's a forest fire, which could take years, and years, and years, and only when there's a forest fire, which looks like a very bad thing, but like many bad things, are not really bad, because there's something else behind them, when these pine cones are in this extreme heat of the forest fire, then they release their seeds, and then when trees have burned down around them, there's more light for the new trees to grow, so they trap their seeds until there's extreme heat, isn't that amazing, they're waiting for a disaster, they're waiting for destruction, so that they can grow again, and now this is all knowledge, and this is wonderful too, to know that, but you would be missing something very important, if that were the only way in which you can really know that tree, there is another way of knowing that tree, which is not as just as important, even more important, and that is to know it directly without the conceptual mind, and you do that by approaching it in that state of thoughtless awareness, and you look at it, and as you look at it without thought, you can sense a kind of space of oneness with it, because the tree really arises in that space of consciousness, there's no longer you and the tree, there's just an awareness of the tree, and you can sense that awareness as yourself, and in that you know the tree, that's you could call it unitive knowing, where there's no longer a sense of separation between that which you perceive and you, and imagine doing that with another human being, where you can look at another human being without any conceptualization, and then you can sense that this presence that is you, also in them, it's the same presence, the same one consciousness, you sense it in the other, if the mind is still, then suddenly you have the true empathy, which means really another word for it is really love, or lovingness, is to recognize that you and the other are in essence one, but that recognition is not conceptual, it might become conceptual when you start talking about it, when I talk about it, it becomes conceptual, but I'm talking about it using the concepts as pointers, in the hope that as I talk about it, you realize the actual place to which these words point, which is that realization, so if you can practice that here, not only with trees, but also with other humans, which is a mind, so it's easy to be still with a tree and present, you can even sense the stillness of the tree, if you are still enough, because only the stillness in you can sense the fact that the tree is very still, but can you sense the stillness in another human who can't stop talking to you, that's possible too, but you have to sense it within, so no matter where you go, if you look at teachings, Jesus teachings, we only really have it as fragments, we don't have a complete teaching, it's miraculous that these fragments survive, but in the fragments of the teachings of Jesus, you can also see that he talks about the importance of take no thought for the moral, but just give attention to what is here now, don't be worried, don't judge, it's all the mind, we have it very clearly in the Buddha's teaching, we have it in more recent Ramana Maharshi's teaching in India, as I've quoted before, I'll quote it again in case you don't know it yet, Ramana Maharshi, wonderful Indian spirit teacher, lived in the first half of the 20th century, when they asked him, how can I know that I'm making progress on the spiritual path, how do I know that I'm making progress, he said, oh, that's easy, the degree of absence of thinking is the measure of progress on the spiritual path, oh, okay, let me think, did I understand that right, the degree of absence of thinking, can you explain that a bit more, please, so whether you get, you can only get it when you hear an answer like that, the degree of absence of thoughts is the measure for progress on the spiritual path, you can't start thinking about this answer now, obviously, this answer is a pointer, and you can only understand what he's talking about by not thinking, oh, and that is the Zen moment of Satori, when your mind stops and you go, ah, thank you, oh, thank you, master, thank you, I got it now, okay, that's good, not whether he still got it a minute later, it's secondary, but at least he got it now, so that's, or if you're interested in some of you may have read Krishnamurti's writings, he was not aligned to any religion or spiritual tradition, he always said, no, no, this is all rubbish, and he would talk and he talked and talked and talked for 50 years, 60 years or longer, but if you, it all comes down to one thing that he never explicitly said, and that is stop thinking, he just gets you there gradually, he says, can the mind actually understand, is it possible for the mind to grasp the reality of this, no, it isn't, well, he didn't say no, it isn't, but you were supposed to say no, and then your mind is supposed to stop. Now, the greatest achievement, it does not matter your life situation, whether you consider your life up to this point as a great success, or medium success, or not so good, or failed at most things that I tried, or never failed because I never tried anything, no, these are all conceptual judgments of the mind, of course, whatever you say, but no matter where you're at, whether your world, the world is telling you that you're a great success, or the world is telling you that you're not particularly important, all this is irrelevant if you consider what really matters is where you are in the evolution of human consciousness, how, what, how does the evolution of human consciousness manifest through you, that determines failure or success in life, and of course, the world doesn't know much about that, it doesn't know that, it can't, so if you are able to no longer be trapped in compulsive and involuntary thinking, then your life has succeeded beyond any measure, beyond measure, if you are able to transcend you, this means consciousness, not you, the person, the person cannot transcend itself, the person is the identification with thought, the person is consciousness dreaming, the awakening is consciousness awakens, and then, yes, the person continues to be there, but you are then in lucid, the lucid dreaming, which is lucid living, if you are able to step out of thought by choice, then you embody the next step in the evolution of consciousness on the planet, and you are vital here, no matter what you do externally, and that state, which is a state of connectedness with source, with source consciousness, what repercussions that has in your life, we don't know, how it manifests, we don't know, it will manifest in different ways for different people, it could just be that you sit somewhere and just emanate, this is one extreme, you just sit somewhere and emanate presence, I would recommend that you do that in India, not here, because they would recognize you as, and they would call you a holy man or a holy woman, simply because you emanate presence, and somehow, even people who haven't got it, because it's in their, somewhere, their genes, or something, they recognize it, and then they go, oh, if you do it here, of course, you will be put away, or you can have a very simple job, where you simply, no matter who you come into contact with, you emanate, and everybody who has contact with you gets a little whiff of that, the presence, oh, or doing something that you hadn't thought of before, the presence does it through you, I spent, as you may know, I spent many years of my life, before anything much happened, after the shift in consciousness, just being, I did occasional jobs, eventually, I had temporary jobs here and there, except gradually, I was helping people with becoming more present, but even that took a while, there were still huge spaces, I wasn't seeing five people a day, I might, at the beginning, see two people a week, and there were these huge spaces, so me just being there, and think, okay, and occasionally, the mind would say, what's your life all about, you're not doing anything, well, okay, that's how it is, and that goes on and on, and then at some point, something happened, it's almost as if I had to be in presence for a long, long time, before it started to manifest, first as a teaching to individuals, and then it became a book, and then it became this, but it's all, I'm not doing it as a person, it's presence operating, just raise your frequency by being very alert and still, and then you go, occasionally, you might feel your mind coming, saying, okay, I'm not thinking now, that's okay, and then you let go of that, it's a little cloud that comes, and then it evaporates, and that is enormously satisfying, because in that moment, you are free of the person, complete, the person is just relatively unimportant, there is a presence, many people, most people drive on automatic, they are thinking while they're driving, one small part of their mind is doing the driving, and the rest of their mind is thinking about something completely different, and sometimes they think so much, that even the small part that's driving gets absorbed in their thinking, and then the accident happens, but driving also, it's a beautiful thing, your entire life experience gets transformed, as you bring in more and more spaces of not thinking, and then, when you resume thinking, when it's needed, because you have, at some point, you have to think, you actually think much more clearly, because you had spaces of no thought, because the thought that you think, the thinking that then happens, is, you still have that connectedness with the depth of who you are, the source consciousness, which then inspires your thought processes, rather than having thought processes that are repetitive, as most people have, same thoughts again and again and again, year after year after year, so the inspired thinking can only come by bringing in no thinking, inspired thinking depends on your ability to stop thinking, but stop thinking is an end in itself, it is so satisfying in itself, because you experience life in a much more joyful way, through not judging things, it's an amazing thing, if you compare that with the so-called normal human state of continuously finding fault, complaining, judging, criticizing, what a nightmare, and suddenly you go in that clarity of perception, that's again, that's the entire essence of Zen, the same, all the teachings is that, so and being totally present is no thought, and then the mind made self, the person, is no longer the foundation for your sense of identity, your sense of identity has shifted from being this limited person with its ups and downs and successes and failures, likes and dislikes, opinions, viewpoints, has shifted from there, your identity is consciousness itself, and that's the foundation for your sense of identity, so you don't need the, what the ego, the ego is the false identity, and the ego needs defensiveness, it needs to be fed all the time, it needs to incorporate people and things into its sense of self, it feels always insufficient, not enough, ill at ease, irritated, angry, sad, complaining, all the different states, so I'm looking forward to feedback from you about your ability to refrain from thinking, your ability to transcend thinking, allowing this moment to be as it is, is one of the doorways into the state of not thinking, if you just always work with the present moment, allow it to be, because it already is, so what else can you do, it is, so align yourself with the is-ness of what is, and then you realize a lot of the thinking is arguing with the is-ness, so when you align yourself with the is-ness of things, then there's no need to think that much anymore, unless there's a specific problem to solve, but even there, if you have a problem to solve, to have fruitful thinking, go into no thinking fast before you start to think, become still, present, alert. Thank you very much, we will, this evening, have our first session dealing with questions, if possible, write as legibly as you can, otherwise I'll get really irritated, and my mind will say, do they expect me to read this, to be able to read this, why can't they write more legibly, isn't it common sense that they should write legibly, why do people do things like that, that would be a normal ego reaction to something that in itself is perfectly okay, because you can either read it or you can't, but the ego adds a story to it, and behind the story is always an attempt to be more right than the other person, there's always an attempt to have in some kind of superiority, it's unconscious, of course, ego is always unconscious, alternatively, what actually, I don't get irritated, as you might have guessed, if there's a paper that's not legible, I look at it, okay, I'll put this aside and give it more attention later, in the meantime, I'll read the legible ones, and then if there's time later, I'll give it more attention, there's no problem without a story, and there's no, you are not wrong, and I'm not right, this is just what is, it's just a tiny example of the difference between aligning yourself to the simple isness of the present moment and imposing a story on it in the service of the self that wants to inflate itself, indignation, irritation, they should, why do they, don't they know better? I said, oh, they're all stories in the service of a false sense of self.

In presence, all this, what I sometimes call unnecessary baggage that people manufacture mentally and emotionally, all that unnecessary baggage, the heaviness to it that they carry around doesn't arise anymore, and this is simple, this is what is, I can either do this, or I can do that, I can deal with it now, I can put it aside, no story, but this is frustrating to the ego, because when there's no longer any story where you oppose the other, where you make yourself feel superior to the other, then there's no food for the ego anymore, but there's an incredible lightness, and the lightness of being comes, and the heaviness goes out of situations, that really, that's what the ego is, a heavy me, and even when it attempts to make itself superior, what it doesn't recognize is that all these are really forms of suffering, the ego doesn't even recognize suffering as suffering, it doesn't realize that when you get angry or irritated about somebody else's behavior and bring up a big story about it, you are actually in a state of suffering, if you were able to have attention in your body, you would notice that your body is suffering, because those things affect the smooth, harmonious working of the energy field that goes through the body, so an angry thought has an effect on the body, small irritation all has an effect, and the body doesn't really like it, but the ego, the ego itself is not in touch with the body, so it, and it mistakes suffering for something good, anger, I can really get into this, so you can look at your own life and see where you are manufacturing unnecessary stories, both in small situations and in bigger life situations, and in situations to do with relatives, family members, partners, ex-partners, a wonderful source of egoic stories, you can talk about your ex-husband or wife for hours, either to somebody else if they're ready to listen, or in your own mind, or you had a confrontation or an exchange with somebody yesterday, and you can go on, continue that in your mind and say so many hurtful things to the other person that unfortunately you couldn't think of in the situation, but you can relive it now, and it's almost as good as the real thing, so in that fantasy world of the mind, you can be right again and again, and the other person can be wrong again and again, how wonderful, these things are not, all this is what we call unconscious, so people don't know what they are doing, for them that is their reality, now can we understand why Jesus said, forgive them for they know not what they do, they are unconscious, it's an automatic process of ego inflation, of ego reinforcement, it's conditioned, learned, it's part of the structure of the mind, so that is something important to recognize, you might have, stories can be new stories, like the one I just talked about, a simple event, you get irritated about something because they are not doing it right, they should know better, or why don't they, or whatever, or it can be a long-standing story that has been going on in your life for years, a story about your parents, for example, a story about somebody in your life, years ago, what they did, often people approach me with questions like, how do I deal with betrayal in relationship, how do I, my husband, my wife, had for a long time an affair with somebody else and then finally he walked off with her or him, he or she, he betrayed me and I've had this, how can I get beyond that terrible thing of having been betrayed by him, well, the terrible, much more terrible than what happened is the word betrayal, because that word is already a story, so if you remove that, what is left, just the simple events, he, while we were still, or she, while we were still married, was in a relationship with somebody else but didn't tell me about it, and in the end, he, she walked off with him or her, and I felt very hurt, and I can still feel that pain inside me now, that's basically, that's what there is to it, but the reason why you still feel that pain is because you went beyond the simple facts of the situation, you added the betrayal story to it, and by dwelling on that mentally, it continuously renewed the pain, the initial pain of the event, so it is normal when somebody you are close to walks off with somebody else that you feel emotional pain, but this does not have to be carried on one year into the next and into the next and into the next, that is like a wound, like a physical wound, a wound is inflicted on you, and then the wound has a certain time span within which it heals, it may leave a scar behind, but it's healed, the wound itself is healed, the scar may still be there, and in the same way, an event like that, yes, there may be some suffering there, but if you add the story to it, which of course is in the service of the ego, then it can go on, the hurt goes on for years, because you relive it, by calling it the betrayal, you relive it continuously, the fact is, no human being can act beyond their level of consciousness, so your husband, your ex-husband or ex-wife manifested the particular level of consciousness that they were at at the time, and that's what happened, so he didn't realize, she didn't realize that she was hurting you, or she realized, or he realized that he was hurting you, but something else was more important for him or her, and so that corresponded to his or her level of consciousness at the time, everybody has to suffer the consequences of their actions, because most probably, this new relationship of your ex-wife or ex-husband didn't work out either, because again, the same level of consciousness or unconsciousness manifested in that relationship, and the same thing started all over again, most likely, or they became a bit more conscious, in fact, they might be awakening now, and you might meet him or her again accidentally in the street, and they might now manifest a completely different level of consciousness, but if you are stuck in the story about them, you won't even see that, you will see the old person still, there will be no resolution possible, if you are not stuck in the old story, if you simply accept the facts of the situation, then you would be open to meeting this person again, and realizing, oh, this is not the same unconscious jerk that I was married to, jerk is, of course, the story again, he is now much more awake than I knew him, what a pity, why couldn't he be awake when I was married to him, why does the universe always does that to me, and this new person, she gets to live with a conscious person, so the two levels of story, observe the spontaneous stories that arise when little things don't go according to expectations, and in an unconscious attempt to make somebody wrong, and the old longstanding stories that, in some cases, have provided you with a sense of identity, so longstanding stories that are frequently repeated in the mind about what some, you and somebody else, and what happened and what they did or failed to do, it is not unusual for a human being to derive a significant part of their sense of identity from such collection of three or four of those stories, or even just one big one, we all know the expression victim identity, you cannot see yourself as a victim without a story around it, you must have a story, and of course, people do bad things to other people, there's no doubt about that, but when you construct a story, you are doing something to yourself, unconsciously, that is often worse than the initial event that the story is about, because it prolongs it indefinitely, what otherwise would have a certain time span, the injury, the healing process, and the scar remaining, and that's it, then yes, you can still look at the scar and say that's the scar, metaphorically speaking, but it's basically, you have gone beyond it, so it requires vigilance to discover in yourself the arising of stories around things, and the old stories that you may still carry in your mind, that gives you a false sense of identity, that strengthens the ego, it's so common that most people do it to a greater or lesser degree, so when you are present, gradually, perhaps even suddenly, you don't do that anymore, you relinquish the stories, and then a certain simplicity comes into your life, and your relationships become much easier, stories are even little things, when you tell somebody, oh, yesterday, you did that, but you should have done that, it can be expressed even without that, without the should, yesterday you gave me that, could you from now on do that, the way in which you communicate can be done in such a way that you don't make the other person wrong, many years ago, I was staying with, in somebody's, when I didn't have a, I was actually writing, it doesn't really matter what I was doing, I was writing the beginning of the power of now, somebody offered me a room in his apartment, and he had three cars, and he said, you can have one of them, you can use it, I don't use it anymore, he would always buy the next more expensive car, because he got dissatisfied with the old one, so I got one of the old ones that he was dissatisfied with to drive around, and it was a beautiful car, a few years old, one day I left the car, and there was a signal when I closed the door, but I didn't realize why the sound was beeping, and when he realized the next day, well, I wanted to use again, and the engine wouldn't start, so it seems that the light stayed on, the sound was to invite me to the light, but why I'm telling you this is, he had done some spiritual work, and I was very impressed when he left me a note, because he got up before me, he left a note which said, the lights were on, and the battery got depleted, you need to call the triple A too, that's all, and I was very impressed by that note, because he didn't, a normal person who had not done any consciousness work would have said, you left the lights on, despite the fact that you must have heard the warning signs on the engine, so I was saying, well, this person has some awareness, he's not making me wrong, although it was my mistake, but he's not making somebody else wrong in the service of being more right than me, so that's a, it's a wonderful thing, also, of course, you may remember the stories, I, some stories in the power of now or the new earth, the Zen master who got accused of having fathered a baby, and again, the way he responded to the situation was without any story whatsoever, not making anybody wrong, just, is that so, that's an extreme example of non-reactivity to an event, so everybody got angry with him, he lost his reputation for a while, and all he would say is, is that so, you are the father of this baby, oh yeah, now he, this is not the only possible way of dealing with that situation, he could just have been, this is an extreme way of having no story, he could have said, no, I'm not the father of the baby, he can still present the facts, that's, I'm not, that's not the case that I'm the father, okay, and there still would be no story, so there's enormous power behind that, and also things resolve themselves much more quickly if you don't add the story to the event without the baggage, the resolution comes about much more quickly, the egoic self that adds a story to a simple event does not want a resolution, it wants a continuation of its assumed sense of superiority, in other words, you want the problem to continue, unconsciously, where consciously you say, I don't want this problem, I can't, I don't want to have to deal with these people anymore, that's what you say, but you do, because they help you feel superior, and of course, again, that's unconscious, so it's amazing what mind patterns humans are trapped in, forgive them, for they know not what they do, so it's your job to identify stories, and if you have any questions, please either, when we have questions in future sessions, ask them here, or put them in on a piece of paper, if you have any doubt about what is a story, and where does the fact end and the story begin, please ask, but I believe most of you are clear, and you can identify stories in your mind, both the ones that arise spontaneously in situations, and the old ones, they are very important to identify, and there is a reluctance, if they have become part of your sense of self, there is a reluctance, there will be a reluctance in you to let go of them, I'm not letting go of that one, because then my sense of self will be partly collapsing, but that, of course, is a wonderful thing, because that is a false sense of self, you are not that victimized person, and you are not superior to somebody else, you are presence, so don't attempt to strengthen your form identity, that is there anyway, you don't need to strengthen it, the form identity, you might remember I wrote about, and sometimes speak about, you have two identities, one is the temporal identity, the conditioned identity of you as a person, temporal, of course, you have a certain lifespan, you as the person who has a body and a mind that has been conditioned by your past, and by your surroundings, and the past of the world that you grew up in, conditioned by many, many factors, including even your native language is already a form of conditioning, so you've been conditioned by that, it's the temporal self, and that's the form identity, and there is an essence identity, which is the timeless, formless consciousness, without which the form identity could not even exist, the form identity is not separate from essence identity, it's just a temporary form that your deeper essence, of which is consciousness itself, has taken for this lifetime, remember I used the analogy of the ocean, and the ripple on top, so your form identity is a ripple on the surface of the ocean, your essence identity is the ocean, when your mind becomes still, the thinking subsides, and only awareness is left, that awareness is the ocean, now sometimes people say, but don't you need the ego, the ego, you can't live here without the ego, the way I use the word ego, is ego meaning complete and utter identification with your form identity, nothing else, there's nothing else that you know about yourself, only you know yourself as the body and the conditioned mind, that's ego, form identity itself is not the ego, it's only form identity, so you don't have to get rid of your form identity, and say, I want to be nobody in particular anymore, no, you don't, that's not unnecessary, you honor, you can honor your form identity, it includes the physical body, it includes what you have achieved in this lifetime, it includes all the relationships that you have and have had, what you have experienced, it's all beautiful, you can honor, and you can have plans for the future, what you want to add to your form identity, I'd like to learn to play the piano, why not, you add this and that to your form identity, or I'd like to achieve that on the level of form, that's fine, but what is the foundation for your sense of self, the foundation for your sense of self, if that is the form identity, then that's ego, but if the foundation for your sense of self is your essence identity, which has no form, and is timeless, and it is what the Buddha called formlessness, which is a better translation than emptiness, sunyata, that is your essence, and you can know that here and now, the moment thinking subsides and you have not gone to sleep, thinking subsides, there's this little gap that arises in the stream of otherwise continuous stream of thinking, and this little gap is, there's a gap between this hand and this hand, so to speak, in your mind, and there suddenly you have this space of simple, what's left of you when you're not, you don't remember any story, you're not thinking about anything, you're not even thinking about your name, or how old you are, why, and yet something is left of you, how do we describe that? A spacious sense of presence, stillness, inner stillness, beingness, a sense of I am without anything added to it, because usually I am follows, I am a man, I am a woman, I am a success, I am a failure, that's the form identity, so if you add something to I am, that's your form identity, but if nothing is added to that sense of beingness or presence, I am, this is the I am that has no form, this is why certain teachers recommend it as a meditation to ask yourself, who am I? That meditation fails when your mind comes up with an answer, it is not a puzzle that has an answer on a conceptual level, and you cannot solve the question, who am I, by thinking, let's see, I should just start thinking about that, no, you need to allow the question, and then the question can take you into beingness or presence, because who you essentially are is consciousness itself, who am I, I don't know, and you don't feel that you need to know or should know, become comfortable with not knowing who you are, if you are comfortable with not knowing who you are, then that makes it much easier to realize who you are beyond form, if you become uncomfortable with not knowing who you are, then you get fearful, I should know who I am, so there is a level of not knowing that's extremely important in your life, and that the ego does not like to go there, it fears to go into that not knowing, because it's not only that you don't know who you are on that level of consciousness, on that level of consciousness, conceptually, you don't really know anything, you can look at a tree in that way, as I mentioned yesterday, and don't know a single thing about the tree, while you look at the tree, but you can sense its presence, but that's not a mental concept, you sense its presence, you sense its presence, because it resonates or is one with your own presence, and that is the realization of oneness, when you can sense the presence, even of a tree, in order to sense the presence of the tree, you need to relinquish your knowledge about the tree, at least temporarily, it doesn't mean you don't completely forgotten, no, when you need it, the knowledge about the tree will be there, but if you are confined in your relationship to the tree, if you are confined to the knowledge that you have about the tree, that's extremely limiting, and this also applies to a human being, relating to other human beings, when all there is, when you relate to another human being, is your perspectives, your judgments, your opinions, about that human being, that's extremely limiting, you are not really relating to that human being, you're relating to your, the screen of mental concepts about that person, and this is how this huge obstacle arises in many, many relationships, because you never really meet the essence of that person, why can you not meet the essence of that person, because you have not met your own essence, you identified only with your form identity as a man or a woman, or whatever conditioning makes up the person, but if you have met yourself as the essence identity, and it's easy, here and now, what's left of you is still space of presence, it's your essence identity, and the more you surrender into that and allow it to be there, the more peaceful, deeply peaceful, but also there's a subtle sense of joy in that, that presence, it's to know yourself as consciousness is inherently joyful, not the ecstatic joy that goes, ah, I'm consciousness, it's a subtle, it's a very subtle joy, like a distant sound, and this is the realization of being, and the realization of being is the realization of consciousness, the self-realization of consciousness, consciousness realizing itself, and that is joyful, being, consciousness, this, this is one traditional translation, sat, cit, ananda, sat is being, cit is consciousness, ananda is the joy, but there's a single thing, not three, there are three aspects of that realization, so that's the, it's so simple, so ego, ego is, if ever you have a discussion with somebody about ego, make sure that you're talking about the same thing, because I have met other spiritual teachers who said, I don't agree that we should get rid of our egos, we need our egos, and then I always say, okay, just a moment, what do you mean when you use the word ego, and then usually we resolve it because they mean something else, often what they mean is form identity, so you don't need to get rid of your form identity, but you need to transcend complete identification with your form identity, that is ego, and that is the spiritual awakening.

At any time while you're here on this retreat, if you engage in a discussion with somebody, some other participants about, probably about spiritual matters, hopefully not about what happens in Washington, but it could happen, again, be very, be aware, first of all, clarify your terms, and in any discussion, again, look for the need to be right, are you looking for the truth, or is the need to be right more important to you, and to the ego, the need to be right is much more important than the truth, because it will even distort the truth, it might, initially, you might both have been very interested in finding the truth about it, then the other person is proving you wrong, and then the ego in its attempt not to be annihilated will come up with anything to justify its position, it's quite amazing, so recognize in any conversation that you have, here particularly, pay attention, are you completely identified with the stream of the mind that is, you speak, that speaks through you, or is there a residual sense of spaciousness behind it, this is hard to describe, but you can always bring it in by attentive listening to the other, you can make sure to remain spacious if you can practice attentive listening in a state of complete openness, while the other person says, let's say, well, let's say you do happen to talk about politics, and the other person says something, the Republican Party is definitely the better choice, and then you're circled, observe that, are you able to listen to somebody else's viewpoint or perspective in that state of complete openness, that is not being drawn into the reactive conditioned mind, and you can have a real conversation with another person, because spaciousness is part of the conversation, and this brings us again, you might have noticed, by the way, I always talk about the same thing, only one thing, essentially, I can talk for hours, but ultimately and essentially, I'm always talking about only one thing, and it's not even a thing, so it's like approaching that core, approaching it from here, and approaching it from there, and you're approaching it from there, and you look around, and sometimes it looks something totally different, but then you realize, oh, it's still the same thing. So spaciousness, again, I pointed out briefly last night, how important it is if you work with people in whatever capacity, not to be completely taken over by whatever modality you use when you work with people, not to become completely taken over by the knowledge that you have about what you do, because obviously you apply your knowledge, there's nothing wrong with that, that's part of the world of form, but if you get taken over completely by the accumulated knowledge, the forms, then what is lost in your relationship is that sense of spaciousness, so a vital question in any relationship, and even more so in the helping relationship, therapeutic, whatever you want to call it, a vital question is always be vigilant and say, is there space here, in addition to dealing with things on the level of form, is there still a sense of space within me and between us, and here, the space between us is awareness present, is stillness present in some way, and that is vital in therapeutic relationships, but it's vital in any relationship to have not a one-dimensional relationship with another human being, which is only on the level of form, but to have, to acknowledge the form level, to honor the form level, but not be confined to the form level, and that means, in addition to your knowledge that you have in your whatever work you do with another person, in addition to that, there needs to be something else, and that is, and that is almost contradictory to knowledge, because you need to be able to enter the spaces of not knowing anything, in between applying your knowledge, so you become still, even if it's just listening while the other speaks, you're not responding while you listen, you're not formulating the next question yet, there's open and spacious, attentive listening, and that is an energy field, that is the presence, that is the energy field of presence is suddenly there between you, and that transmits itself to the other also, and that is more foundational than anything else that you do on the level of form, you can be helpful to a limited extent, even on the level of form alone, but if you want a true therapeutic relationship with another human being, the presence needs to be there, the stillness needs to be there as part of the relationship, so in some kinds of work that you do, intuition may be important, if you are a counselor for example, or a therapist, then for a while you just apply, when you first start, you just apply what you have learned, you apply it through the therapeutic counseling situation, after a while you'll notice, you begin to go beyond what you have learned, and it takes sometimes years before a therapist has the courage to let go of what he or she has learned, even a psychoanalyst, which is a very mental thing, in some places psychoanalysis is still popular, Freudian psychoanalysis, I believe the two places where still psychoanalysis is still very popular is New York and Argentina for some reason, and even there, there are some psychoanalysts who after years of practicing are able, maybe they just don't want to listen to these continuous stories about people's past, and then at some point they just become present without even having a word for it, and then just go hmm, and then they begin to say intuitively out of that spaciousness, out of that stillness, they say things that they never learned, and then they never knew that they knew that, because they didn't know it until they said it, until the situation required this knowledge to come forth, and then you become a truly effective therapist when more and more intuition takes over, but intuition can only take over if you become comfortable with not knowing, instead of thinking immediately that you have the answer, or you're just applying the model that you have learned, and becoming comfortable with not knowing gives you access to a much deeper knowing, almost paradoxically, it gives you access to intuitive knowing, which is primordial intelligence arising, and then it uses your mind, and then you speak, so the mind still has a purpose, because then suddenly, out of the stillness, the words come and say, oh, that's interesting, I didn't know that, what I just said, I didn't know it before I said it, it's there, that's beautiful, then there are modalities like, I don't know if it's still popular these days, I haven't done any reading in a few years, NLP used to be very popular, maybe still is, and if I remember correctly, that started by a couple of people who observed three extremely effective therapists, they were extremely good, whether they were hypnotherapists or something bordering on hypnosis, I don't know, they observed what they did, and they wrote down every detail, and all the things that they observed in these therapists was intuitive, the therapists just did it, after years of, they become so aligned with the present moment and the situation in the present moment, that even body movements that they did were totally intuitive, and totally right for that situation in that moment, and the people who developed NLP, if I remember correctly, started to observe how these people work with patients, and they made it into a system, the question is, can that really still be taught, something that was so vitally alive with those people, I won't go that way, I don't know, but the important thing is, is how vital it is not to become completely identified with your knowledge, so that you have both your knowledge and the space of not knowing, which is when the mind subsides and only this alert presence remains, so that is space in the relationship, is there space in the relationship, and this really applies to any relationship, but becomes even more important in the therapeutic relationship, it is certainly important in your relationship with your partner, wife, husband, children, family members, colleagues at work, in any situation, you have to bring spaciousness to the situation, in addition to the things that you know you have to talk about, and so on, so that the two dimensions of you are always present in any situation, you as the form identity, and you as the underlying unconditioned consciousness, the two, if there's only the unconditioned consciousness, then you would just become very, very still, and probably you wouldn't be able to deal with the situation, because you would just go, which is beautiful too, if that is your destiny, then it may well be that you just become you emanate presence, and you have to go to an ashram to live there, but for most, there's a balance between form and formlessness, so both of you, so to speak, need to be there, you as form, and you as your essence, that requires vigilance, the normal thing to happen is that the connectedness with your essence identity is lost very easily in human relationships, because the mind is so active, and we live in a civilization that provides continuous and incessant stimulus, stimuli is the plural, continuous incessant stimuli for the mind, even more than even 30 years ago, 30 years ago, it was just radio and television, and you would, people would sit there for hours, but nowadays you have countless sources of stimulus for the mind that draws you into continuously thinking about what's your next Facebook post, what's it going to be, and you look at the ones that are coming in, all these people are doing these fantastic things, and me, I'm just sitting here, and then you have to pretend that you're also doing fantastic things, then you project your self-image, which has existed for a long, long time before in humans, they have a, they have this part of ego is to have this image of who I am, now we have the opportunity to project that image into the world, and it'll reach hundreds or thousands of people all at once, and then you construct your life, there are many people alive these days without knowing it, they partly live for their Facebook image, you might remember the myth of Narcissus, the Greek, ancient Greek myth, there was this young man who had never seen himself before, because they didn't have mirrors at the time, but one day he happened to look into a little pool of water, and he saw himself, and he realized that he was extremely beautiful, he said, oh that's me, and the story goes he fell in love with himself, not in a good way, not by becoming one with who he is, but the separation happened, this myth shows the beginning stage of the egoic sense of self, expressed as a story, the image that he saw of himself in the pool is the mental image of the ego, and stories are part of that image, that's me, I'm me and my story, so you have the image of me, and then, oh, so this guy, Narcissus, he experienced that separation, and then I think something bad happened to him, but I don't remember what, so and then you have other things that continuously stimulate the mind that almost designed for you not to become still, it's like the civilization has made a great effort to come up with as many things as possible to prevent people from becoming still and spacious, and taking a moment of sensing that stillness within, and of course, a minute later, another text message is coming in, of course you have to look at it immediately, I gave a talk last year at a conference, a big conference with people, business people, and so on, and they talked about how there's been articles in the paper too, how people's lives get taken over by their devices, they leave work, they go home, and the emails are still coming in, even in the evening, and they're still answering emails when they're in bed at night, and this is, some people are beginning to realize how dreadful that kind of life is, and some more enlightened companies, they may not be totally enlightened, but they're beginning signs of enlightenment, they even forbid you to answer emails after a certain time in the evening, they might even, some have even disabled your phones, and this is very wise, because otherwise, people will go insane, eventually, so there are great opportunities in this new technology also, but it's also very dangerous, there are both, you can spread messages of awareness, you can spread enlightenment through that also, it can travel, and incredible madness too, the essence then is the two dimensions, let's just put it like that, of who you are, balance them in your life and at work, and you will find inevitably, in certain situations, one will become stronger than the other, and then the situation changes, and the other will become stronger, when you have to deal with detailed information, conveying detailed information to somebody else, the mind has to be very active, you have to remember this, this and that, then the being dimension will recede, and perhaps you will be 80% in the mind, but then it's still possible to, even while that happens, to have that being dimension there, and other times when the mind is not required very much, the presence will come forth more, and there will be very little thinking, you will be filled with this wonderful sense of beingness or presence, when you're out in nature, for example, in critical situations, two things can happen, when you're being challenged, by many challenges come through human beings, you might have noticed, most, well, there could be an earthquake too, but it's relatively rare compared to the challenges you get from human beings, and you can either lose spaciousness or presence, or the challenge can intensify spaciousness or presence, and this is a vital threshold, where you might be at in your evolution of consciousness, does a challenge, when it comes into your life, a challenge means a difficulty, a problem, a difficult person, a difficult situation, something going unexpectedly, something going wrong, so to speak, that's a challenge, now does that pull you into unconscious reactivity, so that you completely lose awareness of who you are beyond that situation, formless self, normal self, or does the challenge intensify presence, there comes a point in the evolution of human consciousness, and this is a wonderful thing, when you reach that line, from then on, whenever a challenge comes, presence intensifies and you go, and then you deal with the situation through presence rather than the egoic reactivity, until that happens, every challenge that comes into your life will pull you into unconsciousness again, you become reactive, you get upset, you get irritated, you get angry, whatever you turn, you shout back at somebody, you manufacture stories about situations to be superior to somebody else, so look at your own life and see how you, and this is a vital, can give you a reflection of where you are at in your spiritual life, how do you respond to the challenges when they come, from the little ones to the big ones, that's the critical line, how do you deal with challenges in your daily life, the little ones and the big ones, only you can know that, and it's very common for people to pretend that these things don't happen, or to justify them, they want to keep their mental image of that they are spiritual, and some even suppress emotions because you're not supposed to have negative emotions when you're spiritual, so I'm not angry, I'm just letting you know what I think, I'm not angry at all, why do you always accuse me of being angry, you should look at yourself, denial, so that you can keep your self-image intact, so it's how do you deal with challenges tells you how conscious you are, not so much whether you have visions of angels, or communicate with extraterrestrial entities, that is wonderful too, if you do that, it's great, but it does not determine how conscious you actually are, it might be an ability that's wonderful, but that can be used in the service of the ego too, if you're not conscious, so you may be in touch with Ashtar, commander of the galactic fleet, but how do you deal with when a plumber comes to repair your pipes and he does a bad job and charges you too much for it, our retreat of course is a wonderful opportunity to go more deeply into spaciousness, and also to some extent, practicing when you talk to people, practicing here, being spacious even while your mind is engaged, so that your consciousness is not completely drawn into the mind stream, so that you can speak, at first people can be present when they're sitting quietly, and then the next lesson is to be present when you start communicating with another human being, which is a huge step forward, more challenging than just sitting quietly in a room, as somebody said to me on a retreat, I got a, I think she spoke, also wrote, I can be present when I'm sitting alone in my room, I can be really present and still, but the moment I go out into the world, I lose it, this is why some people think if I could live in an ashram, in a community, in a protected setting, in a way it's like, imagine that we are here and we are not going home anymore, while let's live here, let's all live together, wouldn't that be wonderful, I would come and visit you occasionally, although compared to the mainstream population, it is true that our group here embodies a more awakened state of consciousness than the one that is still normal in the world, that is undoubtedly true, but even though if you started to live together for a longer period of time, you would encounter many situations that would require you to be absolutely present, because ego would still surface, the best situation for most of us is to be out in the world and face the challenges of the world, there may be a good reason for withdrawing temporarily from the world for certain periods of time, if you have the chance or if you have that inclination, it's not absolutely important, yes, of course, in a way you're doing it here for a short period of time, you could, might be doing it for a few months, some people might do it for a year, if you can, but it's not vital, because you face, use the world and whatever the world presents you with as your spiritual practice, rather than hoping for ideal situations, so that you can really start practicing spiritually, because what the mind or the ego envisages as an ideal situation is not the ideal situation, the ideal situation is one that provides you with challenges, because without that, there's no awakening, that's the truth of it, so once you know that, you also know that life is meant to be challenging, it's not meant to be, oh, it's meant to be challenging, because that forces evolution to happen, it's challenging for every life form on the planet, every life form has its own challenge, and there would have been no evolution without life forms being challenged and being forced to evolve, and so you might have noticed that the universe brings you one challenge after another, and some people get very upset and despondent of this, why can't I want to, why can't life leave me alone, I want to, why is there always the next thing, just when I've achieved this, and I thought everything was fine, something else happened, everything was fine here, and then somebody crashed there, why is there never, because it's not, this is how it is meant to be, I have quoted before the first few lines in the book, the first line in the book, the road less traveled, says life is difficult, if we know that fact, that life is difficult, then it's no longer difficult, what does that mean, it means when you know that challenges are an important part of being here, an important part of your evolution, you no longer get reactive when the next thing happens, it goes wrong, you actually can say, oh, it's meant for you to show you something, it always reflects your state of consciousness and gives you an opportunity to go deeper, every challenge gives you an opportunity to go deeper, to be more awake, to let go of ego, so you can welcome all those things when they arise, in the same way that you welcome things going wrong when you watch a movie, as I mentioned last night, you wouldn't want to watch a movie when nothing ever goes wrong, the crossing of the Atlantic Ocean by a wonderful ship called Titanic, and everybody was happy until they all arrived safely in New York, and you can watch two and a half or three hours of people having a good time on the ship, that would not have been a successful movie, but here they're faced with the possibility of imminent death, how do people respond to that, what does that do to them, there's a challenge, and that's why when you watch the movie you go, what's going to happen now, and in a good movie, the character evolves as a result of being confronted with a challenge, in a bad movie, the situation gets resolved on an external level, but there's no change in the character, eventually the criminal gets apprehended or killed and then you say, ah great, okay, so do you want your life to be a bad movie or a good movie, so if it's a bad movie then all your problems get solved on an external level by some deity perhaps, who just arranges and removes the problems from your life, and that's the end of the movie, or if it's a good movie, then you change as a result of being confronted with the challenges of life, you deepen, the ego is transcended, and who you are in your essence arises, that could be a significant shift in the way in which you experience life, when you no longer get upset when the next challenge happens, or if you do get upset, suddenly you notice that you're upset, and then you go, oh, isn't that interesting, I just, I missed the bus or the plane, and I got upset, for what, how important is that whole thing, missing a bus or a plane, on a universal scale, when there's a gravestone with my date of birth and date of death on it, and a dash in between, is that missed plane going to be very important, or a year from now, or a hundred years from now, and normally even remembers who I was, no, it's completely unimportant, I thought it was terribly important, isn't that interesting, sometimes being upset is fine too, that's part of the learning too, because then your awareness comes in at some point and says, oh, I can feel the upset, why, because I missed the plane, I have to wait here for another three hours or another night, and then you ask, I'm just giving one example out of hundreds, does it matter where you wait, where you breathe, you can breathe at the airport for the next three hours, or somewhere else, or you can sit on a plane, or at home in a chair, or at the airport in a chair, you sit, always sit somewhere, or stand somewhere, or lie somewhere, does it really matter when the mind, I should be home by now, what do you do at home, well, I would sit or lie or stand somewhere, or I would check my email, well, you can do that now too, a certain independence comes, you are no longer, there's a certain freedom from externals that begins to come in as you live more consciously, you are free of being totally, your inner state being totally determined by external conditions, and that's a wonderful sense of freedom, otherwise you're at the mercy of whatever happens out there, and things, as the Buddha already realized and told us, things are unstable in the universe, everything is changing, impermanent and in flux, continuous flux, so if you're dependent on things being stable, you get upset a lot of the time, if you're dependent on your inner state on things going as they should, you get upset and suffer, you suffer a lot, and the freedom comes when you can be with, immediately go with what is internally, oh, no longer construct a story about how unfairly the universe or somebody else has treated you, or how dreadful they are, none of that, just immediately align with the present moment, freedom from externals, wonderful, especially from unconscious people, because otherwise every unconscious person makes you unconscious, every angry person makes you angry, so we transcend, just a brief recapitulation in one minute, essence identity, I don't know if it's going to be one minute or 10, but that's, essence identity, form identity, the two, bring them together so that they are both there in your daily life, form identity alone is ego, form identity with presence is just what it is, form identity, nothing wrong with it, you can see how religious people fight, different religions, why?

Because they're completely identified with their form identity, which if you're a religious person, your form identity is the particular form of your religion, and then another one is identified that brings their sense of identity is in that, it's collective, form identity is always partly personal and partly collective, so let's say two people meet, two religious men or women, a monk from a Christian tradition meets a Muslim man and they start talking, if they are both identified with their form identity, they will violently disagree and think the other is terribly wrong, if both are in touch with their essence identity, they would have a wonderful meeting together because they would immediately recognize the oneness, their own oneness, and the oneness that all their respective religions actually point to if they are understood at the deepest level, so you find that the disagreement between religious people happens because these people are trapped in their egos and the religion has become part of their sense of self, and you can still honor your religion, which is part of the form of life, if you have gone deeper into the essence of yourself, then you recognize the essence in your religion, and then you can meet somebody else and recognize that no matter what the outer form of their religion is, you realize you meet, you truly meet the other, so moment of stillness.

Our program continues with session three, Conscious Awareness Beyond Form and Thinking with Eckhart Tolle.

Most people around here know the famous saying, what Mark Twain said about San Francisco, he said, the coldest winter I've ever spent was the summer in San Francisco. The good news is, according to the weather forecast, the sun is going to come out shortly before sunset, and the other good news is it doesn't really matter what the weather is like out there, being independent of external conditions, not reactive to external conditions, accepting of external conditions because they already are, the isness of things here and now, that's the quickest way to inner peace, is to align yourself with the isness of what is, even if you think you can, it requires some action to do something about it, but in the meantime, it is, then you can do something, not about the weather, probably, you can try through focused power of consciousness, not impossible, but unnecessary, and that's also a quick way to not being burdened by unnecessary thinking, to align yourself with the isness, we are primarily here to deepen our realization of who we are beyond form. Both the Buddha and Jesus talked about an inner dimension that is formless, that you need to realize in order to become free of complete dependency on the forms that your life takes, the Buddha talked about what's traditionally translated as emptiness, as the essential you, better translation would have been, now we've got emptiness in all the scriptures, it's been translated, but spaciousness or formlessness would have been a better translation, Jesus talks about the sky that's within you, that's another word for heaven, the kingdom of the sky, translated into modern terminology, the dimension of spaciousness, the kingdom of heaven is the old translation, this is hard to relate to nowadays, kingdom of heaven, but if he had been speaking today, he would have said the dimension of spaciousness, because when you look up at the sky, you see spaciousness, especially when it's not cloudy, the clouds kind of represent the thoughts in your consciousness, and the sky is the vast expanse without which there wouldn't be any room for the clouds, there couldn't be any clouds, so the empty sky is spaciousness, now an interesting thing about the sky is, although we have a word for it, it doesn't actually exist in the world of forms, because if you ever traveled upwards and wanted to encounter the sky, you would never find it, because there's no such thing as the sky really, so you can't say, oh, here's the sky, I'm touching it now, or you can't even say, I'm in the sky, where? It's just a way of perceiving the spaciousness, we call it sky, and the color blue appears because of the juxtaposition of the sunlight and the blackness of space behind it in some strange way, but the main thing is, there isn't a thing that's the sky, so very cleverly, Jesus used that, because he was trying to point to something that is very hard to point to, using concepts and words, so he chose the most suitable pointer in the language, in words, that he could find, and the most suitable one that he could find to point to this inner dimension that is in every human being, but ignored and unknown to most humans, so to point to it, he chose sky, because he realized, just like that inner dimension of spaciousness, you can never actually pinpoint it and say, I've got it, I have got it, there would already be a duality of it, the spaciousness, and I, but the spaciousness is the essence of I, so there's no duality there, you can never say, here it is, and this is another thing that he actually said, those are some things that you read in the New Testament, I can feel very strongly, he actually almost literally said that, then there are other things that were distorted when they started writing it down, and then there are other things that he never said, but somebody said it might be a good idea if he had said that, so the kingdom of heaven, you can never say, that's in a free translation, he said, you can never say, oh, it's over there, or oh, it's over there, look, here it is, you can never say that, because it is within you, in the same way, consciousness, which is what we are talking about, consciousness is the formless consciousness, that's the essence of who you are, it cannot become an object of knowledge, like everything else can, where you have, you are the perceiving or the acting subject, I see the chair, I realize it's consciousness, you can't really say that, because consciousness is the primordial subject of all experience, it cannot be an object in your experience, that's an interesting thing, so in the form identified consciousness, you become an object to yourself, in ego, you have a relationship with yourself, and when you realize the essence of who you are, you realize yourself as consciousness, which is not an object, it's the I, the most fundamental subject of all experience, an example, some people say, I'm looking for myself, I'm looking for my real self, I'm looking for something more real than what I know about myself, there must be a deeper dimension, and I'm looking for it, other people might say they're looking for God, or for realization of God, looking for something, and when you become aware of the, that in you that's looking, without having found any answer, without having found anything, and you're still looking for that thing, God, your true self, where is it, I haven't found it, and then the mind stops, and then you realize all the consciousness behind the looking, is what you were looking for, but the consciousness became thought, and then you believe that there's something external to look for, this is very hard to put into words, but when the mind stops, what's left is just the spaciousness of consciousness, and that is the substratum, to use a geological term, of everything, of all experience, and that is the most liberating thing, the only truly liberating thing, is to realize, in essence, you are formless consciousness, and then all the seeking stops, you no longer need to look for your true self, or God, because you realize that is the essence, is now, you might say, you mean, you're then, do you then realize that you are God, I wouldn't put it like that, it's a little bit like you realize that you are, let's use an analogy, you are a ray of sunlight, and as this ray of sunlight, you've always been looking out here, so you are the little ray of sunlight, thinking you're an independent entity, with other rays of sunlight, everywhere around you, and they're all looking for things, and then the ray of sunlight, that considers itself to be an independent entity, autonomous, having certain relationships with other rays of sunlight, and even with itself, so me, becomes still for a moment, and then realizes there is a depth to who I am, that goes all the way back to the sun, but can only realize that when you stop thinking, then you become aware, the ray of sunlight, you become aware of your own depth, you don't, there's no end to you, there isn't this finite little thing, as the mind's, the thinking mind stops, there is a suddenly a depth, and in that, you realize that you are not a disconnected fragment that has been thrown into this universe by some malignant deity that enjoys your suffering, no, but that you are an essential part of the universe, you haven't been thrown into the universe, you have come out of the universe, and so in this analogy, you have come out of the sun, and as the mind stops, and then you can actually sense how far you go back, but there's no distance, you are actually never, never separate from the sun, the ray of sunlight realizes suddenly that it is still actually part of the sun, nor we can say where the sun actually finishes, because it's, it doesn't have a boundary, so the light that reaches us from the sun, one could say, is still part of the sun, it's, we are all within this vast energy field of the sun, this is an analogy, sun is the closest you can get in the sense-perceived universe to the source of all life, because in the sense-perceived universe, here, the sun is the source of all life, the very heat in your body comes actually from the sun, all the energy we use is stored up energy from the sun, and we, one day we'll find a way of using sun energy in a much more intelligent way than fossil fuels and so on, but that's another matter, so you realize, the sun, the ray of sunlight realizes that it's still connected to this vastness, to the source, and that's the self-realization of the ray of sunlight, that it was never separate and could not even exist as a separate entity, it's totally impossible, and then the ray of sunlight actually becomes a much more peaceful and relaxed being while it's still there, I'm talking about you, of course, because you've realized without any needing to convince yourself of anything, or take up some new belief, no, through actual direct realization, you realize your connectedness with something very deep, so you're not just a little person, you're also the kingdom of heaven, or as the Buddha called it, spaciousness, sunyata, so there's two of you, and this is not an ultimate truth, ultimately there's only one, but let's just temporarily, it sometimes helps to have a certain perspective on things, there's two of you, that which expresses itself in form, the physical body and all the stuff that's in your mind and in your emotional field, that all that makes up the person, that has a limited lifespan, even if there's a continuation of that after the body dissolves, it has a limited lifespan because all forms, no form is permanent, so all forms are continuously changing, I would be dreadful if you survived as this personality that you are now, I mean, who would want to be the same personality for centuries and millennia, there's an evolution of consciousness, so the body is short-lived, that which is beyond the body may continue for a while as it continues on its journey of self-realization, but you are that which is the form identity, and more essentially, you are that essence identity, the two, and all the great spiritual teachings, all they do is point to the possibility for you to realize that there's more to you than meets the eye, to use an expression, what meets the eye is first when you see another human being, or you look in the mirror, or you look down yourself, what meets the eye is first the physical body, then what meets the eye, metaphorically speaking, when you meet another human being is their personality, the things, how they act, what they say, how they behave, that's already unseen, but it manifests in the scene, so it meets the eye, that's all the form of the person and your own form, and all spiritual teachings really come down to somebody trying to show you that there is another dimension to who you are, and whether they call it the kingdom of heaven that's within you, or the emptiness that's the essence of who you are, or in other teachings, the true self, in India, they talk about the true self, or the self, it's sometimes called, and then people who haven't had any, not even a glimpse of a realization, they may be religious scholars, they say that Hinduism, the Hindu talk of a true self, or the great self, and the Buddhist teachings of no self, is totally opposite, they don't realize that they're talking about the same thing from a different perspective, when Buddha talks about the unreality of the self, he's talking about the unreality of your form identity, the relative, the dreamlike nature of your form identity, and in order to get you to realize your essence identity, he talked about inner spaciousness, and what is meditation all about, that he taught, is to help you stop the mind, not as an active thing, but as a relinquishing, and then there's the spaciousness, and then you know who you are, without having any added concept in your mind to who you are, when we think of knowing who you are, we think you must know more about you, but that's not that knowing, if you want to know more about you, then you'd have to perhaps go to psychoanalysis, and then you can delve deeply into your form identity, and many things will come up, but eventually you'd have to go deeper beyond that, in order to be free of complete identification with form, so let me just remind you, that the essential practice is to relinquish thinking, not by falling below thinking, but by rising above thinking, some of you are already advanced enough presence, there's enough presence power in you, that you can actually, by choice, say, there's nothing to think about, and I won't think for a while now, and then you can even do things in that state of complete inner alert stillness, prepare a cup of tea, and every moment happens against a background of alert stillness, walk from point A to point B, and every step happens against this background of alert stillness, look around you, whatever it may be, in a room or outside, perceive everything with your senses, and all the sense perceptions happen against this background of alert stillness, without any mental commentary, and you know what you're looking at, without imposing any mental label on it, when you look at a tree, you don't impose the label tree on it, but you know that you're looking at a manifestation of life, the moment you put a label on it, we, of course, we need labels on a certain level, but we also need not to be trapped in the labels that we have given things, we need to be able to use the mental labels when they are needed, but to be entirely trapped in the mental labels that we've given to everything, that's a dreadful limitation, because the tree is, everything is absolutely mysterious, everything is miraculous and mysterious, and when you put a label on it, a mental label, you think you know what it is, but you don't, it's just a mental label, so to really get to the inner realization of a tree, for example, you have to let go of the labels, then you can sense there's more to the tree than when you utter the word tree, than you think you know, but there's a depth to that, it's an alive being also, and I'm using just tree as an example, this is the practice, inviting presence, thoughtless awareness into your life as much as possible, and see how much more enjoyable things become, how you notice things around you that before were meaningless, you didn't ever look at them, you notice beauty in many places that would be called ordinary, not just beauty in things that are absolutely stand out, but beauty in seemingly unremarkable things, and aliveness in seemingly inanimate things, and that comes when you perceive the world against this background of alert, inner stillness, and that is, in those times, the personality recedes, occasionally, certain thoughts may come, and then they go away again, and then the spaciousness is back, so you will be amazed how, as you become more familiar with that state of alert stillness, how that changes how you experience life, so you no longer experience life only as that old person that you've been stuck with since you were born, that person is still, you honor that, because that's your form identity, and that person can also improve, it can learn things, it can improve in many ways, it can play in the world of form, but then the wonderful thing is, the formless self, or no self, and who you are as a person do not remain separate, there isn't that, there are times when you are completely in the formless, still, and alert, and then there are other times when you're involved in thinking, there's a possibility of bringing the two together, and that happens kind of naturally after a while, as you invite the alert stillness into your life more often, then you'll notice that even when you think, that you continue to be aware of the tiniest gaps in between your thoughts, like now, and then I speak again, and then there's another little gap, you're aware of the gaps between thoughts, and you're aware, so to speak, also of a background to all thinking, that the alert stillness is still there, and then you could engage in a discussion with someone without losing yourself in the stream of thinking, of mind, and without identifying with any mental position, which is seeking your identity to reinforce, to strengthen your identity by defending your mental position about something, you don't need it anymore, because you realize no mental position is your true identity, you can still have mental positions, but without the self in them, so there's no longer a sense of me or self in your mental, you can, why not keep your opinions, everybody has certain perspective on things, you have a certain perspective on whatever, politics, philosophy, spirituality, that's fine, but you don't, you're not looking for an identity anymore in being right about something, it still put forward your viewpoint, because you're in touch with a more essential identity, and that's the stillness behind your thinking, and in between the thoughts, so you can sense an alertness even while you speak, in the background and in between, so the two dimensions come together, and so the way in which you use your mind changes, in fact, you're now able to use your mind, you as the consciousness, the mind is connected, linking into that deeper dimension of no thought, which is primordial intelligence, it's where all creative insight comes from, and then your mind becomes a much more helpful tool, and it can create, it can manifest things, but what it manifests comes from the consciousness, rather than a little person that thinks, I need to manifest this or that in order to be happy, and of course, once you have manifested it, you're happy for a little while, and then you're unhappy again, needing something else to manifest, and now I need this, okay, I've got the house now, now I need the relationship, and then I need that, and then I need to be recognized by people, and there's no end to it, and the more you have achieved on the level of form, the more you realize that that's not it, so the two dimensions of you, here we are primarily concerned with the formless dimension, because that's what spirituality is about, there are many other things where you can go to workshops to learn how to improve your form identity, how to strengthen that, you can do it, yeah, yeah, and that's fine too, that has its place also, you could go to that kind of workshop, as long as you're in touch with something deeper, you can try it, I'm still planning to have a joint event together with Tony Robbins, but my idea about it, I don't know if it will happen, is that we would both exchange our positions so that we are not in our comfort zone, uh, I, I, he would be sitting in a chair, and I would be pacing up and down and gesticulate, and I wonder if that, that position would change our teachings, so we'll see, so there is a place for manifesting on the level of form, because the universe is manifesting continuously on the level of form, so if we realize that we can manifest things on the level of form, that's a wonderful realization through the power of thinking, the question is, do you know yourself only as form, or do you know yourself also as the formless? If you know yourself also as the formless consciousness, then actually what happens is, the formless consciousness inspires you to manifest certain things, not the ego anymore, the ego says, I need this to be happy, and then I need that to be happy, and then I need to get rid of that to be happy, but if the, that primordial intelligence, if you are in touch with that as your essence, that can inspire you, your mind, to manifest what it wants to manifest, so then, because the universe delights in manifestation, as you can see when you look at the life forms on this planet alone, in the sea, I don't know how many different life forms in the sea alone, and on land, and in the seen and the unseen, the universe must delight in creation and exploring, and every life form is an expression of the one consciousness exploring the universe that it created in different ways, the fly that's flying around here is another expression of the one consciousness, and really is another universe, the fly doesn't experience the universe that we experience, it's in the same place, but experience something different, as the one consciousness, all these temporary forms, that's the Leela, the divine play of forms, what in India is called the Leela, the divine play, and we can participate in that divine play, become co-creators, and that is part of our destiny, that a point comes, will come, when human consciousness will be able to manifest forms very easily, even now it can be done, a time will come when we don't need to make anything anymore with our hands, we can just go, oh, there it is, but at that point, we are not going to create countless stuff, because without the stuff, we can't be happy, we would probably create simple things, because we don't need stuff to complete us or to make us happy, so there is the creation of the universe, I call that the outgoing movement of the universe into manifestation, and then there is the ingoing movement of the universe, the universe also wants to know itself, its own essence, and it does that through you, and through me, how do I know all this? I know this because I have observed the two movements within myself, and I am a microcosm of the macrocosm, you can discover all the secrets of the universe by looking into yourself, so I can find within myself the, sometimes, the desire to create and to manifest, and then there comes a seemingly contradictory desire to return to the source, to become still, you don't need anything anymore, you just are totally, totally at peace in that beautiful stillness, that's the return, the universe realizes itself as the underlying formless consciousness, when you realize the underlying formless consciousness, that is the essence of who you are, it's not really you realizing it, because you are only the universe appearing temporarily as this particular person, but it's only a temporary appearance, so when you realize your own essence as consciousness, that's, the universe is realizing its own essence as consciousness, because you are the universe, you are an essential part of the universe, so there is no personal realization, really, there's universal realization, it's a miraculous thing, so the universe wants, it's seemingly contradictory things, there's a cycle, it seems, perhaps scientists have had some glimpse of the truth when they say, the universe expands, and then at some point, it starts to contract again, and then at some point, it disappears into the no thingness, out of which it all came, so it goes, it's like the heartbeat, or the in-breath and the out-breath, the universe goes into multiplicity, creation, billions and billions, count trillions of life forms, and that's also, there's a cycle for humans, too, when they go out, and then comes the cycle of returning home to the source, but if you hadn't gone out, you wouldn't realize your own source, so they depend on each other, creation and the outgoing movement and the return movement, and you can find that in your own life, it may well be that we are drawn to the return movement of self-realization as consciousness, because the universe is beginning to go in that direction, after billions of years of creation, and then comes a period, and this would be a miraculous period on this planet, on many other planets, when humans, as expressions of the one consciousness, are in connection with a source, while they are engaged in creation, rather than, as it happens until very recently, losing yourself in your creations, losing yourself in the mind, losing touch with the source of who you are, and losing yourself in stuff out there, your mind primarily, and thinking everything else is out, all the answers are out there, and this is, you're fighting out there against this and that, and this is a dream, the dream of consciousness, the dream of the universe, and the universe wanted to experience, in order to really experience the dream, you need to believe that it's absolutely real, so it needs to go out there and lose itself, and every life form, then to some extent, the humans mostly see themselves as totally separate against all the others, it's part of the dream, and then the dream gradually comes to an end, and then the awakening begins, and in the middle of the dream, you start to realize something, oh, the source, and you become still, and an awareness arises, and that spiritual awakening for the human being, and it's a spiritual awakening for the universe, your spiritual awakening is the spiritual awakening of the universe, and then the awareness comes, and then you begin to live with awareness, rather than losing yourself in every mind form, in every perception, in every drama, lucid living, it's a bit like we all know about lucid dreaming, which happens when in the middle of a dream at night, you suddenly know, oh, this is a dream, this is quite an interesting realization, for most people, it doesn't last very long, because wakefulness and dream are not that compatible, so then you have perhaps only a few seconds, you can say, this is a dream, I couldn't make anything happen here, and I know, because I know it's only a dream, what am I going to do now? So that's lucid dreaming, but here we have, as the awareness arises, which we call spiritual awakening, you can have lucid living, which means you're still participate in this ultimate dream of form, the dream of life, and yet you're aware of your own essence, as the timeless space, without which there couldn't be any dream, it's the very condition for any dream even to exist, that's lucid living, when you're not drawn totally anymore into all the creations of your mind, you're able to play with it, and that would bring, when more humans are able to live in that way, then we can engage in joyful creation of things, not the neediness, joyful creation, enjoy the beauty and multiplicity of the universe, and of our own creations without self-seeking, which is of the ego, so we no longer create in the service of the ego, but as expressions of the one consciousness, delighting in conscious creation, and that's already part of the return journey, but all this is just, I'm saying this just to point to the fact that the change in consciousness that's happening in you is a universal movement, it's not just a personal thing, it would not happen if it were not part of a larger movement, universal movement of awakening, so there are probably countless life forms awakening elsewhere in our galaxy, and many other galaxies, and some probably started to awaken a long time ago, who would now look at us as, oh, these poor little things, they're only just beginning, that's okay, now, not each one of you, not every one of you is able to yet step into no thought, without some kind of help, and meditation is designed to help you with that, but as you probably know, the main thing I recommend is to have some attention in the inner energy field of your body, and that keeps thought at bay in a gentle, non-violent way, not willpower, it involves no willpower, so it involves just a decision that right now you would prefer to be alert and still and not be thinking, and that decision you could arrive at because you've realized that, let's say, for the past hour, you've been engaged in futile, useless thinking that all it did was make you unhappy, and suddenly the awareness is there again that had been temporarily lost, and you say, what's all this futile thinking about, it's just making me unhappy, it has no point whatsoever, and then a decision comes to not to think, because you realize there is another dimension in you that is deeper than thinking, so you, okay, I'd rather be there than up there in the mind, and how can I get there, because the mind will have its momentum, so unless your presence power, so to speak, is already quite developed, you may find it very hard to stop the momentum once it started, to stop the momentum of thinking, there's an enormous pull, a gravitational pull behind it, and for some, if presence power is not yet that developed, you can say, I need to stop thinking, but I can't, because it goes on and on, and I can't stop it, it's like a river, you can't get out of this raging river, it drags you along, just try, especially when you're stuck in a train of negative thinking, or fearful thinking, or angry thinking, you don't even want to get out, because you're so identified with a stream of thinking that your sense of self is in it, and you don't want to lose that sense of self, it's a fictitious sense of self, but it's a sense of self, and so you don't want to stop your train of angry thinking, you want more angry thinking, and if possible, you're looking for more feedback from others to reinforce your angry thinking, I need another argument, and after you've walked back out of the room, after a one-hour argument, you walk back into the room, because you haven't had enough, you need to talk to that person again, oh, one more thing I want to tell you, and even when that person is no longer there, you're still thinking, and then you need to pick up the phone and tell your friend about it, and then you repeat the whole argument you just had, and how right you are, and how wrong the other person was, and then when you hang up the phone, it still goes on in your head, and at that moment, to tell somebody you need to stop thinking would be futile, the person doesn't even want to stop thinking, because that person is thinking, total identification with thought, so there needs to be a realization, some awareness needs to be there, it's totally pointless to talk to anybody about stopping thinking without having at least some access to awareness, maybe not in the moment of enormously empowered thinking, empowered not in a good way, but the awareness needs to bear that what's going on inside me right now, and then at some point you might be able to realize what's happening to you, it's happening to you, you didn't actually do it, it just happened to you, because you're being possessed by your mind, and then at some point you realize that there is a choice, you can actually, perhaps not when you're in the middle of it, at some point a very strong mind stream subsides, you might get tired of it, and then it goes, and then finally you go, oops, oh, and then do I choose to carry on, is that, does it make me feel happy? No, it doesn't, I thought it did, because I felt so good to be angry about that, but it's not, doesn't make you feel, the body doesn't really feel, if you asked your body it would tell you this feels horrible, but of course if you're not in touch with your body, you're only up here, you don't even know that, and then at some moment the choice comes in, and so at other moments the choice may come much more quickly, because it's just the usual stream of futile, in the middle of the night you wake up, the usual stream of futile thinking, and then awareness comes in, there's a choice, and then a decision comes, and that decision is just no willpower, it's just a decision, I'd rather be still than not be thinking, and once you know that, then you can take your attention into the inner energy of the body, that's your choice, instead of giving more attention to your thinking, you just take your attention into the inner energy field of the body, and suddenly you feel the aliveness that pervades the entire body, and so you have taken consciousness away from the mind, and put it in here, and you can't think that much anymore, you can't feel the body and be engaged in a lot of thinking, and if you really fully experience the aliveness in the inner body, the mind stops, and so that becomes an anchor for awareness, an anchor for presence, even if you cannot feel the entire body, it would be enough to just go into your hands with your attention, just take consciousness into your hands, and feel the aliveness in your hands, that alone can take attention away from useless thinking, and you continue to feel, because that is part of experiencing the present moment, which actually feels quite good, it feels good to be alive, that's an amazing realization, so inner body, or even just a part of the body, the totality of the body is best if you can, it's not that difficult, you start with one part, hands, and you, can I feel my feet also, yeah, I can feel hands and feet, can I feel my legs, yeah, a little bit less, but, and then the totality of, oh, okay, I got it, you might also notice that you're breathing then, which is the other way, it can be combined with body awareness, but breathing is the other way of taking attention away from the mind, the most ancient meditation method is breath awareness, because breath awareness takes attention away from thinking, but keeps you alert, and breath happens all the time, and breath is virtually formless, so it's easier to get in touch with a formless consciousness by placing attention on the formless breath, other meditation objects are clearly defined in form, you can have an object that you focus on, you can have a mental object that you focus on, you can have a mantra that you focus on, those can work too, but they are more clearly defined in form, the breath is a kind of, where is the breath, you can't say, here it is, it's semi-formless or formless, so to place attention on that, which can also automatically bring you in touch with the body, the in-breath, the out-breath, it's so beautiful to have attention on your breath and the out-breath, and immediately your mind becomes still, so you can either be thinking or can have your attention on your breathing, but you can't have both, the moment you think, you're not aware of your breath anymore, and that also really applies to the inner body, to have full attention in the inner body, you can't be thinking, so those two things, which are really closely linked, breath awareness, you can make it into a meditation, so you can sit in meditation, and then you can observe the in-going and out-going breaths, you can also observe the gaps between the in-going and out-going breaths, you breathe out, breathe gap of nothingness, and then you start breathing in again, a brief gap of neither in nor out, and the cycle continues. I read somewhere that the Buddha said, if you're aware of your breath for one hour, I don't know if they even had hours at the time, but if you're aware of your breath for one hour, you'll be completely enlightened, but if you lose it, you have to start from the beginning again, just one thought coming in, okay, start all over. Okay, I can see one or two of you saying, I'm going to do that.

We were going to have questions this morning, but of course, the present moment is unpredictable, so we would certainly have questions, as certain as one can be about something to come, in the next session, there's one or two things that I wanted to add to from last night, and I realized when I looked at the questions after the last night session, that I had not fully answered this question, I am a therapist, and I now feel that I don't take people's problems seriously, I don't know if I can continue to be a psychotherapist, okay, you may remember the essence of the answer I gave, and that is, I also find myself, when I listen to people's problems, a smile arises sometimes, not because of their problems, but because I'm in touch with a deeper reality, where their problems are relatively unimportant, and to be in touch with that deeper reality is liberating, and there is a joy in there, in knowing who you are beyond your problems, there is still, there is that joy that's there, and I can feel the reality for that person beyond their problems, and that is, I'm not laughing or smiling at them, but at the relative unreality of their, relative unreality of their problems, so, and that is actually a form of healing, so if that is the case with you, then you can continue to be a psychotherapist, you're not just, you can continue to listen to their problems without giving their problems this absolute reality, a relative reality, yes, but be in touch with that level deep within, where there is no problem, where that person is already complete and whole, and that is the formless consciousness, every form identity is not complete, it never has a feeling of being complete and whole, there's always stuff missing in your form identity, and there are things that didn't go according to what you imagined when you were young, and how did you imagine your life to unfold, well, you had all kinds of ideas, in many cases, that didn't quite happen, and then people come and say things like, oh, I would have imagined, when I was, I imagined my life to unfold very differently from the way it did unfold, it's really a sad story, and I feel I haven't, my form identity is really, there's so much still missing in who I am, there's so much that I could have achieved, but things happen to stop me from achieving it, and then there's that stuff that I did achieve, and it all came to nothing, it dissolved, I tried so many things, but why didn't I, why didn't I succeed in this or that, or if you did succeed greatly in this or that area, you go, why was I, why am I still so restless and unhappy, I've had, everybody thinks I'm so great, and I've got all these fans on Twitter and Facebook, why am I still, why am I still unhappy, why do I need more of this or that, even though my picture is in People magazine, and other magazines that are not that great, so whatever it is, there's always something wrong with your form identity, and if you think everything is right about your form identity, it won't last for very long, then you happen to just have hit a period, a brief period, when you feel it's all, everything is going great in my life, I've got a great place to live, I've got a great relationship, I've got a great job, I've got a great income, I have a great car, and people recognize my importance, they tell me I'm a VIP, everything is great, that's how life should be, now it is possible for human to, for brief periods to be in that place, but they would be quite brief, because life just isn't like that, it is designed for things to go wrong, no matter how much positive thinking you do, which is all good, but no matter how much positive thinking you do, there is this thing designed into life, it's a, we could call it a sabotage element, of sabotage or disruption, in which universal intelligence has built into everybody's life, you might have noticed it, but you, what you might not have noticed is that it is built into everybody's life, and you might have thought that life singled you out to sabotage your life, because some people are very good at hiding the, that element in their life from others, and they wouldn't even admit it, that at night they lie in agony and, or whatever it is, so that's an interesting fact, once you know that this disruptive thing is built into your life, then you may come to actually accept that fact, that that is a universal thing that every human is meant to face, so there's always in some area of your life, there's always some disruption happening, or just happened, or happened a few years ago, but still leaving a lot of traces around, and you're still influencing the way in which you experience life, and then the next thing comes in, and the next, and once you've resolved your financial problems, and you're okay there, finally I've got financial security, and suddenly a health problem comes up, or the other way around, or the great job, you suddenly have this wonderful fulfilling job, and suddenly your company gets taken over by another company, and suddenly you're told we don't need you anymore, who am I now without that, you all know examples from your own life, and with some of you, it seems to be just a succession of things going wrong, but they can't have gone that wrong if you are sitting here now, because it's taken you to a spiritual awakening, nobody would go to a spiritual awakening, well, nobody I know, without experiencing the unsatisfactory nature of one's life situation, so I am grateful to that in my life, and you can be grateful to that in your life, because otherwise the evolution of consciousness would not have happened, if you had been totally happy all your life, no evolution is possible, no development is possible, no deepening is possible, you would be dancing on the surface of things, let's have another drink, and good food, and watch another good movie, and sensory pleasures, and sex, and let's travel, and go to another place, and explore that, and isn't that nice, and just no depths whatsoever, of course you would be incapable of compassion, or empathy with other human beings, you would have no deep insights, which all come out of suffering, just surface existence, but fortunately very few humans, or no humans have that, and if they had it, that would become the disruptive element, the fact that there is nothing disruptive, would become the disruptive element in your life, so on the level of form identity, you never arrive at complete satisfaction, you can't, I can't get no satisfaction, and once you realize that, you're actually, it's liberating to know, okay, you can still try to improve your life, it's wonderful thing, of course you try to make your life better, if you're not happy where you live, if you can find a better place to live, or if your health is not well, maybe you can do something about it, maybe you can't, if you can't do something about it, take action, but the foundation for action needs to be present moment acceptance of the isness of now, and then you take action, but the, it will never be totally satisfying, therefore the only satisfying thing is to to realize that there is another dimension to who you are, and that's where all satisfaction comes from, the realization that there's more to you than the person, the personality, and the personal history, and that is consciousness, you are, in essence, timeless consciousness, knowing yourself as timeless consciousness is the only true, truly satisfying thing that can ever happen in your life, and once you know yourself as timeless consciousness and sense this in the background of your life, so to speak, then your form identity and all the various situations that you encounter in your life are no longer that frustrating, because you no longer look to the various situations that you encounter in your life for ultimate satisfaction, you know that they cannot ultimately satisfy you, and therefore, because you're neither looking for ultimate satisfaction, nor are you looking to the various situations in your life, relationships, possessions, achievements, nor are you looking to these things to have a more complete sense of who you are, a sense of self, you know that it doesn't work, it cannot give you that, and you don't need it anymore, because your sense of self is rooted in something deeper, and then you can enjoy the play of forms without making demands upon it, the world, situations, without demanding that they should fulfill you or tell you who you are, and then with that sense of freedom, you can enjoy the phenomena in your life, you can enjoy a relationship, you enjoy visiting a new place, and if the weather is not the way you had wanted it to be, I came all the way to California thinking I could get to not only go to the retreat, but also have a little bit of vacation in the sunshine, and look what I get, the sky looks like November sky in London, and why did I spend all this money coming all the way out here, but so, and the other possibility is to arrive and say, oh, this is what is, and it's never quite the way you imagined it, you always get a surprise, sometimes it's a nice surprise, and sometimes it's a different kind of surprise, but no situation can actually satisfy you for very long, when you look to it for satisfaction, when you no longer look to a situation for satisfaction, it's actually quite nice, so you can enjoy life when you don't need things to be satisfying, you can actually enjoy, this reminds me that I'm told that quite a few people have not arrived here yet, because we're booked to come here, because there were many, many flights were canceled, because some computer hacking thing happened, talking about sabotaging things, computers for airlines got hacked, or something like that, and quite a few people still haven't arrived here, and this is another example of how life sabotages things, and that is a pity, and some may still arrive, and that's fine, and some may not arrive, and then that becomes, if they are not looking for satisfaction, then that could be a great thing too, I was going to go to this spiritual retreat, and something, I never made it, that would be, I had somebody years ago, we were going to have a retreat in the States, here somewhere, no, was it in Canada, and he arrived from Hong Kong, and when he arrived for the spiritual retreat, he got arrested, at Vancouver airport, and so they put him in prison, and then for the duration of the retreat, he was actually in prison in Vancouver, and approximately when the retreat finished, they released him, and now why he was in prison seems that it goes back many years, there was a disagreement that he had with the IRS, which is the tax authorities here in the States, he had a business in the States, and there was the IRS, they don't, they're not compassionate it seems, but that was, I'm not sure if he realized it, but that potentially is a more profound retreat, I have one other example to tell of a similar thing that happened many years ago, not similar, but related, I mentioned before this Buddhist monastery in England that I sometimes visited to talk to the monks, and I already told you the story of this man who was giving me a ride, and who was a very committed Buddhist, he got extremely angry while he was in a driving situation, now this was another occasion a few years later, when I said to a friend of mine, who became interested in Buddhism, I'll show you this Buddhist monastery, we can drive there together, he had just bought a car, we were graduate students at the time, and his parents wanted to make him happy, so he bought this red BMW brand new, and a lot of his sense of self got suddenly invested in that, and halfway to the Buddhist monastery, we got stopped at a traffic light, a car from behind drove right into his car, and there was one other passenger, his girlfriend who got whiplash, but otherwise we were okay, but the car was basically a write-off, and that was a deeper lesson in Buddhism than he could ever have had, much deeper than he could ever have had in a monastery, because he was identified with the car, his sense of self was in this, a relatively young person can happen, so it was painful for him, and I pointed out that it was a potentially very useful lesson, I don't remember whether he got it or not, but he did say to me once, I wish I had never met you, because then I, he didn't mean it totally, because he added, I would be happy in my ignorance, of course he wouldn't be happy, so sometimes the unexpected is the greatest lesson, and often the unexpected thing going wrong, if you can surrender to that, is often the greatest lesson, and so these things do tend to happen, so just wait for the next thing, don't expect it, just know when it comes, say, oh, there it is, and you can say, oh, that's great, something else going wrong, isn't it wonderful, there's a disruption again that life puts in there, the strange thing is, when you surrender to that, it tends to dissolve much more quickly, when you resist it internally, the disruption stays in place, the sabotage element stays in place, when you surrender to it, very often the situation suddenly resolves itself, and you're free again, until the next challenge happens, let's take a moment of stillness, a few more minutes of stillness, if you are still thinking, remember, put your attention on your breath, or the inner body, or both, so as part of our session this morning, we may spend a little bit longer in stillness than we have done before, some of you will love it, and a few of you may become a little bit restless, if we go on for too long, but I promise you, we won't go on for too long, many of you probably have a meditation practice, I don't usually talk about formal meditation, but it's wonderful if people have a formal meditation and practice it, this is more about bringing the so-called meditative state into your normal life, presence, meditation is an attempt to become present, sometimes it works, sometimes it remains an attempt, for years, and you can become a good meditator by sitting for an hour every day, and all you're still doing is attempting to become present, meditation can be helpful, it can also become an obstacle to being present, because almost inevitably when you meditate, you have this underlying assumption that you are doing something, you're doing a meditation, and in that doing the meditation, you're trying to get somewhere, for example, trying to become still, and so trying to become still is having a projection of a future place that you want to get to, and there's an underlying sense that you are doing something, you could even put it in your schedule, you can say at such a time you're meeting someone, meeting, committee meeting at 11, meditation at 12, and so there's just another doing, whereas the true meditation involves no doing, but simply the essence of it is the realization of being, so you can relinquish all doing, when you have a meditation technique, which may be helpful, but if it's not used rightly, it becomes part of your doing, and then it can actually stop you from the realization of being, which is already here now, you don't need to, nothing needs to be added to realize that you are now to realize your own being, so often when you meditate, the underlying assumption is that something needs to be added, you need to become good at it, you need to succeed at it, you need to, and that in itself becomes a hindrance, so in Zen, very often, they don't give you any technique, they just go, now sit here, and you won't get up again for three hours, and so and then you say, well, what do I do? Just sit, and in Zen, when they use the word sit, they usually mean meditate, so when you arrive in a Zen monastery, they greet you, and they might say, how long have you been sitting?

Oh, I've been sitting for 15 years, and then when you sit in Zen, there may be other similar traditions, it's not comfortable, because it gets very painful for the body, unless you're extremely flexible, which I'm not, and most people are not, so if you sit for two or three or four hours or all night facing a wall, they love doing that, and then they open the windows, although it's freezing cold, so they create very unpleasant conditions for your meditation, and not only that, the instructor or master may walk around and hit you when he sees that you're dropping or falling, yet you suddenly feel, with a little cane on your back, and then you have to thank him, but it doesn't, they don't give you a technique as such, and they just watch, you might say, watch your breath, but really even that, often they just say, just watch what arises, thoughts and emotions will arise, and the longer you sit, the more powerfully thoughts and emotions will arise, and the thoughts and emotions will say, get me out of here, how could I have been so mad to come here? And then you start thinking about, what excuse could I give? I could pretend to be really sick suddenly.

So in other words, and then they create conditions that are designed, one could say almost, to produce suffering without actually injuring yourself, they don't go that far, but they are conditions designed to produce an enormous amount of suffering, and so you sit there, facing your own suffering and an enormous amount of resistance, and then if it works for you, at some point, you come to the realization that the suffering is not produced by the conditions, which cannot be described as pleasant, but are as they are, but the real suffering is the resistance to the conditions, which happens on the level of thinking, plus emotions that reflect the thoughts. So you become aware of yourself as the resisting entity, and realize you've come to a point where you can't stand being there anymore, then either you leave or you break through to surrender, and you suddenly let go of any thought about it, and then the emotion subsides too.

When you're no longer telling your body that this is terrible, then eventually the emotion that reflects the thought that this is a terrible place to be, and the emotion also subsides, and then all that's left is the conditions of that moment, which are pain in the body, pain in the neck, or wherever else, and a cold and some hunger, there you are, and then it's possible to break through to a deeper level where suddenly, despite the conditions of that moment, you feel peace, because your mind has stopped commenting in any way. But your mind is not even trying, if your mind is saying, this is really good for you, you should be liking this, that doesn't really work. So your mind is not trying to go to the opposite of from where it was first, where it said, this is awful, where your mind simply surrenders completely, and so it doesn't say anything anymore.

And this is to repeat something that happens to, can happen to a human being naturally by being faced with the challenges of life, which can pile up, and your life situation, as I call it, which means all the circumstances of your life can become so unpleasant and painful that you can't stand the suffering anymore. And that is a wonderful point to reach, not being able to stand the suffering anymore, because at that point, you may realize, not just conceptually, but deep to every fiber of your being, that the suffering comes from the resistance. The resistance happens on the level of the mind.

And so it happens to people naturally that when faced with unpleasant life situations, they suddenly can't stand it anymore, and something in them surrenders, which means the mind subsides. Without the mind creating thinking, all that's left is really the present moment. That's the awakening into the present moment, which is more likely to come when things are not going well than when everything is totally fine.

You may be at a point, most of you, where you don't need the suffering anymore to be pushed into surrender, because that's what life is trying to do. It gives you all the challenge, and eventually you have to surrender. But there is another wave, and perhaps you're here because you've already had enough suffering.

You can voluntarily choose it even without having to be pushed into surrender through suffering. So you can choose to relinquish thought, for example, which otherwise a human being would always do, and even then only a minority, would only do facing extreme conditions in their life. And here, some humans have reached this, the level of consciousness where they no longer need to be faced with extreme conditions.

Although if you were, and if you are here, because at some point in your life, you were faced with extreme conditions, then obviously that's a wonderful thing because that brought you here. And now here you realize, for the further evolution of your consciousness and the emergence of presence through you, you don't need more suffering because you now voluntarily are able, and this is the evolutionary leap forward for humanity, when a human being can do that, can relinquish thought by choice and simply say, I'll be present now. And you can let go of resistance if you still notice resistance arising in certain conditions in your life, you can very quickly notice it.

Anytime you get upset about anything, that is actually quite helpful. Don't fall into the trap of thinking, why am I getting upset? I should be spiritual enough not to get upset about these things.

Why have I been going to all these classes and workshops? Why can't you? You know, the voice in the head, you can talk to yourself, why do you still do that?

Why can't you? And then the other you says, well, I'm trying, I've been trying. And then the other one says, well, you're not trying hard enough.

And then at some point you realize it's the voice in the head that this time has split itself in two, as I believe in one therapy, more doubt it's called the top dog and the underdog. And so you have a discussion with yourself. One says you and the other one, yeah, I couldn't help it.

But of course it's all, it's the voice in the head and even having that inner dialogue with yourself is a form of suffering. It's in a conflict and it's simply produced by the voice in the head, which sometimes seems to be two voices in the head. Sometimes even three.

And sometimes, of course, as you well know, sometimes the voice in the head is your mother's voice. Eat your vegetables. But that would be relatively harmless.

But it says many other things probably. But whatever voice it is, it's the voice. So you recognize when you get upset, you recognize the mechanism behind it.

It was resistance, mind, mental, emotional resistance to the present moment. You lost presence. And at that moment, when you notice upset any kind of upset, that can be a little alarm bell and says, oh, you lost the present moment.

You lost presence. And at that moment, you can have presence. It's here already.

So becoming upset can be very helpful if you know how to use it. If you don't know how to use it, then the upset is something that is unconscious and operates in you and makes you unconscious. But if you know how to use it, it's very helpful.

It can always bring you back into the present moment and acceptance of the present moment. And it's amazing what things people get upset about. Many very unimportant things can create upset.

You might have noticed. But at the moment of being upset, you don't know that these are unimportant. They seem to be overwhelmingly important.

The tiniest things can become overwhelmingly important. So what you are growing into is in any situation that you encounter, not to be exclusively focused on the situation, but to have some focus, some awareness at a deeper level. And you might, as you know, when I say awareness, at that deeper level, you are not aware of anything.

On the outer level of your life, you are aware of whatever goes on. Usually in normal usage, when you use the word aware, you say aware of what? You can't use the word aware without saying aware of what?

You sometimes read in newspapers and so on, increasing awareness, but it's usually followed by about certain issues, increasing awareness about the environment, increasing awareness about what climate change, increasing awareness about what we need to do in education. And all this is wonderful. You're increasing awareness about all these things.

In all the various situations of your life, at any given moment, your awareness is aware of whatever goes on around you. Then that is not enough. But the awareness of what gone around you, you need to be aware of, at a deeper level, of the awareness itself.

You need to be aware that you are aware, right at this moment, for example, you're aware of my voice, you're aware of this room, you're aware of whatever sense perceptions you can now register in your consciousness. But at the same time, this wonderful thing is possible. That is, you can be aware of awareness.

In other words, you realize you are conscious that you are conscious. This is the one fact in your life that is beyond any doubt, because it is so obviously the case. Right now, you are conscious.

And even that may be a distortion that happens through language, because there is no real you apart from that consciousness. So if I express it verbally, and if I say, you are conscious, or if I say, I am conscious, but this language operates like that, but even that is a slight distortion, because that implies that I and conscious are two things. The essence of who I am, apart from consciousness, there is no me, there is no I.

It would be nothing. Consciousness is who I am. It would be more accurate to say, I am consciousness.

That is who you are. To realize you are consciousness is at the same time a realization of this vast realm of inner stillness, because that consciousness is the unconditioned consciousness. It is just vast spaciousness and great depths.

I am consciousness. After you say it, you can... How do you know that you are conscious or you are consciousness?

It's so obvious you cannot possibly doubt it. This is the one fact about your life that you cannot doubt, because all the rest may be a dream. There's no way of proving that us sitting in this room here now is a dream that you are having.

You can... There's no way of disproving that this is not a dream. This may be a bit...

And many philosophers have looked at ordinary human existence and described it as dream, dreamlike. In many ways, it is a kind of dream because what does a dream do? It appears and then suddenly it's gone.

And the situation too, it appears and then next week it'll be gone. And then you might wake up one morning and say, retreat, asylum. Was that a dream or did that happen?

So this may be a dream, but even if it is a dream, it still applies that you are conscious in that dream, right? Now, if you were not conscious, there would be no dream. Nobody could have a dream.

The dream could not appear. So it becomes irrelevant whether this is so-called reality or so-called dream. The actual reality is that you are conscious, whether it's a dream or reality.

Consciousness is still required even for a dream to exist. Then it needs to exist in the light of a consciousness. So you could well say, and this is getting closer to the truth, that everything that happens in the world, in your life or in the world at large, is the dream that the one consciousness is having, including yourself, including your person.

That vast consciousness is infinite. It can have dreams, dream that includes an infinite number of scenarios and entities and beings and life forms, all coming together in this web of interconnectedness and appearing as the vast dream that appears as the entire universe and what happens in it. Consciousness dreaming and consciousness dreams so that all these things in the dream, which are part of the one consciousness, seem to have an independent existence.

They don't realize that they are part of the dream of the one consciousness until they wake up. And they wake up in the dream. And in the dream, the one consciousness wakes up after a few million years of dreaming, or billion years.

The one consciousness wakes up in the middle of the dream and says, I know who I am now. I am consciousness. And then you look around and it's quite a nice dream.

It's quite interesting. So when you realize that you are consciousness, the universe realizes itself through you. After a few billion years of dreaming and creating this incredible multiplicity of life forms and the universe, which is dream-like, consciousness wakes up and becomes aware of itself.

You could say God becomes aware of itself in this dimension. Words can only give you an approximation. I cannot explain the universe in words.

I mean, it would be absurd to even try. So whatever I say is like, it's a bit like this, or it's a bit like that. That's not it.

The words could not express it. I mean, I've said it before. When you speak, it's just a few sounds produced by the vocal cords plus air pressure produced by the tongue.

So the rest is the five vowels, A, I, E, O, U, R, O, E, O. So you put these together, a little bit of air pressure and a few sounds produced by the vocal cords. And you are trying to explain the meaning of the universe.

But you can give a hint that's all an approximation. Or the same thing on paper, just a few symbols, scribbles, printed page on a computer screen. No, of course you cannot encapsulate the secret of the universe, but one can get a sense of what it is.

And then there is a deeper knowing that cannot really be expressed through language or words or any other symbol. And so the reason why I am pointing to it with words now is when you are ready to hear this and you are ready to experience, to realize that within yourself, this awakening of consciousness. And in that there is a deep, you kind of know what is at the heart of the universe.

But could you explain it? No, you can give a few hints. If you are poetically inclined, you might write a poem about it.

Or if you are musically inclined, you might write a musical piece that points to it. It's not it, it points to it. All these things can only point to it.

Or you're an artist or you may dance and point to it through your dance. But when you become aware of yourself as consciousness, you realize what lies at the heart of the universe. Because the heart, meaning the innermost dimension of yourself, the core, the heart, is when you find that within yourself, that is the heart of the universe, because you are a microcosm of the entire universe.

So to explore the secret of the universe, you will not find it, although I love science fiction and I love spaceships, but you won't find the secret of the universe by traveling out there to explore the last, what is it? The space, the last frontier, yes. Of course, the last frontier is the inner space.

So, but the outer space is very interesting, but you won't find the heart of the universe out there. So that doesn't mean never go there. That's one dimension of human existence is the outward dimension.

But the secret of the universe, you can only find that within yourself. What is the essence behind it all? The essence behind it all is that one thing that is not mentioned when you read books about cosmology, you read books by famous scientists trying to figure out the mystery of the universe and the galaxies and the black holes.

And you can read these books and often you find the greatest mystery of the universe, they never mentioned once. You can have these books and read the entire book without the word consciousness ever appearing once in the whole entire book that's about figuring out the secret of the universe. And the greatest mystery of the universe, far greater than any number of galaxies, the greatest mystery of the universe and the greatest miracle is that the universe is conscious.

And to ignore that and try to figure out what the secret of the universe is, you ignore the most obvious thing that's right, not just in front of your nose, but behind your nose. And you try to figure out what the great mystery is of the universe. Well, you forget the most important factor, which is yourself, your innermost being, because you're looking so much out there, trying to figure it all out.

And you overlook the fact that the secret you already carry it within you, the secret of the universe. And because it's easy to overlook the consciousness that you are, because sense perceptions, thoughts, and emotions are so noisy and clamor for your attention. You need to think about this thing.

Oh, look at me. Look at this. It's so important, this situation.

Look what he just did. Are you going to do something about it? Yes, I need to do something about it.

And then another thought and emotion comes in. So everything demands your attention all the time. Thoughts demand your attention.

Other people demand your attention. The incoming email demands your attention. Another Facebook posting demands your attention.

A text message is coming in demanding your attention. And then there's a traffic to cope with. And then you're running late already.

So it's so easy to overlook because the gravitational pull, both of the external world and the world of thought and emotion is so enormous that it's not surprising that people lose themselves totally in the world of form. And then they start believing that the solution to everything must be found in the world of form. They just need to look harder.

And then you get that restlessness of a person who is never at ease anywhere because they're trying to figure something out. And they're really trying to figure out how to get to a place of where they can be at peace. And so they need to get this done first.

Let me first do this. And then the next thing, you have to deal with this now. And the only thing I have to achieve this and I'll be okay, I think.

Never get there because then something else demands your attention. And when you deal with this, you just sort it on one situation. Another one collapses behind you, describing ordinary existence.

And not surprising that people overlook this very gentle but incredibly powerful thing that is at the core of who you are because your attention gets continuously, you get hypnotized by everything. You get hypnotized by every situation, by every thought that comes in, by every emotion. And so you're always identified with this and that and reactive to this or that.

And of course, then you get, people get very exhausted with life. They get tired of life. Can't take it anymore.

So this overlooking is important because when you realize that there is something vital that you tend to, until recently, you have always overlooked. And what is that? You overlook the very thing that makes it possible for the world that you experience to exist.

The very thing or no thing that makes it possible for you to think. To experience anything. And that's consciousness.

So the moment you become aware of consciousness and that has always been there, but you always overlooked it. Another way of putting it is become aware of your own presence. You become aware of yourself, not as a historical person, a person with a history, but become aware of yourself at a deeper level.

Become aware of yourself as a conscious presence. And that had always been there, but it was continuously overlooked because other things were seen to be so important. And even for humans who are awakening into this now, they still experience being hypnotized and completely distracted easily by other things.

Even if you're already awakening, you can still find that a relatively unimportant situation can draw you in completely. And again, you forgot who you are because that's what it is. When you get upset about anything, you have forgotten who you are, essentially.

And all you think, you're this little me. So self-forgetfulness is the main unconsciousness. So this is why an early teacher in the 20th century, Gurdjieff used the expression self-remembering.

So he was trying to teach people to be aware of themselves. He didn't use, I don't think he used the word presence, but he said self-remembering is the most important thing. And this can be misunderstood as meaning, I need to think about myself, my life, here, me, here.

That's not it. It's realizing yourself as the presence. What Gurdjieff did, sometimes he had various devices with his students.

He would sometimes, when his students were talking, I could try that at lunch hour, when you're having lunch, he would come into the room and he would suddenly shout, stop. So everybody had to freeze, whatever they were doing. And the idea behind it was to become conscious of yourself, to step out of the stream of mind and emotions and suddenly become conscious of your presence.

Whether it works or not, I don't know. But that's what he did. He was so eccentric and unusual, he even tried to get his students drunk and find out if he can remain conscious.

So we don't need to go there. Self-remembering, that's an expression he used. I would say, be aware of your own presence and practice that first.

The easiest practice is when you're in nature or perceiving anything around nature. So you can be aware of the perceiving presence and letting go of labeling, unless you need the label to explain something to somebody. But otherwise you walk around, you watch the ocean, you watch the trees, the sand here, the sky, even if it's gray, let go of the thought, oh no, not another June gloom day.

Let go of the thought and just be the presence behind your sense perceptions. That's the easiest practice. It's also, you can practice with an animal, a dog or a cat also to just be present.

This is why people love being with dogs and cats because they don't stimulate your complicating thinking mind. They are simple creatures. They are conscious, but pre-thought.

They don't have an opinion about you. So the dog doesn't have judgments. The dog simply loves you unconditionally because the mind hasn't started up yet, the conceptual mind.

So the dog doesn't think, what a jerk. He just responds to the present moment. And you can come back after three hours or two hours and the dog greets you as if you had been away for two or three years because he's so deeply connected with the present moment, with life.

So humans are much more difficult to stay present with, you might have noticed. The natural world is easier to be present with. And as you perceive, and you might even do things in the natural world.

You may do gardening. You may be walking. You may whatever.

And you can still be there as a presence more than a person. There may be a bit of a person too because occasionally you have thoughts. You may not be able to remain, nor do you need to in thoughtless awareness for long stretches of time.

But predominantly be there the presence and then the person occasionally will come in. Of course, the thought might say, I wonder what's for dinner tonight. Or it might say, oh, that's a nice tree.

I wonder what that's called. But it's not really that important right now what that's called. And then you let go of that thought.

And so there's more experiencing without thought than through thought. The two fundamental ways of experiencing the world through thought and conceptual knowledge and without thought and conceptual knowledge, which is awareness or presence. Most humans don't know that.

Why don't they teach at school that there are two fundamental ways of experiencing things? One is through thought and so on. And one is through simple looking, listening, hearing, being present with.

Shouldn't that be the most, even more important than count from one to a hundred or to be able to write or read? The most fundamental thing, the possibility that there is another consciousness in you that's possible rather than just the thinking. But at school, all they stimulate, unless it's an alternative school, all they stimulate is the conceptual mind only.

And the continuous doing through the conceptual mind, never being, doing, doing, thinking, thinking, adding more and more concepts. And the best students are the ones who are the quickest thinkers, not those who are the most profound thinkers, because to be a profound thinker means there are moments of stillness. You are not a profound thinker if you're always thinking.

If you're always thinking, you're a superficial thinker. Profound thinking doesn't really exist. All it means is you have spaces of no thought.

And if you have spaces of no thought, then your thinking becomes more inspired. It is inspired by the depths of awareness. And so, but at school, these children who are slower because they go deeper, they're encouraged to let go of that and think more, accumulate knowledge.

Albert Einstein, until up to the age of five, his parents and his nannies suspected that he was mentally retarded because he was so slow. Because he was naturally, there were spaces in him. So he wasn't, he wouldn't give fast answers because you could ask a simple question and he would just, hmm.

And in the meantime, all the other children all went, I know, I know. But the question probably had, there was a much more profound answer possible, but he needed to go within for that. All this is not recognized in our, it hasn't been for a long time, but we are getting back.

We're now rediscovering something or not. Whether the people in the past had glimpses of knowledge of the importance of stillness and awareness. For example, the importance that ancient tribal societies give to the elders, because the elders represent the deeper dimension of life.

And again, there was a reason why the elders were important. The elders represented the dimension of stillness. What function do elders have in our society?

None. They are just put away into homes and then they sit there and watch television, unfortunately. So there's another huge area where new structures need to be created.

If some of you may want to do that, I would encourage you. Old age is a wonderful opportunity for surrender, deepening, becoming aware of yourself as presence, but it's better not to wait until you're old because it may be too late because many old people don't realize who they are just because they get old. They get just more entrenched in their patterns.

So instead of becoming like this and the ageless consciousness shining through, they become cranky, continuous. They've been in resistance even before they got old, but now that they're old, they're even more in resistance. I don't want that.

That's a pity. Missed the opportunity of old age. Become aware of yourself as presence.

You're reaching the heart of the universe. Whether or not you can say anything about it doesn't matter. Consciousness, the greatest mystery of the universe, and you embody it.

What could be a greater mystery than the fact that the universe is conscious? There are some books where philosophers, modern philosophers try to explain consciousness. I tried to read some of them, but they are so tedious that I had to give up.

If you're interested in going a little bit further in conceptualizing consciousness and understanding as much as is possible, and it's not much is possible to understand conceptually what consciousness is, but Ken Wilber has some good insights into consciousness and he would be one of the few contemporary philosophers that have something useful to say about consciousness. But even there, you cannot really explain what it is except it can only be realized non-conceptually. I may occasionally, we'll just go on for a little while, see what it feels like.

And I may occasionally say a few words while we meditate, which may be helpful to some of you, just to wake you up in case you drift. The challenge in meditation is that you are drifting below thought. Of course, when you drift far enough below thought, you fall asleep.

So if you hear any snoring, it is a sign that somebody has drifted significantly below thought. But real meditation, of course, is being alert and awake, so alert and so awake that thoughts just don't come in anymore. You remember in the power of now, I used the analogy of the cat watching the mouse hole.

And the cat watching the mouse hole is extremely alert. And I once lived with three cats, so I know a lot about cats. I've observed them a lot.

And the cat watching a mouse hole is like this, very alert. Now, the cat, of course, is focused only on the mouse hole. But here in meditation, if you have a meditation object, if you cannot stop thinking without a meditation object, you may need to focus on something, a mantra or an inner image or whatever.

But the real meditation is choiceless awareness. So sometimes you need this first, and then when the mind has stopped, then you go like that. Then so you're not focused on any one thing in particular anymore.

It's just expansive awareness. You can even look around in that state. I can look around this room without a single thought in my head.

So can you, probably some of you. You look around this room, without a single thought in your head, and be aware simultaneously of your surroundings and your own presence as consciousness. Another way of putting it, you can be aware of the stillness underneath your sense perceptions.

That's consciousness. You can meditate with your eyes closed. Most people do it with their eyes closed.

You can also occasionally open your eyes and still remain in that state of presence. So that one important step for meditators is to realize they don't need to keep their eyes closed to be present. Because if you associate being present with your eyes closed, the moment you open your eyes, you're not present again.

So, but as initially, it can be helpful to have your eyes closed. If you cannot keep thoughts at bay simply by choosing not to think, as we sit here, you may need to put your attention on something. And I suggest, as I mentioned yesterday, feeling the aliveness in the inner body, or be aware of your breathing flowing in the air, flowing in and out of the body.

Or even simultaneously, be aware of the aliveness in your body and be aware of the fact that you're breathing. So yeah, there's just that awareness that can help you to be still, to be free of thinking. So when you hear the bell once, it's not the end of the meditation.

I just ring it to remind you to be present. If you're drifting off into thinking, put your attention back into the body. Now open your eyes and continue your meditation with your eyes open.

So just being present with your sense perceptions. I will talk just a little bit more, but with lots of spaces between the words, so that you can practice meditative listening, which means you're aware of the words that you're hearing, but you're also aware of the spaces between the words. And while you're aware of the spaces between the words, you may notice you're not thinking.

If you are thinking, you cannot be aware of the spaces between the words. And this is good practice to be aware simultaneously of form and formlessness of things and of space. And you may notice when you are aware of that space, you're really aware of yourself as the presence, because that presence is inner space.

And you may notice when you're aware of space, you're not waiting for the next thing to happen. You're not waiting for what I'm going to say next. No need, because you know that what I'm going to say next, whatever I'm going to say next, cannot add anything important to the realization of your presence.

And so intentionally, I'm not saying anything very interesting right now, because if it's too interesting, you will get drawn back into the words and into thought and into form. So it's good that this talk is boring, that leaves more room for the awareness of space. Music, when it has a spiritual dimension, also has spaces in it or an underlying spaciousness.

Some visual art also has spaciousness in it. And when you look at it, you may find there isn't much there. For example, certain Asian paintings, a little tree in a corner, a little distant mountain, a tiny human standing somewhere, and 85% of the painting is empty space.

It might be the sky or just empty space. And if you really look at it, you become aware that the essence of the painting is not what's there to be seen, but the essence is what's not there, space. And so looking at that can be a realization of your own spaciousness.

It's so liberating to realize the essence of yourself as stillness. Space. One little practice I would recommend, take five minutes or so.

You can practice here, of course, but at home, everybody has five minutes. Don't believe your mind when it tells you you don't have five minutes. And the practice is sit somewhere outside or indoors for five minutes and practice perception without interference of thinking, which means you just look around wherever you are.

You may look at occasionally your gaze rests upon one thing for a little while, and then you look on, then you take in the totality of whatever surrounds you. And as you do, you're aware simultaneously of what you are seeing, but without calling it anything. And you're aware of the stillness that is your essence.

That's the background to the visual sense perceptions. And so this is a blank canvas. And whatever you see is the painting on the canvas that appears and disappears, appears and disappears.

But the canvas is the spacious stillness. It's a beautiful way of perceiving the world. And another practice, particularly good when you're outside, but also indoors, sit for five minutes again and be very alert.

Pay attention to whatever you are hearing, alert listening. The slightest sounds. No sound is better or worse than another.

Just every sound is received. Beautiful bird song, the motorbikes driving past. But you are again the canvas for the sound this time.

And it's all just register. And you have no preference. Any sound is fine.

And you're aware of yourself as the presence, the listening presence, the alertness that makes the hearing possible. And again, as much as possible, no mental labeling. The subtlest sounds are the best that way because they require your greatest alertness, some distant sound.

So if you sit in a very still place, in nature, perhaps, see how far you can hear. Do you remember the story in the new earth, the Zen master walking with a disciple and they sit down, have something to eat. And then the disciple says, can you explain how to enter Zen?

Which means, can you explain how to enter the state of consciousness? That is Zen. And the master says, can you hear that distant mountain stream?

And the sound must have been really distant. The disciple at first can't hear and then he becomes more alert. And of course, as he becomes more alert, he stops thinking because you cannot be really alert and think.

Thinking implies a certain degree of non-alertness. So the disciple listened. Can you?

Yeah, I can hear now. And the master says, enter Zen from there. In other words, that's a portal into presence.

And that's how you can use sense perceptions in your presence practice. So do this today, tomorrow, wherever you are, sit somewhere. If you're comfortable standing, I wouldn't lie because lying while you do this is often an invitation to go below thought.

So sitting and sitting without leaning back is better. There's a natural alertness that comes as you sit upright. And then you go first to visual practice.

You may do that. Some other time you do five minutes auditory presence practice. So it's good.

I think I will talk like this all the time from now on.

[Speaker 7] (5:09:39 - 5:09:54)

Our program continues with session five, examining the ways we see observation, perspective, and labels with Eckhart Tolle.

[Speaker 1] (5:10:07 - 6:21:13)

I noticed there's a huge amount of written questions. I've been spending a long time going through them and getting terribly frustrated, stressed out. So in this session, I'll address some of the written questions.

I selected as much as possible those that occurred frequently, similar questions asked by different people. Later tonight, we will probably have spontaneous questions that spontaneously arise in your mind in that moment. I've put a couple of lighthearted ones on top.

Is it a good sign if I have no more questions for you? That would have been a good sign. And here somebody has a big problem with surrender.

There's an ugly telephone pole outside my living room window. I try to accept it, but it ruins my view. Sometimes I feel compassion towards it because it is working hard at doing its job and no one loves it.

How can I accept the telephone pole? Am I trying too hard? Should I just accept my non-acceptance?

Well, that's an interesting question. This may not be a profound example of resistance causing some suffering, but even here, the basic mechanism behind non-acceptance is still the same. And going beyond non-acceptance, I can see that the questioner is attempting to go beyond non-acceptance in one particular way.

First by formulating certain thoughts that are designed to make it easier to accept what's there. So in this case, the thought is, it's doing its job, so I should be compassionate towards it. Or it's working hard and nobody loves it, so I should love it.

That's a kind of rationalization that is a little bit better than complete non-acceptance. You can do it, people try to do it with their own lives. They say, I really should be, I shouldn't be unhappy because look at all these people who are worse off than me, and so I should really be happy.

And so then you try to think of all the people worse off than you, hoping that that will generate the feeling of happiness, which of course means you depend on other people's unhappiness in order to feel more happy about yourself. So that is not the real, or it's lovely to love the pole, but it's not the real surrender. The real surrender is when you look out of your window and you have no thought about what it is that you see there.

In the absence of any kind of judgment in your mind, the pole is just as perfect as the trees behind it, because the pole was a tree once. It still is in a way, it's the same substance, but you don't need to think that. What I'm saying is it's all there as it is.

If you can bring the simple aware perception to it, there's no longer anything to surrender to. And then you have got this feeling that everything is where it's supposed to be, it's fine. You just look out, you do the same, let's say it might've happened to you, you wake up in the morning, here the past few days it's been gloomy, and you open the curtains and then the mind might've commented on the weather and said something like, is this dreary, how can people live here in this?

Is it like this every day of the year? Why is it so always, we are in the summer, why is it so, it's just terrible. Instead, you could just look out of the window and just be, ah, a space of openness, what is, no judgment.

This is one thing I would recommend. I call that the window meditation, not just in the morning. Anytime you look out of the window anywhere, consciously look out of a window, make it into a moment of meditation because you will be seeing something on the other side of the window.

You see something out there and you can spend a minute looking out of any window, wherever you are and giving it your fullest attention. So that becomes the focus of your attention, whatever you see out there without, and you look at it as we've been practicing, if necessary, feel the inner body and then look out of the window. I started a while ago taking photos with my iPhone of different windows that I find when we travel and so on, looking out of different windows in different places in the world.

And they're little meditations. Every window is a little meditation. And if you've been on one or two of my previous retreats, when I had a spiritual entertainment evening, showing little video clips, I showed one video clip of a little two minute video that Oprah produced, well, not herself, but her people.

They were handing out empty frames to people about this size, like picture frames, but they were empty, there was nothing inside, picture frames. And they were asking people in the street somewhere to take this picture frame and hold it anywhere to any place. It doesn't have to be remarkable and in fact, it's better if it's not remarkable and give attention to whatever you see on the other side of the frame and appreciate and acknowledge, not through thinking, but through giving it attention, what it is there.

And people found that quite amazing. They went around with this picture frame. One person was just looking at a wall.

Another person was looking at an insignificant flower that's grown. Or you can look at a glass of water. You can look at the sky through it.

That was a wonderful practice of giving your fullest attention to something that's usually overlooked, all the ordinary things. In the normal mind identified state of consciousness, you overlook almost everything. The entire, whatever the present moment is continuously habitually overlooked because you have something more important to think about.

Not realizing that your entire life unfolds in the space of this moment. But, oh no, there's something I need to think about. Maybe at some point when I've sorted out my stuff, I can do that when I'm retired.

So the overlooking, you overlook that, but you overlook it because the main thing that's overlooked is of course the consciousness, the unconditioned consciousness, the stillness underneath the thinking that's there in everyone, the spaciousness. We talked about that. You get hypnotized into believing that everything out there is of absolute importance and every thought that arises in your mind you need to give it attention.

Come this way. Okay, where are you taking me? Oh, you'll see.

I'm going to take you to a very nice place, but first you need to worry about how you get there. And so looking and just be with it. A person who has not yet arrived at thinking can do that in some way, but a person who has transcended thinking like you can do it more profoundly.

There's an added dimension of depth. A one-year-old child will also look at the world like that. A one-year-old child in whom the conceptualization has not started yet, looks at the world in that open, totally open way.

The world not yet burdened by concepts. And this is, I would say, Jesus was talking about it, that if you want to enter the kingdom of heaven, you must become like little children. Okay, so in order to know what he's talking about, you need to look at a little child and how a little child observes the world.

But of course, yes, there is a similarity there, except that the child is at a pre-verbal and pre-conceptual stage. And you, as you become present, are at a post-conceptual stage where the entire conceptual dimension can still be used perfectly, but you are no longer confined to it. To be confined to just the conceptual dimension in your mind is the most dreadful prison because then you're confined also to a conceptual sense of self.

Your entire sense of who you are is derived from certain things that your mind is telling you about who or what you are. Just concepts, stories, whatever you want to call it, thoughts, little bundles of thoughts that reoccur again and again. And they say, that's me, with reactive patterns associated with them.

Dreadful prison. Of course, concepts are wonderful if you use them. If they use you, and if you identify completely with them, then that's a dreadful state.

Then it would be better to regress, be a little child or a tree or a dog and wag your tail and be joyful again. But we are not here to regress. We're here to transcend.

Are there specific suggestions for cerebral helpers, physicians, therapists, et cetera, to help us become present and stop thinking, to listen better just prior to encounter, taking deep breaths prior to entering patient room, perhaps? So what suggestions for cerebral helpers? I mentioned that a little bit a couple of days ago.

People who use a lot of knowledge in their work with others. So if you are a certain type of spiritual healer, then you would most probably not apply your conceptual mind in the healing situation. But if you are a physician or whatever, then you have to apply your knowledge to the healing situation acquired over many years.

And so just to remind you of what I said a couple of days ago or three days ago, you need to be able to still use whatever modality you use, your knowledge, apply it, but see if you can also have the application of your knowledge interspersed with little spaces of aware presence. Sometimes that happens when you listen to whatever the patient is telling you. Sometimes it may happen when you look at the patient.

Sometimes it may happen when you place attention on a particular symptom. And you might notice before you come to a conclusion about whatever the condition of this patient may be, there is a moment when you are looking at the patient or at the presenting symptoms. And there's a moment perhaps of three seconds when there's no thinking yet.

Anybody to look at something first, in the first moment of looking at something, you're not yet thinking. Most people miss that completely. They don't realize that for the first two or three seconds when you're looking at a patient, let's call him a patient, client, whatever, you're looking.

And before the mind begins to the application of its knowledge to the situation, there is a space of just aware looking. And that many people do that without knowing it at all. It's a natural thing to do.

There's a moment of space. But if you are aware of that moment of space of looking, then it becomes a little deeper and longer it goes. And that is, you become aware of what already you're doing naturally without knowing it.

When you become aware of it, it actually deepens and it might get a little bit longer. Instead of looking for three seconds, you might look for five seconds before the mind comes in and that's, okay, this is what this person needs. Now I need to do this, this, this.

And this is interesting. Whenever you encounter a new situation and not just not, let's take it beyond the therapeutic situation. Whenever you encounter a new person comes into your field of vision, you're walking, you're going around a corner, a new vista opens up.

Anything, somebody is knocking at your door, you open the door and then you look who is standing there. And for the first two seconds, there's no thinking. You need to take it in first.

You need to take in the sense perception. So naturally in daily life, people have the tiniest moments when they're not thinking. And it's always something new arises in your field of consciousness.

And in the first few moments or in the first moment, there's not yet an interpretation of it. There's only an absorbing it. If you find you're particularly peaceful or at ease, then you find there are longer periods when you're out in nature, then you spend longer periods, perhaps five seconds looking at a tree before your mind says anything.

You go, oh, this is so nice. Be aware in your daily life of the first, whenever something new comes into your field of vision, there will be a moment when you're just aware of it. And usually the mind tries to come in as quickly as possible because it does not like, the egoic mind does not like to be in a state of not knowing what's going on.

It needs to adopt some kind of position towards what you're seeing, what you're perceiving. So as quickly as possible, it wants to come in with some kind of judgment or interpretation. I need to know.

If you become aware of these naturally arising moments of presence that are very, very brief, then you can, they will be there consciously. And if they're there consciously, they naturally become a little bit longer and there's a deeper awareness. So catch those things in your daily life.

They will be there. Every time something new arises, you need to look first. And there's that space before the mind steps in.

And if you are a deep person, so to speak, then you're, that space that precedes thinking is longer. That's all, then you become a deeper human being. If that space is incredibly short, almost non-existent in some people immediately, then they are superficial.

They might have two PhDs, but they are superficial. There's no depth to them, which may, well, there is a depth, but it is as if it wasn't there because it's totally covered up.

So a deep human being has longer spaces of no thinking before that person replies or that person, now don't, this is a natural thing.

If you can make it into a practice, yes, too, as long as the ego doesn't get in there and say, I want to appear. I want to be a deep person. So I'm going to take a long time in answering any questions from now on.

So in the therapeutic situation, also be aware of this. So bring in the spaces and observe the spaces that occur naturally in that situation. They will be brief.

In addition to the spaces that occur naturally in the situation, bring in these spaces, for example, when listening to the patient, just listen. When you may also occasionally be aware of your breathing as you did. So any way you can, bring in little spaces, give fullest attention to whatever you're doing.

You're preparing something. Perhaps you're going to administer something to the patient. If you're a physician, you're preparing something.

In that moment, there's another opportunity for absolute presence. So it's an art to have your knowledge not completely obliterating these little moments of spaciousness in you. It's an art that needs to be practiced.

Otherwise the effect that it has on you after many years of being completely, completely absorbed only in your knowledge when you work with people, then you live in a world complete conceptualization and you will no longer be able to see the human being. You will see a patient. You will not relate to a human being anymore.

You will relate to a patient or you will only relate to a symptom in a patient. And some doctors, unfortunately have gone that way because nobody has taught them that another way is possible. So perhaps many of you have experienced being with certain doctors who actually don't see you as a human.

They see you as a patient. Or they're only interested in the symptom. Some doctors even hardly look at you.

Of course, there's pressure of work. They have to have a few minutes to see you. So it's all those physicians and other cerebral, as the questioner says, practitioners.

Of course, obviously you are here because you have already gone beyond that to some extent. So you're not totally burdened by the acquired knowledge so that it obliterates everything else. Interspersed.

So what applies to the therapeutic situation applies to anybody's daily life too. You must have your daily life interspersed with presence. Otherwise, it's just the human mind dragging you along.

I feel a deep sense of peace and awareness arising within me. I see myself in others and feel an abundance of unconditional love. How can I best communicate love and loving kindness to people, Irina?

Your mind is saying that in addition to the arising of loving kindness, which comes through presence, you need to do something else, but you don't. The arising of loving kindness is enough and then it will flow into the way in which you relate to others. It flows into your speech.

It flows into the way you look at them. It emanates from you. You don't need to figure out mentally what you're going to do with it because it knows.

It goes where it wants to go. It is the essence of who you are. So the question is really unnecessary because you're already there.

Now allow it to manifest through you. And it does in every encounter. It cannot not manifest.

So that is beautiful. Many questions have come from people asking about feeling drained after working with people for a long time. For example, I work in a healing capacity and often find helping professionals come to us asking for help when they find their energy to be drained by those they support.

Health professionals, social workers, even hairdressers who spend much of their time listening to the problems of others can feel exhausted at the end of each day. Any advice from you would be welcome. This is Sally asking and quite a few other people.

The energy loss mostly happens if you engage too much with the mind stream of those people. Now this is for people who listen and to people talk like counselors and so on. If you engage with the mind stream that comes through the words and follow it, that tends to take energy out of you.

So the art is to remain, while you listen, to remain aware of your own presence so that you don't allow the mind to link in with your mind and then pull you along. And this is why you may remember I mentioned when I used to work with individuals, I would sometimes, a smile would come to my lips when I was listening to them, their problems. And the smile comes because the presence is so peaceful and beautiful.

And it knows that that person also, their essence is also that presence. So you listen to the words, but instead of being drawn into that mind stream, you allow it to go through you. So to continuous to have your awareness in your inner space while you are engaged in listening so that I would almost say at least more than 50%, if one could even quantify it, more than 50% of your attention, 70% of your attention needs to be in the energy field of presence, your stillness.

And then you listen from there. Then it's not draining to listen. But if you listen with, then it draws your attention.

If you link into the other person's mental stream, your mental stream unites with the other person's mental stream and then you get dragged along. So that almost looks as if you were a little detached. And I don't know if detachment is the right word.

Perhaps it is. But detachment limits it because you're not only detached, you're on a deeper level. You are more at one with that person than you could ever be on the mental level.

So on the mental level, there is some detachment, but on a deeper level, there is a sense of, there's the unifying field of awareness that is there between you of presence. So there's no separation. Yes, detachment on one level, but on another level, there's the realization of oneness beyond the conceptualized identity.

It's again, it's a practice. It's an art. Another related question.

Do you have a comment about labeling of people, diagnostic evaluation and so on for psychiatrists and others? Counselors, psychiatrists, of course, that's what they've been trained to do. You find certain labels for certain conditions.

And again, finding a balance between, yes, you may still want to apply your modality through which you look. It's a kind of map or a lens through which you look at that person. And then you figure out according to your training, what's wrong with that person and what you come up with, of course, is a certain concepts that you apply.

And say, this person suffers from narcissistic personality disorder because he won't stop talking about himself, has no interest in anybody else and gets angry when anybody disagrees with him and is desperate for attention and acknowledgement. Okay, that's narcissistic personality disorder. Okay, so that label may have a certain validity, but if you think that that is who that human being is, if you equate the labels that you apply to the person with who that person is, which is the danger when you have lots of labels at your disposition, which you can apply to people, you then mistake the label for who that person is and you're treating a narcissistic personality disorder person and you can no longer sense that although this person may display all those symptoms, there is a being underneath it. There is a consciousness underneath it that is one with the consciousness that you are. So the danger is that you mistake the labels for the identity of that person.

As long as you know that it's only a label and it's a temporary label because anybody can suddenly change, sometimes through suffering, through a miracle, or they can change gradually. Anybody can suddenly change and suddenly there's somebody else there. There are many people in prisons when they went into prison where one person and some of them experience a transformation.

Most of them unfortunately don't, but some of them experience a transformation of consciousness while they are in there. So the dreadful person who did dreadful things disappears. There have been cases of the most people have committed the most dreadful atrocities and then through intense suffering, perhaps on death row over years, all their, whatever blocked their essential being got burned up, burned out of them.

The totally dysfunctional ego, the absurdly dysfunctional ego, the violent ego, the murderous ego, got burned out of them. And there's, what's left is just the presence. So you cannot, there's never, whatever the conditioning of that person is, that's never who that human being truly is.

Or you could say in the way I use the word, the human is the conditioned level. The being is the unconditioned. The human is temporal and the being is timeless.

So it's vital, not just in the therapeutic situation, not to mistake labels for who, not to equate mental labels that you give to people, not to equate that with who they are. And also not to equate what they did with who they are, because what they did was the result of their conditioning, their unconsciousness. So that is as important for professionals who have labels that they apply.

And it's important in general for everybody not to believe in the labels that the mind comes up with, not for yourself either. Who am I, me and my life, conceptual identity. You don't want to live through a conceptual identity for the rest of your life.

It's so limiting. Now, I don't know how this got here, but it's here. My Christian friend thinks I am going to hell because I have not accepted Jesus as my personal savior.

I disagree. I think he is stuck in an ego-based belief system. Who is right?

Well, I'm sure your friend thinks he is right. And I'm sure you think you are right. And now you want me to confirm that you are right.

There are certain levels of evolution and there are also certain levels of spirituality. And what works on one level for certain people may not work on another level for others. So there's another question here somewhere about whether one needs to have a master, a spiritual master, not to worship, but as a means of attaining salvation, it's a wonderfully asked, do we need a spiritual master or guru?

Because there are certain people who will tell you that you absolutely need to surrender to a spiritual master or guru to attain salvation. And again, if that is your path, then you will find one. And you may surrender to him until you grow out of that stage, but it works while you do it.

It brings you to some degree of surrender. If the master is a real master, he will send you away at some point and say, find yourself. I've been teaching you for long enough.

Goodbye. Or if you are lucky, he dies and then you're alone suddenly. Jesus or Jesus Christ can be seen also on many levels.

At a certain level of consciousness, you regard Jesus as your personal savior. There are other levels of consciousness where you may regard Jesus as a representation of Christ consciousness. And Christians can go that way.

You can go very deeply and still be a Christian. You can transcend the lower level belief systems that are associated with not only with Christianity, with any religion. They are the lower level belief systems that corresponds to certain degree levels of consciousness in humans.

And you can go to a deeper, deeper level of realization and can still have Jesus or Christ as the representation of transcendent consciousness. And then that may still work for you. So there are teachings that are quite profound.

For example, A Course in Miracles that use Christian terminology, but take it to a deeper level. Other teachings, Joel Goldsmith, for anybody who has read, he was a spiritual teacher in the earlier first half of the 20th century. He also took Christianity to a deeper level.

There were medieval mystics like Meister Eckhart, perhaps the most profound, who took Christianity, even medieval Christianity, which was extremely absurdly limited and totally intolerant and just incredibly unconscious. And he took that and he revealed, he interpreted in such a way that it suddenly had enormous depth. And miraculously, he didn't get killed or burned, but he just, just before he died, apparently the Pope, whoever the Pope was at the time, condemned his teachings.

And then very conveniently, Meister Eckhart died. So you can have, if you go to a Buddhist country, you see many practices that are, that correspond to a certain level of consciousness where the Buddha is basically a god and you carry a little thing around here for your personal protection. And even the thieves and bandits, they carry the Buddha here for protection.

They may go around killing people, but they want the Buddha for protection. And if you go into a Buddhist monastery in a Buddhist country, you may, after a little while, you may be a little disappointed because at first, when you're a Westerner, you think every Buddhist monk looks so enlightened because they are. But if you actually go there, you see most of them are not enlightened at all.

Some of them have gone into a monastery because they were escaping from the police and others because it's a living, they look after you and your family wanted you to go in. So it might have sent you there as a young child. And so you're there, it's okay.

But here and there, there are some monks who have gone very deep. So they represent a different level of consciousness. On the whole, Buddhism is the closest, perhaps, to the spiritual truths than other religions have gone further out into mythology or Buddhism has too.

But the original teaching is still fairly intact. If you look, you have to sometimes dig deep to get to it, but it's there. So these teachings correspond to different levels of consciousness.

So let your friend be saved and allow him to believe that you are not saved and that you are going to hell. And perhaps one day you can talk to him about, not about presence, but about Christ consciousness. You might even select certain passages in the New Testament where I believe St. Paul, for example, says somewhere, I must diminish and Christ in me must grow. This is a free, I don't know the literal translation anymore. I must shrink and Christ in me must grow. Really, that means Christ, the consciousness, the mind of Christ, as it's called sometimes by St. Paul, the mind of Christ, as opposed to the little me. So there are certain hints there of a more transcendent truth shining through here and there. You have to look for it. It takes a while to find it.

Little pearls here and there. So if you want to have a talk with your friend at some point when he feels a bit relaxed, or you can give him a book by Joel Goldsmith, for example, and see what he says about that. One thing about the archetype of suffering that is embodied in the figure of Jesus, because the person who is suffering on the cross is an archetype of human suffering.

A very strange image. And over the centuries, it has, I believe, to some extent helped many people to enter the state of surrender when suffering arose for them, because they felt that they relived or reflected the suffering of Jesus on the cross. And by feeling that they went through the same suffering as Jesus on the cross, they were able to surrender to their suffering.

And if you surrender, then something else arises, inner peace arises, no matter how your mind interprets it. It doesn't really matter when presence arises in a human being, the mind may interpret it in certain ways. For example, a Hindu person might say something about Krishna, or the interpretation of the mind comes after something happens that is beyond the mind, and then the mind comes in.

So over the centuries, the identifying with the suffering, Jesus has helped, I believe, many people to surrender to their own suffering. Because in a way, Jesus stands for every human being, and the cross stands for, is the amazing thing. I've mentioned it before, but I'll mention it again.

The cross is, amazingly, it's a torture instrument and a symbol for the divine in the Christian religion. It's a torture instrument and a symbol for the divine. Isn't that weird?

How can a torture instrument symbolize God or the divine? But there is a deeper meaning behind that. Suffering, which is symbolized by the cross, can become the doorway into the divine.

And then the very thing, the worst thing in your life that created the suffering, when you surrender, becomes the doorway into presence. For example, we had a questioner the other day who had developed bowel cancer, and then through that, which normally would be, it was suffering, and then suddenly there was surrender to it. And then that is the cross.

The condition that she suffered from is the cross and the cross as a torture instrument. And when surrender happens, the reversal occurs, the torture instrument becomes a symbol. The cross is now suddenly a symbol for the divine because it becomes a doorway.

And that's an amazing thing. Now, this is when mythology works to some extent because it embodies a truth that for a long, long time, people would not have been able to understand intellectually as we do. When I explain it to you, you can understand this truth intellectually.

But for a long time, people couldn't understand this truth intellectually. They just intuitively grasped what was behind it. Now, I'm talking about it when in those cases when the mythology actually worked because it was a living teaching.

In many other cases, it got so misinterpreted that it did the complete opposite from liberating people. So in many, many cases, for religions to survive, to survive the arising of a new consciousness, they would have to undergo a fundamental transformation and if they can't, then they will eventually disappear. But it is possible for religions to survive, but it would be a very significant change.

One thing that happens, the religion and the mythology have to separate so that because the age of mythology, we have outlived, we cannot believe in these stories anymore, nor do we need to. Buddhism has mythologies too. There are weird stories of the birth of the Buddha.

When the Buddha came out of his mother's womb, he's supposed to have said, I have come here for the salvation of the world. And that's very misleading because the Buddha was a normal human being who transcended eventually the limitations of the human condition. A few people asked a similar question.

This is not directly related to helping people, but it seems to be important, an important question for many people. For example, here, you and Krishnamurti both talk about the importance of choiceless awareness, directly confronting what is without judgment. You also talk about the primacy of presence as the way to transcend thought, the improper use of which is the cause of our suffering.

Another teaching respected by many celebrates thought and desire as being responsible for our evolution and the expansion of the universe. While both teachings have much in common, this appears to be an important point of departure that I cannot reconcile. Can you help clarify?

Hi. Is that the same Jeff who asked the previous question? Anyway, it doesn't matter.

It's only one consciousness, so. So there seems to be basically two teachings, he says, and many people have asked similar question. One is accept what is choiceless awareness, presence.

The other one is using thought to create, to manifest, to transform. Are they separate? Can they be reconciled?

As I mentioned the other day, the two represent the two movements of the universe. One is into creation, multiplicity, increasing complexity of life forms. It experienced itself as that.

It loves to create. That's for sure because if you look around, even on this planet alone, how many life forms there are, all perceiving the universe in a different way or saying the universe, the one consciousness, perceiving itself through all these different forms in different ways. You could call it a dream.

You could call it reality. It doesn't matter. These are just words.

And then the universe also wants to know its own source. And that's the return movement is first as the outboard movement. And then there's the return moon.

This might correspond to the big bang, what scientists call, which the universe came out of nothing. Nobody knows what that is. It started from nothing.

And suddenly it expanded and went into creativity. And my forms began to multiply over billions of years. And then the story goes, some scientists say, and even in ancient Hindu mythology and others, there's a story that eventually it will come together again and return to the one.

In that case, that would be like the inbreath and the outbreath of God. The entire universe, God breathes out and then it all returns back to the source for some reason that we could not even fathom. And even if we even just start thinking about it, what might the reason be, you would never find it through the conceptual mind.

But that seems to correspond to what we do because we have a heart that also goes, and we also breathe in and breathe out. And we also wake up in the morning and do all our activities. And at nighttime, we go, and then we go, now everything is reflected on every level.

You are a microcosm of the entire universe. So if you observe yourself, if you observe how the heart works, how the breathing operates, how the sleep and wakefulness, dreamless sleep, dream state, the so-called wakeful state, which is not that wakeful for most people. But here we have similar, there may be, there certainly is a similar pattern everywhere.

So the universe has both movements, the creative and the return to stillness, the return to source. Every human has that incredible irresistible impulse every night to return to source. If you can't resist it, it's called tiredness.

And if you try to keep your eyes open, you can for a while, but you would go insane if you didn't sleep. We regard it as normal that people just drop unconscious every 15 hours or whatever. Everybody drops unconscious.

Isn't that weird? But it's so normal that nobody questions it. You will also notice when you get really tired, how irresistible the pull is towards sleep.

What does it, when you, feeling tired is a, there's a sweetness to sleep. The more tired you get, the more you feel, I need to get there. Something the pull is so irresistible that people give up their life to sleep.

People who have been lost in the wilderness, out in the cold, in the snow, nowhere, can't walk anymore. And they know if I fall asleep, I'm never going to wake up again. And yet at some point, they do it because it feels so good.

They have to go there. Doesn't matter if I don't wake up again. I want to go back to the source.

So every human goes back to oneness, but doesn't know it unknowingly. And then comes back out. So here we have, if you really look at yourself, that will tell you many secrets about the universe.

I'm talking about this because this is how the two movements are reconciled. The universe needs both. It needs the creativity.

It needs also the stillness. And for humans, it's not enough to go unconsciously to the source. It's our destiny because it's the destiny of the universe to consciously unite with source, source consciousness.

And that's why we are here. So your life needs to be a balance, a dance between creating and not getting lost in your creations, which means not getting lost in the mind, being able to use the mind to create, but for conscious creation, because for a long, long time, the universe, the humans created their lives, but unconsciously. And they lost themselves in their creation.

They lost themselves in the mind. Whenever you get stressed, you are lost in your creation. You are lost in your activity.

So allowing the unconditioned consciousness, which is the universe to create through you, rather than being a little ego that says, I need to be happy. I need this and this and this and this and this in my life. And then, okay, I'm going to create this.

And when you get it, you realize it doesn't make you happy. The Course in Miracles says, how do I know when something is ego motivated, something has been ego motivated? Well, it's easy to know.

It says, when you achieve it, it doesn't satisfy you. Maybe for a little while, but not for long, very briefly. So no egoic achievement satisfies you.

What is the motivation for creation if you're already accepting of the present moment? If you feel completely at one with the is-ness of the present moment? There are two reasons why you take action here.

One may be as a response to a situation that requires action. You may be stranded somewhere without food. So you need to walk somewhere to get food and shelter.

In the meantime, you can internally accept where you are. You are right here. And then you see what this present moment requires.

It requires you to take a step and then another step and another step until the situation is resolved. So certain situations, somebody may need help. You can sit at ease contemplating nature and suddenly there's a human being who says, oh, help me.

Do you sit there and say, no, I'm too at ease in the present moment. So a situation, you respond to whatever the situation, the present moment requires you to do. You respond from within.

That's a natural thing. So certain situations obviously need a response. If you live in a place that is noisy and cold or unpleasant in some way, yes, you have to surrender while you're here.

If you don't want to suffer, you have to accept this moment as it is. It's cold, it's noisy. The bugs come in at night.

I was in the lucky position when I was a teenager. We lived in, I lived with my dad in Spain for a few years and he had gone to Spain to drop out and lead an alternative life and then he ran out of money. And then when I was there, we had so little money, we had not even a fridge.

I mean, almost everybody had a fridge but there in the hot summer in Spain, no fridge, no radio, no television. Of course, I couldn't even think of it. So basically just the minimum and I wasn't dreadfully unhappy because of that.

To some extent, I accepted it because I was still young enough, children find it perhaps easier to accept situations that they go into. But normally, if I lived in a place like that now, I have no fridge, I have only basic things to live with, things get, I can't buy anything in advance. I have to go shopping every day because everything goes off immediately.

Oh, yes, and if you leave anything on the kitchen counter, immediately armies of ants come in and eat it. Okay, I'd rather move than be here. You can accept that this is where I am right now, it can still be fine, but you would start looking or I'd like to live somewhere else.

You see, this situation can have a preference and why not have a, everybody has a preference. Some Buddhists might talk to you about or some masters say, I have no preference whatsoever, but they live in an ashram, so they'd rather be in an ashram than be on Wall Street and work there, so there must be some preference. And so everybody has some, there's nothing wrong with having a preference.

I'd rather have a comfortable place than an uncomfortable place. But if I cannot have a comfortable place, I will be perfectly okay with an uncomfortable place. If it's not possible, fine, that's what's wrong.

I can, it's fine. So this is one thing is dealing with, responding to situation and having preferences and then taking action. Another one is bringing about something entirely new into this world.

And that comes when you are able to become still enough, so that you know what the universe or the one consciousness wants you to do, if it wants you to do something. It may take a while before you know that. I lived for years doing relatively little except doing occasional counseling sessions, sometimes only two a week.

And then the years passed and I was just continuously just in presence on my bicycle, chopping wood, carrying water. And the years passed and I spent hours in thoughtless awareness in London, sitting on the Hampstead Heath. Three hours later, I go home having a little salad and then having a counseling session at five, could live on one person a day, one counseling session a day.

And I wondered, my mind wondered sometimes, there must be something else that I'm supposed to do. And there was even slight moments of, what am I doing here? But there was nothing else to do there, be present, just be, go back to Hampstead Heath, sit there again.

But there were long periods also of incredibly blissful states that people noticed, even people who are not tuned into spirituality, particularly say, I can feel something. What is that? There were great states, emanation of peace, but I wasn't doing anything.

It was just that emanation, sometimes waiters and waitresses, occasionally went to little restaurants. They felt something, but still nothing. The universe still wasn't telling me what I was supposed to do.

And I believe the decisive change came, perhaps I should have thought of that earlier. There was a, I had moved out of London to Somerset and lived in Glastonbury, the spiritual Mecca that attracts all kinds of weird people, including myself. And just outside, there was a village just a few miles out of Glastonbury.

I would sometimes go there and there was an ancient, like the English villages, they have their ancient church, sometimes a thousand years old, a few houses around it. There was an oak tree. I would go to an ancient oak tree in the middle of the field, magnificent.

I had a wonderful relationship with that tree. But that church that was always empty, I went into that church and one day I went in and suddenly I had this impulse to say, I want acceleration now. I want, I knew there was something for me to do, but I clearly demanded acceleration of my life purpose.

And then I went home again and for maybe three months, two or three months, nothing happened. I'd forgotten about it already. And then one day it came.

It came when I woke up and I suddenly, I knew as a thought and a deeper knowing, I have to move to the West Coast of North America. Why? I don't know.

It wasn't just one day it stayed. The next day it was still there. The next week it was still there.

The week is still there. And then finally I had to leave. Couldn't not leave.

If I had not left, I would have died. So that was the first step in writing The Power of Now because I needed to be in the energy field of the West Coast for some reason to write it. And that's how the book started when a few weeks after arriving on the West Coast, it started.

And then it accelerated from there. Slowly it went, just the book took three years with on and off because I had to go back to England several times. The visa had expired and I came back.

Canadian West Coast, US West Coast, anywhere on the West Coast I could write. Back in England, I couldn't write for some reason. So I'm not saying you can't write in England.

I couldn't write. There are lots of wonderful writers in England. And then the acceleration, it came more and more after The Power of Now came out.

And then it'd be so much that I almost wanted to put the brake on. But it was, the power just grew and grew. But it came because for years I went so deep within that eventually the outer movement into creation, the outward creation reflected the depths of years of going within into just into stillness and deep into stillness.

So the outward creation reflected the inward movement. It was just, it was as powerful out there as it was in the inward movement. So you too will find that the more you align yourself with the essence, the stillness within, the unconditioned consciousness, the more the power will, there might be a time gap, but hopefully not as many years as in my case.

There may be a time gap, that the power that is within you, that you sense when you become aware of yourself as the consciousness, then flows through you. And that is what creates through you, not the little ego anymore. So you don't create because you think, when I achieve this or that, I'm going to be happy and fulfilled.

No, the happiness and the, well, happiness, something deeper than happiness, the fulfillment is already here now. The true creation cannot come out of a neediness. That's egoic creation.

That doesn't make you happy. It'll make you unhappy. Whatever you create, eventually either will not satisfy you or make you unhappy.

That comes out of a neediness. The egoic creation believes, I need to attract something to me. I need to attract this.

I need to attract that into my life. The non-egoic creation, the consciousness uses you as an instrument, uses this form as an instrument, comes out of the inner fullness. So the creation comes from within to without.

It creates the outward from within, rather than needing to attract something from the outside. Although in a language, you might sometimes express it that way. You might say, I attracted this or that person into my life.

But really it's the other way around. You can only create out of this fullness that you sense when you're in touch with presence. And only for those people who are meant to create, as I said before, there are certain others who will not be drawn towards that.

In them, consciousness will express itself in different ways that will not be creating something new out there. It will just be bringing this new consciousness into this world wherever they are and contributing to the new consciousness simply by embodying it. So it is not the case that the two seemingly incompatible camps, those who say the important thing is to use thought to create and the others say, no, just be with what is.

The two actually need to be together. You need to be deeply aligned with the present moment before you can be a real creator. And you are not the creator.

The consciousness creates through you. If you are not fully aligned with the present moment, you are not fully aligned with the unconditioned consciousness. And then it can only come through in little trickles through you, but it's not a real flow.

[Speaker 7] (6:21:34 - 6:21:40)

Our program continues with session six, questions and answers with Eckhart Tolle.

[Speaker 1] (6:21:56 - 6:23:25)

I assume that most questions have dissolved in the stillness or found an answer out of the stillness. But just in case, there are one or two questions left. Perhaps we can listen to them and then see if an answer comes or not.

I'd also like to allow a little bit of time for an evening meditation after the questions. Be here now. Don't be mentally at the airport or driving home as you're sitting here.

So if there are any questions, feel free to put up your hand. And Barbara is going to be the omnipotent person selecting.

[Speaker 4] (6:23:29 - 6:24:24)

Your interaction with the ER physician that you had was quite powerful. And I felt a lot of energy in the room from that. I'm a physician also.

I'm a gynecologic cancer specialist. So I take care of patients from surgery, chemotherapy, hospice, end of life. And there's that same pressure on all aspects, not to spend the time and take care of them maybe the way that we would like to if we could.

So I'm doing this to help take care of me, which is great. But my question is related to all the other physicians that I work with. Who are suffering and I can see it in them.

And it's the more that I learn your teachings, the more I see the suffering in them. And I don't know what to do to help them.

[Speaker 1] (6:24:27 - 6:25:03)

Right. I think I saw your question. I had selected it to answer it.

If it was a written question, that might've been yours. That was good. So I'm glad you were chosen.

Have you had made any attempt to somehow convey to your colleagues maybe unsuccessful attempts so far?

[Speaker 4] (6:25:03 - 6:25:28)

To some degree. Just over the last couple of years, there's been real research showing burnout. And that's a definable thing.

And so we can use the term burnout, which doesn't seem to offend people to talk about it. And then I've introduced some mindfulness strategies because that's another term that doesn't seem to offend people.

I was just going to say that mindfulness has become almost acceptable. So if you use that word, that might be more acceptable than presence. It's the same thing, of course, but I don't use mindfulness because it implies that your mind is full, but that's okay.

So what about creating a support group for people who work in similar capacities, both people that you know personally and perhaps other people? Because nowadays, the strange thing is the wonderful thing about the technology that we have nowadays, not only it amplifies human madness, because any person can put out any thought and immediately, no matter how crazy it is, there'll be a few thousand people in the world who will respond to it and agree with you and participate in the craziness. But on the other hand, there's also, you can reach so many people through the media, those things, internet and so on.

But you would start on a small scale. What about a mindfulness group for physicians? You could call it that.

You can become the leader of that because...

[Speaker 4] (6:27:05 - 6:27:06)

Okay.

[Speaker 1] (6:27:12 - 6:32:46)

Sometimes life asks you to do something. It may ask you to do something before you may think you're ready for it, but life knows better. And the strange thing is, you as a person would never really feel ready for this because it's hard to do.

But if you can become still and get out of the way, because becoming still means getting out of the way, if you can become still, you'll be amazed. And I'm not only talking to you, but many others. You'll be amazed how empowered suddenly the words that you speak become or the energy that flows through you and how inspired you become and what it might lead to.

Because things need to change if the system, not only in medicine, but in many other areas, is ripe for either collapse or complete change. It cannot go on the way it's going because it can only become more disintegrating. And no matter where you look, it's a question of it'll either collapse or change.

And if it collapses, that's fine too. Now I'm talking about social systems and so on in general. Eventually something more conscious will arise or something more conscious may arise and transform the old before it collapses completely.

So what is it that you could, the ideas will come to you. You can just offer to them, for example, have a meditation, show them what mindfulness is, see if they like it and then go on from there and then transmit it, go on the internet, contact others, it may suddenly spread. There are people in mainstream who are doing this.

I got invited by a scientist to Stanford University a couple of years ago. I gave a talk there and you would have thought they would not be interested in what I have to say, but that I was wrong. They were very interested.

Now, not everybody came, but many people did come. And this is a scientist who actually he is a, I believe he's a neurosurgeon and he teaches at Stanford. He is extremely interested in mindfulness and spreading the message.

He's connected also to Buddhism and Buddhist teachings. So maybe he can also, you can talk to him and see what feedback you get from him. It's good if you can, I don't know if you've met other physicians here, if you can build up a support network of people who can then support others.

There are infinite possibilities, but anybody who is here would have to consider themselves as a leader in this, because you may not yet be fully present all the time and fully enlightened on a daily basis, but you know much more than most. I mean, and I don't mean conceptual knowledge. There's a knowing in you of that dimension of consciousness that is still new, still many.

And I believe that the world desperately needs you and you start in your world. You can reach the most appropriate place for you to reach others is within your sphere of influence. And that is your work.

So what exactly, what form that will take, only you can know. It will be helpful to connect with others, get feedback, talk about it. What can we do?

And then the person at Stanford, I believe is Professor James Doty, Doty. Unfortunately, I don't know how to spell it, D-O-T-Y, something like that. I can let you know.

So see yourself as a spearheading this movement of awakening because they need you. So not only your patients need you, your colleagues need you. And then the work that you do, which is wonderful, will be enhanced immeasurably by bringing a different state of consciousness to it.

And once that happens, then the entire system may begin to undergo a change. Change always begins within. How do you feel about this?

[Speaker 4] (6:32:51 - 6:33:28)

I'm a little speechless, but it's a crisis. And I think that it really is a crisis. And so I know you're speaking not just to me, but to others that are here.

And I think that we need to do this in all aspects of medicine. So if I can help. Thank you.

So thank you for giving me the push. Thank you.

[Speaker 1] (6:33:29 - 6:33:46)

I know that Dr. Patel and his wife is here. He's been coming for many years. And have you met him?

I believe he has in his cancer clinic in Bakersfield. He introduces also counseling and mindfulness. Maybe you can connect with him.

[Speaker 4] (6:33:47 - 6:33:48)

Great.

[Speaker 7] (6:33:49 - 6:33:49)

Good.

[Speaker 1] (6:33:50 - 6:33:51)

Thank you.

[Speaker 7] (6:33:54 - 6:33:54)

Hello.

[Speaker 2] (6:33:58 - 6:36:12)

I'm very nervous to be asking my question because I feel like I have a lot of confusion. But I know that that's a good place to be asking my question from. I've been a financial planner for 33 years and went back to school six years ago to become an energy healer.

And I love it because I don't have to know. As a financial planner, I had to know. You know, I had to give answers.

But with energy healing, I get to hang out in the unknown. And it's really fun for me. And I'm not attached to the outcome for my clients.

I know something's happening, but I don't know what is happening always. And I love that. So the question that I have for you has to do with something you said this afternoon that I got very confused about.

Any resistance closes the channel. And I know that I have a powerful effect on anyone that I come in contact with. I know I vibrate at a very high consciousness level.

And that I'm here to contribute on that level. And I'm very good at manifesting. But the place that I'm confused about is that I don't know how to figure out those internal resistances.

I'm not clear on that. I'm clear on all the external resistances. Like, do you want to do this or that?

No, yes. But I get confused about being in the source and knowing when I'm in the source versus when I'm maybe in my egoic creation because I'm so good at manifesting.

So what is in your daily life, your state of consciousness? Do you undergo great fluctuations in your state of consciousness? Do you still experience the pain body occasionally coming up?

What are your thought patterns throughout the day? Do you have episodes of negative thinking that you identify with? To what extent are you able to be aware of your thoughts?

Do you get taken over by streams of thinking on a daily basis? What is your state of consciousness in your daily life?

[Speaker 2] (6:37:04 - 6:38:06)

I'm very good at witnessing myself. I'm fairly good at being able to make a choice in the moment, a different choice in the moment when I'm witnessing myself. I've done a lot of work on my pain body.

I think where I have a challenge is in something along the lines of clarity as to there's like a fear or something that runs maybe in me along the lines of knowing that I'm good at manifesting and not wanting to go in a direction of manifesting when I'm not sure that that's the direction. So there's that confusion and the piece that you said this afternoon, any resistance closes the channel. I just keep sitting with that going, where's my resistance that's closing the channel?

[Speaker 1] (6:38:08 - 6:38:33)

Well, only you can know that resistance arises as negative thinking that you're identified with and then an emotional contraction that reflects the negative thinking. Maybe there isn't very much resistance and that's why you get confused. You're looking for something that isn't there anymore.

Maybe you think there must be some resistance. Where is it? I'm confused now.

So.

[Speaker 2] (6:38:37 - 6:38:46)

It could be because I have spent my life on a very deep healing journey and been very open to always looking at those places.

[Speaker 1] (6:38:46 - 6:40:21)

Yes. So trust yourself and not only not the personal self, but the deeper self and what emanates from that. And it seems to me that you're fine.

You don't need to be concerned about resistance right now. There's already enough presence in you to dissolve it when it comes. Nobody needs to be demanded that they should be totally free of resistance or that they should be totally conscious on a continuous basis.

That is not necessary. Just detecting when you're not conscious is fine. Every time you detect a dysfunctional state that you have slipped into in a relationship or at work or wherever you may be, then the moment you know it, the moment you lost it, so to speak, that's an expression, I lost it, which usually means in common usage, I got very angry.

But here I'm using it in a wider sense when you say, I lost it means I lost presence. I lost consciousness. I got totally identified with the stream of thinking.

I got totally identified with the pain body. I lost it in the way we use it here or I use it means I lost presence completely. So you may sometimes still lose it, but I believe you're fine.

I don't think there's that much resistance. Your mind is perhaps looking for a problem where there isn't one.

[Speaker 2] (6:40:22 - 6:40:23)

You're good.

You're good. And that, by the way, is not uncommon because the mind always looks for a problem somewhere. It's amazing.

You could take a person to heaven, person who is not, no, you are okay. You'll be fine in heaven. But if you take a normal person to heaven, normal meaning unconscious, he would get very unhappy because, well, why is the problem?

He will find something wrong. Peace would be very threatening. They're not ready for that.

You are ready for heaven, it seems. So embrace it.

[Speaker 2] (6:41:09 - 6:41:10)

Okay. Thank you.

[Speaker 3] (6:41:13 - 6:41:57)

Thank you, Eckhart, for waking us all up. My question concerns the cultivation of virtue. I hear many traditions speak about cultivating loving-kindness, cultivating compassion.

And in our previous session, I heard you say that loving-kindness comes naturally out of presence. So can we cultivate virtues like you practice, you practice and you become it?

[Speaker 1] (6:42:01 - 6:59:20)

Thanks. That term tends to be used a lot in Buddhist teachings, the term cultivate, cultivating virtues. And so in Buddhism, there's a list of nice things that you, I only know the essential Buddhism.

I can't remember the long lists that you get in Buddhism of virtues and so on. I know the basic thing, which undoubtedly is what the Buddha taught is the origin of suffering and the way beyond suffering. That's the Buddha.

I think all the longer lists were compiled at a later stage by monks who wanted to make things more understandable and accessible to other monks, but they were not fully present when they did these long lists, but that's okay. So ultimately you're, of course it is better that somebody should at least attempt to cultivate the various virtues. The primary one in Christianity would be, of course, love your neighbor as yourself.

That's the primary. And really it all boils down to that in Buddhism, metta, loving kindness towards others is important. But ultimately to cultivate this, it's a wonderful intention and it's better than not trying to cultivate it, but ultimately you won't really succeed unless there's a shift in consciousness in you.

That is primary. Once there is that shift in consciousness and this is what our gathering is all about, it's virtually impossible to sustain the virtues for very long from the old state of consciousness because the old state of consciousness is dominated by ego. And if you want to cultivate the virtues, it's very often a desire of the ego to improve one's self image, not only for others, but for oneself too, because one wants to feel virtuous.

And so the ego feels better if it can convert its sometimes negative self image into a good one. And so the ego, it's like, okay, I'm doing this. I'm virtuous now.

But in Christianity, this for hundreds, thousands, 2,000 years, Christians have tried to live, well, not all, many haven't even tried, but to love your neighbor as yourself. Not that many succeeded because I don't believe that Jesus actually said, love your neighbor as yourself. I believe that they took, they were, that was taken out of context.

He said, the kingdom of heaven, which I translated, as you may remember, as the dimension of formlessness or the dimension of spaciousness is within you. And there's only one thing that matters. There's only one thing that of primary importance.

There may be many other things that are important, but there's only one thing that is of primary importance. And that is to find within you that dimension of consciousness and then live from that dimension of consciousness. And if you live from that dimension of consciousness, then naturally you will love your neighbor as yourself because you recognize your neighbor as essentially one with who you are.

And then you will also love God as yourself because you will then recognize essentially that God is the source of your very being. That's what he said. But perhaps people who wrote it down, they got to the bottom of the page where it said about the kingdom of heaven.

And if you enter the kingdom of heaven, if that's the dimension of consciousness, turn over the page, then you love your neighbor as yourself. And then at some point, the two pages got separated. And so all the virtues arise naturally out of that state of connectedness with being, which is presence, love, benevolence, goodwill towards other human beings, which is all aspects of love and whatever else, whatever other virtues, really it all comes down to no longer feeling that acute sense of separation between yourself and other human beings and between yourself and the source of who you are, the source of all life.

So God being the source of all life, the unmanifested source of all life, not when I use the word God, I'm not speaking of an authority figure, a controlling authority figure, but the source of all life. So your question was good. I had selected your question.

I saw it on a piece of paper and it had been selected for an answer too, but I'm glad you asked it. What is the difference between facing life without resistance and standing up for yourself, asserting yourself? Many times I am asked of something and I acquiesce.

The third or fourth time this happens, I feel a lot of resistance and annoyance and I don't want to do it, but I still grim and bear it because I think this is my karma or my lot in life and I'm not to resist what is and go against the present. Please help. A slight understanding of the meaning of non-resistance, which is internal non-resistance.

What you do externally may very well be to refuse to do something or to say no. But even when you say no to something or somebody, you say it without any inner resistance, without making the other person wrong, without feeling the other person should not have asked that question, without feeling that you're offended by being asked to do something that you don't want to do, all the unnecessary baggage that involuntary mind activity creates. Without all that baggage, there's just a clear, no, I'd rather not do that.

And you're still in inner non-resistance. So inner non-resistance does not always mean that you go with everything, you go along with everything that somebody wants you to do. You say, oh yeah, okay, I'll do that.

If you want to see a funny movie about that, it's called Yes Man with Jim Carrey. And that's about a man who is very negative. He loves saying no because he's a mortgage responsible for giving mortgages to people at a bank.

And he loves saying no, he always says no. And he's very negative, no, with life. One day, somebody takes him to a new age motivational speaker and the motivational speaker says, all you have to do is say yes to life, say yes to the present moment.

That sounds familiar. And at first he scoffs at it and says, oh, this is rubbish. But then he thinks, well, maybe there's something there.

And then he starts saying yes to everything in life, whatever happens, and he gets into the most absurd situations, right? And finally, at the end, he learns it's, I believe he learns it, I'm not sure what the end is, but I think I have a vague memory that he learns that there is another way. That it doesn't necessarily mean that you go along with everybody people ask you to do, although it did change his life when he went along.

It made his life so much more interesting, but nevertheless, it led to near disaster too. So the inner non-resistance, the non-resistance is an inner phenomenon because when you say yes to something that you don't really want to do, that's not non-resistance. You are actually in resistance while you do what this person wants you to do.

So when you go against, when you have a certain feeling that you don't want to do something, but to please somebody, you do it anyway, there's inner resistance. So whether or not there's inner resistance determined by your inner state, it's inner resistance. And it's a wonderful thing when you are able to say no to something without feeling any negativity whatsoever inside you.

Just to clear, it's still a very loving no. Or as I call it somewhere, I believe I wrote that somewhere, it's a high quality no. Because the low quality, the high quality no has no negativity whatsoever, just no.

The low quality no is no, no. Leave me alone. And the low quality yes is, can you please do this one?

Yeah, okay, I'll do it. Or okay, okay, I'll do it. Here's a long one, it seems.

How did that get here? Okay, I'll give a very short answer to this, although I could give a one hour long answer to this. While I've read all of your books, listened to countless audios, videos, retreats, and even attended events with you, I'm just now experiencing a difference in my perception of the now.

I thought the now was a destination, a place to go to or better to try to stay in, a place of no problems, a kind of heaven on earth. Then I thought it was a specific point in time, the moment in time where things are happening. Then last night, I opened up your little book, Oneness With All Life, and I read on page 22, the present moment is confused with what happens, confused with content.

The space of now is confused with what happens in that space. The confusion of the present moment with content gives rise not only to the illusion of time, but also to the illusion of ego. End of quote.

Now, I don't even know how to ask this question about the now, but I sense that there's something deeper than I'm going to experience about this. As a helping professional who wants to understand this, can you please say more about the now and its reality and truthful place for the benefit of our own growth, our work, and of course, extending through us into the lives of our patients and clients? You would be a, the questioner would be a wonderful speech writer.

So the present moment is confused with what happens, confused with content. So what is the now? First of all, most people believe the now is what's going on right now.

That's the now. They say, okay, this is the now, this room, people here, I'm breathing or something is happening or nothing is happening. This is the now, whatever I'm perceiving now is the now or whatever is going on is the now.

And here I'm saying, what happens is not the now. Well, everything happens now. That's for sure.

Nothing can happen that is not now. I don't think even the greatest philosopher could argue with that. That nothing has ever happened that wasn't now.

Nothing will ever happen that's not now because for something to even being and now is the same. Nothing can be outside of the present moment. But what is, so here we go.

This is what's happening now. Everything happens in the now means that the now is deeper than what happens. The now is the space in which it happens because if the now people believe there are many moments in every hour, many moments in the day and millions of moments in your life and a moment could be anything from a few seconds.

I don't know moment is a very vague term, but there's one moment after another and in every moment something happens. That's how people, but that's not the case. There are not many moments.

That's only how it looks like. If you look more deeply, you realize there's only ever this moment. This is it now.

Many moments because you remember something or you project yourself into the future, which of course can only be now too. There's only one moment ever, which is this now moment. But what happens in this now changes continuously.

Right now it's this room. Later the now will be something else. What forms come into it changes.

So what is this deeper thing that does not change that is always now? And the strange thing is you will notice the now is actually consciousness, the unconditioned consciousness, which is timeless, which is the essence of who you are. So that is the inner space, the unconditioned consciousness.

And in that everything happens. So the realization came to me a little bit too late. I had already written the power of now and then two years later, I said in a talk, you are the now in essence.

So you can put that in the power of now, write it in. You are, in essence, you are the now because you are the consciousness, the conscious space in which everything happens. It comes, dissolves.

Let's see, you are timeless. So you can actually verify that in your own, your realization of, you can actually, the strange thing is, you can actually sense the now. You can't, not with your sense perceptions, but you can feel the essence of now as the essence of, as consciousness right now.

The stillness is perhaps the closest, the easiest way to convey it through words.

[Speaker 5] (6:59:23 - 6:59:36)

Thank you for spreading such a positive, shining light. It's a fun kind of question. I was wondering, is it possible to have a conscious conversation?

[Speaker 1] (6:59:39 - 6:59:46)

Yes, yes. Have you experimented with that?

[Speaker 5] (6:59:48 - 7:00:02)

Yes, I have. I came to the conclusion that maybe two people wouldn't actually be talking to each other in a conscious conversation. They would be sitting opposite each other in awareness.

[Speaker 1] (7:00:02 - 7:02:29)

Oh, well, that's even better. But a conscious conversation is basically a conversation where it's between two people. Each person is not identified with their viewpoint, their perspective, their mental position.

They put forward their perspective, their positions, their viewpoints without any sense of self in it because they don't need that because their sense of self is derived from the presence that they can sense throughout the conversation in the background of their being. And then they can play with concepts. They can play with opinions.

They can play with words. They can play with arguments even. My argument is this, and then the other person, well, and mine is that.

The famous saying, what is it? We agree to disagree or something like that. That sounds relatively conscious because if you're not identified with your positions, then that's fine.

We agree. That's okay. It's interesting.

Self-identification with mental positions is the unconsciousness because then you will be defending your mental positions, but you're really defending your sense of self. And this is why these conversations become easily and very quickly become very unpleasant. They are unconscious.

So in unconscious conversation and with very unconscious people, it can even happen. I mean, you can probably read about it in the papers all the time. They get so defensive and aggressive about their respective mental positions.

They start physically attacking each other. It even happens. Sometimes you can see it in certain parliaments in some places.

And suddenly all these members of parliament start attacking each other. Washington sometimes gets close, but it probably hasn't quite happened that way. It could happen there too, who knows?

So what is your experience with being engaged in conversation? Do you easily get into that position where you start to defend your sense of self?

[Speaker 5] (7:02:30 - 7:02:59)

In my case, I've been experimenting with thoughtless awareness. Yes. And I've been present, appreciating and being aware of the essence of the individual in front of me.

Yes. Listening to their words, but just allowing that presence of acceptance. However, I've struggled with returning a conversation point in that state.

[Speaker 1] (7:02:59 - 7:03:40)

Yes. That's right. And that's where the real practice begins.

Yes. Because if you kind of withdraw from engagement, then it's relatively easy to sustain presence. But when you begin to actually interact verbally and thoughts, of course, thoughts become words, then the real practice begins.

And especially if you engage in a conversation with certain things that you feel strongly about. And ideally you choose somebody who has the opposite viewpoints, then you can really practice.

It's funny you should mention that because I'm an acupuncturist.

[Speaker 1] (7:03:48 - 7:03:49)

Sorry?

I'm an acupuncturist. Oh, yeah. And I've just started a position in a hospital in central Sydney.

And the way I operate with energy medicine is in an opposite position to Western medicine in many respects from a thought-based point of view. And so I'm meeting a lot of individuals who have got a very strong position and I'm trying my best to allow this concept into this new institution. So I should imagine I'll be facing a lot of challenges.

Yes.

[Speaker 1] (7:04:31 - 7:06:19)

So you can, there's a lot of, you can be practicing conscious conversation, especially with physicians who say, I don't believe in all that. And I know that's all, it's a lot of rubbish, but you do what you do. But then that's, that could be an interesting conscious conversation.

So very, it can be challenging, but the art is to remain present, even as you put forward your point of view, so that, and this is important, I've said it before, but I say it again, so that you don't identify with whatever thoughts you are expressing. Identify meaning that they constitute your sense of self. And that's unconscious.

That is self-identification with thinking. That's the essence of unconsciousness. And so in order to counteract that, because there is an enormous pull when you start arguing with somebody or they argue with you, you need to, there needs to be a high degree of alertness in you.

And that alertness is presence. And that alertness needs to be there. And then the words need to come out of that state of alertness.

And that gives you your sense of who you are. Your sense of self is in the presence. Then you can play with concepts and words.

Then you can put forward your viewpoints. And even if they are, your viewpoints are being challenged, you will not feel attacked in your sense of self. And so that's the, that is the essence of conscious conversation.

I wish you luck.

[Speaker 5] (7:06:21 - 7:06:22)

Thank you very much.

[Speaker 6] (7:06:28 - 7:08:33)

Namaste, Eckhart. Thank you. Thank you.

I feel very much, as you describe, like the butterfly coming out of the cocoon in the awakening process. Still finding times of complete identification with the body-mind. Thinking that I'm a caterpillar or a person.

My ultimate truth is complete disidentification from the ego permanently. Like what you have. Or maybe better said, like what you are.

I'm not nervous. I'm observing nervousness. I've had the experience, even yesterday morning in your meditation, of no mind.

Zero. Nothing left but the self only. However, this cannot be it because this experience is phenomenal.

and can be observed. And on a deeper level, even the observing of this experience is observable. It seems that there are so many beings like myself in this awakening process, yet very, very few beings like yourself awakened.

So I guess my question for you, what is the one thing, if any, that prevents a true spiritual seeker of the truth from complete utter divulgence into just complete self permanently?

You would make it easier on yourself if the focus of your attention is on the present moment at any given time and ask yourself whether you are awake at this moment, rather than projecting some future state where you might be, quote, unquote, permanently awakened. Because by having that mind form, pursuing that mind form, you would condemn yourself to the eternal pursuit of the mind form of permanently awake. Maybe one more, and then we will have our evening meditation.

Not that we haven't been meditating already.

[Speaker 3] (7:09:50 - 7:11:39)

My name's Jenny. I'm a physician assistant, and I practice in Michigan in the Midwest, in an area that's still very conservative. I'm excited to say I'm involved on two wellness committees, and I have dreams of bringing mindfulness to not just other providers, but to our patients.

And in the 12 years that I've been practicing, I've done lots of different things, worked in surgery, critical care, gastroenterology, and as I've been listening to you, it seems like the imbalance is truly this codependency that is encouraged by modern day healthcare. Not just patients dissociating from their role in wellness, but the pressure of providers to assume that responsibility. And what I heard from you, and please tell me if I'm on the right track, is that as we, whether we're providers or patients, enter into the present moment, we can trust the now.

We can trust our connection to source and what's manifesting in our experience. And as long as we have that connection, that there's no need to fear what is being said, that the proper energy transference will happen, and that time as we know it dissolves. And so, we as persons who feel called to be healers do the greatest service by teaching through example, by being present, and leading others back to the truth of their wholeness.

Yeah.

[Speaker 3] (7:11:40 - 7:11:41)

Right?

[Speaker 1] (7:11:41 - 7:12:51)

Thank you. Well, that's all. I think we needed to, everybody needed to listen to you.

It's one, there's no answer because there's no question, and the truth, you've been speaking the truth. So, it's wonderful. Now, let's have our lovely evening meditation.

I'll use the bell to mark the beginning and the end of our meditation. So, yeah, stillness is all that's needed now. I probably won't say anything, but you never know.

[Speaker 7] (7:26:14 - 7:26:24)

So, our program continues with session seven, contemplating the impermanence of all things with Eckhart Tolle.

[Speaker 1] (7:26:37 - 7:32:03)

Ideally, we would spend our last session in complete silence, but I'll speak anyway. As long as you're not waiting for the next thing that I'm going to say, the next thing you're going to do, which is the old state of consciousness, which is almost continuously waiting, preparing for the next thing, never fully here. But if you're fully here, you'll notice that even while you're moving, as you, of course, you're going to do soon, one can actually move and be at rest at the same time.

You can rest in the stillness within and move externally. And that's another way of looking at connectedness with being while you do. That's the art of living.

So one way of practicing it is when you're actually physically moving from A to B, still have that connectedness with being and have that still place. And so it feels almost as if the world is moving around you, the scenery is moving, and you are never moving inside. It's a bit like if you were watching a, maybe at some point as a movie technology develops, we'll have movies where you can experience being totally immersed in the action.

So you're sitting in, this is a science fiction idea, you're sitting in a movie theater and then everything, it looks totally real and you might even interact with the characters. And so when you rest within, it's a little bit like that, how the world, what it does to me, feels that you are actually never going anywhere. You remain continuously in the one, no place, but the world continuously shifts around you as you move.

And so you're resting in the stillness. And then of course there's noise around you and all kinds of things. The scenery changes, right now it's this room.

Maybe in a couple of hours, it'll be the windscreen of the car. And you're resting in the same place still. And then it might be an airport, people running around.

And you yourself may be running around. You don't, you can, perhaps you have to run to the gate and you can still feel resting. There's still that place that's unmoved.

The stillness, the timeless you, the spaciousness. And you can, this is where the, as I mentioned before, the Zen saying, hurry slowly comes from. What that means is, the slowly means this really, that's the unmovable within.

And basically also means you're always at home. No matter where you are, you have that feeling of being at home in yourself. And that is also fundamentally different from the normal state of consciousness where most people carry around or are burdened with a continuous sense of unease.

And then there's always a sense they've never really arrived. They're always trying to arrive somewhere. One could almost say, metaphorically speaking, they are trying to get home.

But even when they are actually at home where they live, they're not at ease. There's always something lacking. I'm not fully myself or whatever it is.

However, the mind might interpret it. You don't feel at home. Home, by the way, is a lovely word in the English language.

I believe it has a Germanic origin. But all these languages, of course, are Indo-European. They go back.

Many of them have certain roots in Sanskrit even. So home, what does that sound like? Home.

[Speaker 8] (7:32:10 - 7:32:12)

Home. Home.

[Speaker 1] (7:32:25 - 8:27:46)

And then the world is not experienced as stressful anymore, even when it moves fast or might even require you to move fast sometimes. But there's always another way of putting it is the center of the wheel, the absolute center. The wheel is spinning, but you, your conscious, the focus, partly of your consciousness, attention, conscious attention, is in the center of the wheel.

That's the space within your stillness. And then there's the wheel. And that's the movie show of your life that spins sometimes slow, sometimes fast.

And then it slows down again, but it's always doing something. So this may also help you because a few of you or many might feel a little bit sorry that the retreat is coming to an end. Whenever something ends, it's a little death.

Even saying, I mentioned it somewhere in a book too, even saying goodbye to someone is a little death, a temporary, because one situation comes to an end. And this, as I mentioned, I believe in the new earth of power now, most languages to say goodbye, the word, the expression they use is see you again. Au revoir, auf Wiedersehen, arrivederci, see you again.

Later, alligator. But making sure, so just as an affirmation that, okay, this is not the last time because to cover up this feeling of sudden emptiness. Now, if you realize that this place within is what this entire retreat is about, being rooted in that at the center of the wheel or the unmoved, timeless, unconditioned stillness, consciousness, whatever pointer works best for you, then you realize you don't actually, that's the real retreat.

The real retreat is that place within. Everything else about the retreat, the externals, and that's fine. So the retreat actually never goes away because the retreat is, that is the retreat, being home within yourself in that place.

Then you are on permanent retreat, permanent retreat from the world and yet able to interact with the world and interact consciously, no longer in the dysfunctional way. And if your interactions are not perfect, that's fine. You also become comfortable with the imperfections of this world, the so-called imperfections, including the imperfections of your particular form identity, which may make mistakes, sometimes do something unconscious.

It's not impossible. And you become okay with that also, that in that place is okay with what is. You can interact.

What I just explained is the actual meaning of the expression it goes back to, who first used that expression? I don't know. Being in the world, but not off it.

It's an expression used in Christian terminology teachings, being the possibility of living in such a way that you are in the world, but not off it. It's a Christian expression term, but it could be anything. It could be Buddhist, could be anything.

Being in the world, but not off it, is exactly, this is the meaning of what I just described and what you can verify in yourself. When you rest in that inner stillness, you are obviously in the world. That's the movie show around you that changes all the time.

But not off it means your sense of self is not entangled in all these things that continuously arise and pass away. As the Buddha would have said, all phenomena continuously arise and pass away, arise and pass away all the time. And so you don't get entangled.

Entangled means having your sense of self entangled in all the things that continuously arise and pass away. But because if you have your sense of who you are, your sense of identity, your sense of self, entangled in the things that continuously arise and pass away, that is, as the Buddha said, dukkha, suffering. Can also be translated as general unhappiness, misery, discontent, or unsatisfactoriness, or something not right here.

What is it? Why do you always feel that something isn't quite right? That's dukkha.

And that means you are not connected with the essence of who you are. So you got entangled. You seek your sense of self in those things that cannot give you a satisfying and true sense of self.

All those things that arise and pass away. So to look for yourself in this movie show that continuously changes the impermanence of all things is a form of suffering. So wanting to hang on to this, identify with this.

And the movie show includes, it's not just all the things that happen externally around you. So the movie show is also the thoughts that pass through your mind. That's also really, that's also part of the movie.

And they come and go. And what people get entangled with, even more than the so-called external world, ultimately it's all the inner world anyway, we'll put that aside. What you get entangled with is the much more so every thought that comes, you get entangled in that.

And look for your sense of self in that. You identify with the thoughts that come, your opinions, viewpoints, likes, dislikes. You believe every thought that comes that tells you what your life is.

All of my life, I have to think about my life. It hasn't worked out. Not the way I wanted it to work out.

Why did all this have to happen? And then I failed at this, I failed at that. Maybe I can still make it, maybe not.

I need to think harder about me and my life. There must be a solution to the problem of me. Maybe if I see several psychotherapists, psychiatrists, maybe eventually they can help me find a solution to the problem of me because I perceive myself as a problem, like a knot, K-N-O-T, like a knot that wants to be entangled but can't.

Well, how do I do that? And then the psychotherapist, psychiatrist, psychoanalyst, a counselor may help you and untie this knot of the unhappy me. But it takes a long time and never really managed to do it until you realize that the entire knot is a kind of illusory construct.

And on that level, you can't do much about it. But if you realize it consists of thought plus emotion that you had identified with, then suddenly it's not a problem anymore. And suddenly you become aware of who you are beyond that.

And then you let it be, as the song goes. And suddenly you are not a problem to yourself anymore because you're not looking for your sense of identity anymore on the level of thought or emotion. And then thought becomes less problematic.

Thought loses its capacity to make you unhappy because before you might've noticed, most of the time when you get unhappy, it's because of certain thoughts that arise in your head that you completely believe in, interpretations of situations, events, people, misinterpretations, very one-sided interpretation as every interpretation is, it's just a viewpoint. And those things create unhappiness. Most of the time, that's what makes you miserable.

If you become miserable, anxious, regretful, it's believing the thoughts that arise continuously, which are part of the movie show. So it's not just the movie show out here. It's also the movie show in your head.

And so if you get dragged along in it, then it's a very confusing way to live. You have no central sense of identity. And this is why so many people manifest in different situations.

They manifest different aspects of their conditioned mind, which are sometimes called sub-personalities, or whatever. And you might have noticed people, those people in whom there is little or no awareness, they can change from one moment to the next, from one day to the next, or one situation to the next. When they encounter certain situations, suddenly some other sub-personality comes up.

This is still considered, this is not schizophrenia or anything like that. That's all, that's still considered within the realm of what is normal. I was always amazed for the short periods in my life when I lived communally, how changeable people are.

And every morning I would sit at breakfast in a community where I lived in England for a little while. And I'm always wondering, who is going to come down the stairs from the bedroom? What aspect of their personalities?

One day, it's a great, wonderful day, isn't it? It's so great to be alive. And then the next day, leave me alone.

This is a dreadful place. I'm trying to get out of here. I don't know how can people live in this place.

It's so dreadful. And this is only, and other sub-personalities in humans are triggered by specific situations, sometimes involving money or somebody dies. And then who is going to get the heritage, the funds?

And then suddenly everybody comes totally. Or certain people can do it because one person may remind you of somebody that you once knew who wasn't pleasant. All these things that you get entangled in with your sense of self, and that does not happen anymore, or if it does still happen occasionally to you, you fairly quickly wake up again and realize who you actually and essentially are.

You are not your thoughts or not your emotions and not whatever arises and happens around you. The still center, so to speak. It's a way of experiencing the world that frees you from the world internally without leading to a sense of separation.

When I say it frees you from a world, it sounds almost as if you felt a sense of separation now between yourself and the movie show. There is a detachment, yes. But also as you interact with everybody, there is more of a feeling of non-separation that we interact with because it's not your sense of self anymore that you're seeking to reinforce by interacting with other humans.

So you can allow them to be as they are. And the judgmental mind either subsides completely or you no longer believe in every judgment that comes into your head, every thought that arises. So that's a wonderful way that removes fear from your life because if you're entangled in the movie show of your life, it's fearful because nothing, you cannot really hang on to anything for too long.

And it cannot give you your sense of who you are. And it's fearful because you're ultimately the inability to trust life, which traditionally in, for example, in Christian terminology is called faith. Faith is the ability to have a basic trust in life.

It's not faith in something. In some languages, faith and believe are the same word, but faith basically is a belief as you believe that a certain story that you've been told is absolutely true and it once happened and it's absolutely true, okay? And if somebody else doesn't believe it, then he's going to hell.

Well, he's going to hell because he doesn't believe the story, okay? You don't believe my story, I'm going to kill you. That sounds funny, but it's still many people's reality.

It's still many people's state of consciousness. Faith is something deeper. It's nothing to do with any story.

Faith is a basic trust in life that can only come from this inner connectedness with that place of stillness within. That the absence of fear is trust. The inability to have this basic rootedness in being, rootedness in being.

If you don't have that, you will have fear, one form or another. You may not always be conscious of it, but you'll always be somewhere in the background and sometimes very much in the foreground. And of course, every anxiety that you have is, it's all fear and many other emotions that are not pleasant, anger and so on.

If you look deeply, you will usually find underneath the anger, there is a fear of something. There's a fear of losing, there's a fear of your sense of identity, the fear of not enough and so on. So, and the state of disconnectedness from being automatically results in a fearful state.

And the fearful state is an inherent part of the egoic state of consciousness. You can't have ego without fear. And even the most seemingly confident ego that looks, look at me, and you'll find it's a big act.

They're good at acting out. Why are they acting to cover up the fear that's behind it? Some egos are obviously fearful.

The moment you meet them, you can see the fear in their eyes, which might express itself as distrust, suspicion. What are you going to do to them? What do you want from me?

So everybody they meet, there's never an openness towards another human being because the ego thinks I need to protect myself. And then you start, the mind starts working out, what are this person's motivations? What does he want from me?

So there can never be an open, there's always some assumption about what the other person is all about. Never an openness. It's a dreadful state to live in.

Millions still live in that state. It's normal. It's considered normal.

So faith, to use a traditional term, is a deep trust. Now you're not trusting anything specific in the universe. You don't need to say, I completely trust this person or I completely trust this situation.

If you do, you will probably be disappointed because every human being manifests sooner or later certain imperfections and certain areas of unconsciousness. So they will make mistakes. They might offend you without knowing it.

They may omit. They may be dishonest once or twice with you. They may tell you a lie for whatever reason.

He lied to me. Oh my God, he lied to me. So I'd never want to see him again.

Well, that's enough. So you never lie to anybody? Well, that's not the point.

And then the mind, the egoic mind reaches some absurd conclusions. For example, after somebody said something, did something unconscious towards you and then the egoic mind says, I'm never going to trust anybody again. And it formulates some kind of judgment concerning all human beings or the world or God.

God, don't talk to me about God. You know what he did to me? I'll tell you.

I'll tell you. It's good to recognize the normal human state of consciousness than to see the amusing side to it. It's quite liberating.

So you don't trust. People sometimes ask me, how can I trust? I've told many times, I've tried to trust another person and always get disappointed.

Of course you do, because you can't trust, you don't trust a person. Or you can say, as Byron Katie said, I trust them to do whatever they do. I trust them that they'll do what comes naturally to them.

In other words, it doesn't matter. But you are, the trust is the place within you, the connectedness with being. That's where the trust arises.

And when the stillness, the space, and then you have a generalized trust in life, which includes all human beings and includes the fact that humans are not totally conscious and will manifest certain unconsciousness to you from time to time. And it makes no difference whatever to your trust because you don't need to behave, you don't need another human being to behave in a certain way to reinforce this idea that you can allow yourself to have trust. You'd simply recognize that all things around you are impermanent and that includes human beings.

They may change their opinion about you. They might say you are the greatest they've ever met. And a few months later, they hate you.

Egos do that. And people do that also to spiritual teachers or gurus and say, ah, and then something happens and they hate him. Or you fall in love.

You fall in love and this is the person that's going to liberate you from your sense of insufficiency and incompleteness. And this is the person that's going to make you happy now for the rest of your life. How wonderful that is.

And then you get disappointed. That wasn't supposed to happen. He was meant to make me happy.

And so the so-called love suddenly turns around into its opposite. So all that happened was initially the so-called love relationship covered up that feeling of distrust in life, that feeling of lack and insufficiency. And it was temporarily, it wasn't removed.

It was temporarily covered up. And then when the other person does not behave in the way that he or she was supposed to behave, the feeling reemerges and you feel it even more strongly than before. But the mind misinterprets it as meaning that he caused me to have that feeling or she caused me to have that feeling now, that terrible feeling.

But of course, the terrible feeling was there before. You just feel it more strongly now because the cover has been removed again. And this basic distrust and unease emerges and you feel it even more now after having been deceived, deceived yourself.

So human relationships change fundamentally once you do not look to other humans as a source of finding completion for yourself or somebody that you actually can place trust in. This is a very important point. I even remember having looked at two or three questions on the pieces of paper that I'm still reading.

I even feel inclined to do something on the internet and spend a few hours answering some of these questions. But whether this is going to happen, of course, I don't know. I'll say it again so that it doesn't disappear from your mind.

You don't need to trust another human being. It's not necessary. The trust is a state of consciousness and it's a trust in life.

You don't trust that a particular thing is going to happen and so on. You know that all phenomena around you are impermanent and cannot satisfy you. And that is a liberating realization because then you stop looking to this movie show around you and find something in there that's going to make your sense of self more complete and satisfying.

Of course, occasionally things do that, but not for long. So when you don't look at this movie show anymore for satisfaction, personal fulfillment, then, and you can only not look for it when you are connected with being within. So you begin to enjoy even the fact that things are impermanent.

There can be a sense of peace when you contemplate the impermanence of all things. I sound like the Buddha now, but that was a very deep teaching that he gave and it's still alive now. When you become aware of the impermanence of all things, it's quite amazing.

And that can strengthen that sense of beingness within you. The more you watch impermanence, the more you feel the something within you that is not touched by that. Consciousness itself, stillness, whatever you want to call it, the timeless being, the timeless you, the timeless deepest essence of who you are, the center of the wheel is not touched by that.

And the more you become aware of impermanence, which to the ego is a fearful thing. Oh, don't remind me of death. I don't want to be reminded that I'm going to die one day.

Don't be negative. Don't talk to me about that. I don't want to visit a graveyard and walk around and look at the gravestones.

That's awful, but it can be a wonderful thing. It can be a deep, suddenly you feel more deeply connected, more deeply connected because of the fact of impermanence around you. By becoming aware of impermanence and not running away from it internally, not denying it, but facing it fully, that actually will have the effect of strengthening your connectedness with being.

And this is the idea, of course, behind in some Buddhist traditions, the monks go to the morgue and meditate surrounded by dead bodies. Periodically they go there. And of course the egoic self, particularly the Western conditioned egoic self, there's how morbid, how absurd, why do they do that?

It's just absurd, isn't it? There's a deep reason why they do that in order to strengthen that connectedness with being, which they call emptiness. And somebody else calls fullness, it's the same place.

And so you might have seen, those of you who came to the last retreat, some of you were, or the one before that, I had a spiritual entertainment evening when I showed little clips from video clips. And one video clip was a commercial that was never shown because it was regarded as too shocking. It's a one minute thing.
